- <sup>a</sup> GEOGRAPHERS and seamen are divided in their opinions concerning the extent and limits of the Ivory Coast; some confining it between the Rio de Suero da Costa, where the Gold Coast begins, and Grova, two miles east of Cape Palmas. <sup>Geography of the Ivory Coast.</sup> Others again stretch its boundaries from Cape Palmas to Cape Tres Puntas, all that shore being known to mariners under the appellation of the Tooth Coast. The first subdivide it into three provinces, viz. the Ivory, the Malagentes, as the French call it, and the Quaqua Coast; but the Dutch give all three the general appellation of Tand Kust, distinguishing it only by the nature and disposition of the natives, as the coast of Good Men, and that of Bad Men<sup>a</sup>. However, the most precise and accurate limits are contained within Cape Apollonia to the east, and Cape Palmas to the west, in which manner we find it laid down in the Atlas of the Sieur Robert, and distinct charts of that judicious compiler Prevost. The Hollanders have called the eastern part of this coast by the name of Quaquas, because the natives, on the approach of a ship, are continually repeating that word, which Villault imagines expresses a kind of welcome; observing, that the master of an entertainment usually repeats it to his guests (A). But that we may not engage in endless controversy, we will begin with describing the situation of the towns and villages.

(A) Snoeck, a Dutchman, says, that he is unable to explain the etymon of the word; assuring us, that the natives call their country Ado. Smith again believes he has solved the difficulty, by affirming, that Quaquas, in the language of the country, signifies teeth or ivory; but in support of this assertion he quotes no authority:

The towns and villages on the Ivory Coast.

THE principal towns of the Ivory Coast, are, Grova, or Grua (B), Great Tabo, Little Tabo, Great Drevin, Batrou, Labo, Apollonia, and Vallo. Each of these stand at the mouths of those rivers whence they borrow their names; and as for the interior country, it is but little known, the natives refusing the Europeans leave to build settlements, or even to trade among them, except by means of the coast negroes, and even this with the most circumspect caution. Here the same commodities are found as in the former division, viz. gold, ivory, and slaves, the former in the greatest plenty; but no regular tariff or table of the different proportions of each was ever settled. Grova stands three miles east of Cape Palmas; Great Tabo thirty miles from Grova, east; Little Tabo four miles farther east; thence to Great Drevin eleven miles, thence to Batrou nineteen miles, to Labo seven, and from thence to Cape Apollonia twenty miles; the whole amounting to ninety-four miles. Although this coast be crowded with towns and villages, we shall describe only such as are frequented by Europeans. Great Tabo is known at sea by a remarkably high green cape in its neighbourhood, covered with wood. The current usually sets east-north-east, and sometimes south-south-east, on this coast. Little Tabo is known by mariners from a high rock, at a mile and a half distance from it. The cape in its neighbourhood is covered with high trees, dispersed in an irregular manner, and the road is about eighteen fathom deep. Near the town flows a small river, called by the Portuguese Rio de San Pedro; having on the west certain mountains, to which they give the names of Santa Apollonia, Druyn, Drevin Petri, likewise called Great Drevin, standing upon the river St. Andrew. It is known at sea by some buildings on a rising ground, at a great distance; also by several groups of trees dispersed up and down the coast. Besides the town, three villages, about a quarter of a mile distant from each other, are plainly seen from the ships; all of them plentifully stocked with cattle, with which the fields seem covered. The inhabitants of this district have the reputation of being the most savage and barbarous on the whole coast; and some writers scruple not to call them Anthropophagi, affirming, that their teeth are sharp, and pointed like a bodkin. Barbot advises mariners to touch with caution on this shore; the natives, says he, bring on board some beautiful ivory, as a bait to draw the seamen on shore, and perhaps to devour them. This is the more probable, from their keeping their goods at so high a price, as will assuredly ever prevent Europeans from purchasing it, although they ask for every thing they see, and are greatly incensed if they meet with a refusal. Their suspicion and jealousy are predominant qualities; insomuch that, on the least noise, they will precipitate themselves headlong into the sea, and swim to their canoes<sup>b</sup>.

the river St.
Andrew, and
country.

THE river St. Andrew is a fine deep stream, and increased near its mouth by the falling in of another river, both joining to form a large road. The entrance is surrounded with lofty trees, beautiful verdant meadows, and rich fields of great extent. Nature seems to have intended this place for a fortress, without any other defence than its situation. About 500 paces from the mouth of the river, a peninsula runs a great way into the sea, joined to the continent by a slender neck of land, not above five or six fathoms broad. The whole peninsula is a high level rock; having a platform four hundred feet in circumference, and commanding all the neighbouring country. On every side it is surrounded by the sea, the rock perfectly steep, and truly inaccessible on the south, east, and west sides; the neck of land also being so easily defended, that a battery of five guns would render it impregnable: to this account of Des Marchais, Villault subscribes; and subjoins, that at the foot of a little eminence, north of the neck of land, there is a fine fresh water spring, capable of supplying a large garrison, and of being secured by the cannon of the fort<sup>c</sup>.

THE land-marks are here so distinct, that it is impossible for ships to mistake them. Here are lofty, thick, and shady trees, with three or four large villages, that strike the eye all at once, within less than half a mile of each other; besides several other marks, which we shall leave to the writers of voyages to recite. All the fields and meadows round the mouth of the river are watered by pleasant meandering streams, that fertilize the ground, and render it fit for producing every species of grain, fruits, and roots; but especially maize, millet, rice, pease, yams, and melons, which grow with surprising increase. Fine natural groves of oranges, limes, coco-nut trees, citrons, &c. grow here, their boughs and his residence on the coast appears to have been too short to become acquainted with the language. Others imagine the term derived from the great number of ducks found on this coast, the name being expressive of the cry of those animals; but this can at best be no more than an ingenious conjecture (1).

(B) Several writers affirm, that Grova properly belongs to the Grain Coast, whose limits, they say, extend beyond Cape Palmas. However, as all the charts place it within the frontier of the Ivory Coast, we have mentioned it in the catalogue of towns.

a so closely intermingled, that you might imagine all those several fruits were the produce of one large tree. Here the sugar-cane, with a thousand other plants, which spring up without cultivation in the greatest perfection, are abandoned to the ravages of the elephant, and as haunts for wild beasts. In a word, whatever the Gold Coast produces, is also found here, in greater abundance and perfection; and, indeed, the fruits and vegetables of the warmer climates, seem all to be united on the Ivory Coast <sup>a</sup>.

As to the natives, the men wear a loose dress, resembling a surplice, which hangs down to the knees; and the women, a narrow cloth wound round their waists, and turned in at the sides. Many of them indeed go perfectly naked, and seem to pride themselves on shewing what nature dictates to the rudest barbarians to conceal. However, the richer of both

b sexes have a paan of fine cloth; and the men a poniard or long knife by their sides. The women are small, but neatly proportioned; their features are regular, their eyes lively, and their teeth white, small, and even. The men are likewise well built; nor are they deficient in courage or understanding; but the European traders having carried off some, they are become so suspicious, that nothing can prevail on them to set foot on board, before the captain of the ship has gone through the ceremony of putting a drop of sea water into his eye. This they look upon as their protection, and a solemn engagement that no injury shall be offered them; however, they cannot be prevailed upon to go under hatches, or enter the cabin. They are extremely fond of bracelets of iron and ivory, mounted with little bells, which they put round their arms, and the small of each leg. Those bells inspire

c them with additional joy in dancing, of which they are passionately eager, as indeed are all the negroes. Every canton or district has its particular mode of dancing, different contortions and grimaces, which they prefer to their neighbours customs; and our best European masters would in this country pass for awkward and clumsy, and might, indeed, find some attitudes and postures among the negroes, which might improve their art. The women in general have a fine, easy, graceful air, when they dance; but this dignity is frequently intermixed and broken, by some ridiculous and burlesque grimaces <sup>c</sup>.

EAST of the river St. Andrew, are at least a dozen of craggy, broken, and ragged mountains, which stretch for three or four miles along the coast; yet are the intermediate fields rich and fruitful, watered in this short space by near twenty little rivulets; and indeed

d were the inhabitants a little more civilized, no country on earth bids fairer for a profitable trade and useful commerce. The elephants must be of an enormous size, many of their teeth weighing above 200 pounds. Slaves and gold are likewise in great plenty, but Europeans can never learn in what manner the maritime natives procure the latter, which they preserve an inviolable secret; or if they are pressed to explain themselves, they point their finger to the mountains on the north-east, intimating that it comes from thence. It is probable, however, that some part of it is found in their rivers, washed by them from the mountains. But all those advantages are lost, through the barbarous disposition of the natives, who are in no respect to be trusted, their courtesy being merely the effect of design, and a snare to draw the mariners on shore. Barbot carries his notions of their savage disposition to a ridiculous extreme; nor is their cunning inferior to their cruelty. He relates a variety of instances of their savage nature, by which ships, that have stopped to wood and water on their coasts, have had their men kidnapped and murdered. In the year

e 1677, an English merchantman lost three of her crew by this means; the following year a Portuguese trader had nine men murdered; and soon after a Dutch ship met with the same fate, all her crew on shore being kidnapped, murdered, and they suppose eaten by those savages, to the number of fourteen men. From this bloody disposition of the natives, the Portuguese have given the name Malagente to the Ivory Coast; and, far from attempting to drive a commerce, they do not venture ever to approach it even for wood and water, without arming the seamen, and giving strict charge that they keep close to their boats.

f From hence we may judge how little this coast is known to Europeans, and how imperfect all the relations of the geography, produce, laws, and manners, of the country and natives must prove.

VILLAULT describes a village, which he calls Dromwa Petri, probably Little Drewin, as seven miles distant from the river St. Andrew <sup>f</sup>. It is situated, says he, between the seventh and eighteenth red mountain, and known at sea by a tree of great height and bulk. As to the inhabitants, they are no less brutal and savage than all the others of the coast. In this general way do voyagers speak of a country, of which they think themselves under the necessity of giving some account. Between this and the river Cotro or Kotrou (C), he could see no other villages; from which circumstances, and finding no canoes on the coast, he infers that this district is but thinly peopled. Two miles east of Ketro stands the town of Labo, near the cape of that name. It is known at sea by this cape, which is a low point, projecting into the sea, and covered with wood; among which may be distinguished one high tree, that rears its lofty head far above the rest, serving thereby for a land mark. According to Des Marchais, Cape Labo is situated in five degrees ten minutes north latitude, equally distant from Cape Palmas and Cape Tres Puntas, and the western frontier of that district, called the country of the Good People <sup>a</sup>.

(C) The river Cotro, Kotro, or Kotrou, runs to the east of the river Jagos, and is probably the same which Smith and some other mariners call the Black River. either from its depth, or the muddiness of its waters.

The different disposition of the natives of Labo.

HERE the ivory is large, good, and in great abundance. Barbot speaks of the town of Labo, as a large and populous place, extending the matter of a league along the coast, the shore being composed of a beautiful yellow sand, against which the sea beats with great violence. The neighbouring country affords all kinds of provisions, better and cheaper than on the coast of St. Andrew and Drewin. The natives are of a mild, tractable, and gentle disposition, but ready to catch at every opportunity of raising the price of their ivory, according to the demand, and the number of ships they observe on the coast. They are visited by interlopers of all nations: the free ships of England, Holland, Denmark, and the Hanse Towns; whence the occasions of raising their price occur too frequently, as is experienced to the cost of the fair trader, who pays an extraordinary rate for his goods; and is also undersold in Europe, by merchants who trade at a far less expence than a company possibly can <sup>b</sup>.

BOSMAN mentions a large river, that runs about a mile west of Labo, dividing itself into two branches, one of which falls into the river St. Andrew, and the other continues its course eastward for several leagues, before it empties itself into the sea; but this we are unable to reconcile with any of the charts we have seen, which running from east to west, the river must flow upon a parallel line for several leagues; a direction extremely unusual. Snoeck adds, that Labo is planted, like Axim, with a great number of coco-trees; and that if the coast were as bold, and the shore embellished by a fort, it would be difficult for mariners to distinguish the one from the other; so strong a resemblance have the neighbouring countries of both districts. <sup>c</sup>

The alertness of the negroes in swimming.

PASSING Cape Labo, the coast falls in directly north-east, forming a fine bay, at the head of which opens the mouth of the little river, called Jaque Labo, or Das Balbas, running directly north and south, but not navigable. Seven miles south-east, or rather east-south-east of this, stands the village Wallo, Vallock, or Wattalock, which has some little trade in ivory. Next follows Jack a Jack, a village; and close by that eastward, Korbi Labo, the little pool, called the Bottomless Pit, standing between the two last places. The English and Dutch had both given this little space of salt water its name from its extraordinary depth, several unsuccessful attempts having been made to sound it; but at length it was found to be no more than sixty fathoms, its supposed depth arising from a tide at the bottom, which carried away the lead faster than they could furnish line. This current driving to the south-west, Uring and Atkins advise mariners from quitting Jaque Labo, before they have a fair wind, capable of surmounting the difficulty; as, excepting the pool, there is no anchorage for several leagues along the coast. The best method, say those writers, is to cast anchor before Gunno, in the district of Ado; or at Korbi Labo, or in the mouth of Rio de Suero da Costa, this last road, especially, being equally convenient for the inhabitants of either places to come on board with the produce of the country, viz. cloths and stuffs of Quaquas, ivory, and provisions. We are told of none of the qualities of these negroes, besides their great skill in swimming and diving: it being the common diversion of the European sailors to throw bits of iron, coral, glass, and the like, over-board, after which the negroes will dive with such rapidity, as to catch them before they reach the bottom <sup>d</sup>. <sup>e</sup>

FROM the Rio de Suero da Costa, to Cape Apollonia, the coast is low and even, extending itself for a course of twelve miles eastward, bordered with large trees, and covered with villages, the chief of which are, Boqun, Issini Peguena, Great Issini, Albiani, Jabo, and Akanimina. The first stands at a small distance from the shore, near the mouth of the river Da Costa, surrounded by woods, and pleasantly situated. Issini Peguena and Great Issini, are both situated on the sea coast, at the distance of three or four miles, and between them are a number of villages, three of them very considerable, but their names unknown. Great Issini is built at the entrance of a small river, which during the dry season is lost in the sands, but discharges itself into the sea during the rainy months. This town was pillaged and burnt in the year 1681, by the inland negroes; but it has since revived its splendor, or rather exceeds what it ever had been, by the addition of a great number of houses and inhabitants. Where the river empties itself in the sea, it forms a small island, very commodious for building a fort; but our European companies have hitherto made no attempts of that nature, dreading perhaps the vicinity of those ill-disposed neighbours to <sup>f</sup> <sup>g</sup>

a the westward (D). Great Iffini is celebrated for the purity of its gold, which probably comes from the kingdom of Affiento, at the source of the Rio de Suero da Costa, a country rich in gold, but little known to the Europeans, as we have already observed.

b EAST of Iffini are the little districts and towns of Albiani and Tabo, the former six miles, the latter ten from it, both surrounded by high groves of palms, seen at a great distance at sea, and pretty much frequented by European shipping. A mile farther east, and half a mile west of Cape Apollonia, stands the village Akanimina, on a rising ground; and commanding an extensive sea and land prospect. The interior country between Boquin and this village is high, rugged, and mountainous, but affording some fine gold, ivory, and a few slaves. The gold dust of these two places is found commonly in six fathoms deep, for two miles along the coast; and the negroes mix it with pulverized copper so expertly, that it requires touching to discover the fraud.

c NEAR Cape Apollonia is the kingdom of Guimere, governed in the year 1703 by a queen, Kingdom of called Affamouchon, a princess much respected by her neighbours, and beloved by her subjects. She was to have been succeeded in the throne by her brother; for being of an active Guimere governed by a queen. and warlike humour, she disliked the authority of a husband, spent her whole time in the camp, and headed her own armies. Such was her good fortune and bravery, that she was never unsuccessful in any enterprize, nor was the smallest advantage ever gained over her troops, either by the negroes or Europeans. She was passionately fond of the French, and entered into a treaty with the chevalier Damon, which continued without the least infraction, during the greater part of her life. So great an admirer was she of the lively and polite humour of this nation, that she frequently declared she had rather be a subject of France, than the sovereign of any other European state; a proof that her majesty's penetration into human nature was not deep, and that, like her sex, she judged by external appearances. This kingdom of Guimere has but narrow limits towards the sea, but stretches itself a great way towards the inland parts; it is well peopled, rich, and renowned by its commerce. Gold and ivory are in considerable quantities found here; and her majesty's perpetual wars always produced a good market of slaves<sup>k</sup>.

d ACCORDING to Des Marchais, Cape Apollonia stands in four degrees fifty minutes of north latitude, half way between the Rio de Suero da Costa, and Cape Tres Puntas (E). It is remarkable for its height, and the lofty trees with which it is covered<sup>1</sup>. The natives have formed themselves into a kind of republican government, under the protection, or rather tyranny, of the Dutch, who prohibit their trading with any other nation; and hence it is, that this coast is so little known to the other Europeans, and so inaccurately described by the Hollanders, who find their interest in concealing the nature of the produce and wealth of the country. Snoeck allows, however, that the country between Iffini and Cape Apollonia is well peopled, and covered with large and small villages. It had its name, says he, from the Portuguese, who discovered it upon St. Apollonia's day: it points a little southward, but appears low and strait along the coast or shore, raising itself into three high mountains behind, which are seen from a great distance at sea, in clear weather. Upon each of the e mountains are several distinct and separate groves or groups of trees, that give the prospect a very cool and agreeable look; and in the intermediate vallies are three or four pretty villages, built close to the sea side; but the continual beating of the waves upon a flat and sandy shore, renders landing difficult, and a commerce here extremely inconvenient, which nothing could balance besides the great advantages derived from it.

f In general, if we except a few capes, all the coast from Cape Palmas to Cape Apollonia appears not only so low, but so equal and strait, that it is very difficult for ships to distinguish places; and indeed, besides these capes, the only distinct land-marks are the heights and mountains round Drewin. The landing all along the coast is dangerous, on account of the high surf and swelling waves that roll in from the vast southern ocean, and break with such violence upon the sands. The negroes alone are perfectly acquainted with this sea, and brave enough to combat all the fury of its winds, tides, and waves, in their little canoes. From Cape Palmas to Cape Apollonia these canoes are employed in loading and unloading the shipping, that dread coming near the shore, and being shattered in pieces by the waves; nor are they always safe by keeping at a distance from the shore, as the ground is so rough that they frequently lose their anchors. Here the south winds blow the most frequently, stopping the land breezes, and those strong and unhealthy stenches that proceed from the villages of almost all negroes. a

(D) Barbot says, that the French in 1701, built a small fort here; which not answering their expectation, they abandoned it in 1714 (1); but this is a circumstance we find mentioned by no other author.

(E) Phillips places it about six miles east of Great Iffini, representing it as formed by three great mountains, with two or three villages to the west. With these he attempted entering upon a trade, but in vain (2).

the natives.

ROUND Cape Apollonia there are large tracts of fallow land, in which the negroes now sow Indian corn, a species of grain which they believe was imported hither by the Portuguese. The complexion of the natives is so black, that Alkins compares it to the finest jet: in their temper they are lively, enterprising, and indefatigable in commerce. Their huts are neater and cleaner than those of their neighbours, and their dress more elegant, it being set off with ornaments of gold, ivory, and kowris. The hair or wool of their heads is divided into an infinity of small tresses, which they adorn with bits of oyster shells and other shining baubles. On the left cheek they have a scar, of the figure of a poniard, and frequently the rest of the body is marked in the same manner, to denote the warlike disposition of the person; a custom of great antiquity here, and communicated to several other negro nations, serving to distinguish the inland from the maritime natives; the former of which are often reduced to slavery by the latter. Those slaves they sell at four ounces of gold dust per head; and, allowing 100 per cent. on goods, they will be thus purchased at 8 l. sterling each, out of which the caboceros demand twenty shillings duty, and the palaver men, or great council, ten shillings; whence our author concludes, that thieving or kidnapping slaves is more systematical here than in any other country, where no certain price or duty is affixed. b

FROM Cape Apollonia to the river Mankaw, where the province of Axim, the first division of the Gold Coast begins, are two or three fine villages. Two in particular are beautiful, situated amidst groves of palm and coco trees; but the trade, for which they stand advantageously, is neglected. From hence to Axim the shore takes its course south-south-east, and near the village of Boggio the river Mankaw empties itself into the sea, at the mouth of which the negroes find a considerable quantity of gold. This is all we know of the Ivory Coast; no author having pretended to give a description of their towns, or an exact chart of the topography and distances of places<sup>m</sup>. To this we shall subjoin all that can be extracted out of voyagers, of the produce and manners of the people and country in general, nothing at all being known of their laws and policy. c

country.

EVERY country within the limits of the Ivory Coast is fruitful in rice, pease, beans, gooseberries, citrons, oranges, and coco-nuts; and the natives bring frequently on board large rich sugar-canes; which intimates, that this commodity might be cultivated to advantage here. In a word, the Ivory Coast is one of the finest divisions of Guinea; the prospect of the mountains, and vallies filled with villages, is delightful, most of those little towns being surrounded with lofty palms and coco trees. The soil of the high land is a reddish earth, which, with the perpetual verdure of the trees, forms an agreeable mixture of colours. Cotton and indigo are the spontaneous growth of the provinces of Great Drevin and St. Andrew, which are indeed the richest of the whole. Palm wine and oil are plentiful; together with a species of fruit, growing on a sort of palm tree, which the natives call Tombo, or Bourbon. This the negroes eat with great pleasure, drinking at the same time a wine, drawn from the same tree, mixed with water; its strength rendering it unfit for use alone and unqualified. d

ALL sorts of tame animals, sheep, cows, goats, and hogs, are so numerous, that they are sold for almost nothing; a few shillings being sufficient to keep a whole family in beef, mutton, and pork for several days. As to fish, the coast supplies them in as great abundance and variety; but the most remarkable are the sea bull; zingana, in America called pantonsbir; and the sea devil, so termed by Des Marchais. The first, called also the horned fish, is about three feet long, exclusive of his tail. His body is square, of an unequal thickness at both extremities, being every-where about five feet in circumference. His skin is rough, strong, and filled with pointed nobs, but not prickly or covered with shells, every-where spotted with different colours, a mixture of grey, violet, and white. The head resembles that of a hog, but terminating in a proboscis, like an elephant; the animal having no other passage for his aliment than through his trunk. In his stomach nothing besides sea-weeds and some small fishes was found. His eyes are large, and fringed with a kind of strong, hard hair, and his forehead armed with two horns, bony, strong, rough, and pointed at the extremity, about six inches in length. On his back rose two excrescences, about three inches high, which run from the base of the horns almost to the tail. The tail seemed to be composed of two parts, the one fleshy, and covered with a continuation of the skin of the body, being in fact a part of the vertebræ of the back, but more flatted and pliant; the other a thick fin, of a brown colour, streaked with parallel white lines, serving for a kind of defence, as well as a rudder to the animal. e f g

- a As to the zingana, it is a voracious animal, with a flat head, large, red, and fiery eyes, two rows of strong teeth, the body round, and terminating in a strong tail, covered with a tough skin, not scaly but spotted. The fins are strong, and assist the animal to dart with incredible rapidity at his prey. Nothing comes amiss to the voracious appetite of this monster; but above all it is delighted with human flesh.

- b THE third monster described by Des Marchais is the sea devil, about twenty-five feet long, and proportionably thick. The most remarkable parts of this animal are, projecting angles from his body, of a hard, horny substance, and so sharp, that a stroke of them is extremely dangerous. The tail, which is long, and taper like a whip, is armed with a sharp, keen point, with which he frequently darts backward; and his back covered with hard excrescences, two inches high, and pointed like a hook. The head is large, joined immediately to the body, without the smallest appearance of a neck, and furnished with flat, cutting teeth. Nature has bestowed on this monster four eyes, two near the gills, large and round, and two others on the forehead, of a smaller size; but all of them distinct. On each side the gullet are three horns, of an equal length and thickness. That on the right side, which stands between the other two, measures about three feet in length, and an inch and a half in circumference at its insertion, terminating gradually in a sharp point; but as it is yielding and flexible, it is capable of giving but little offence, or affording any protection to the animal. To conclude, the flesh is tough and ill-tasted, though eagerly sought after by the negroes, perhaps for no other reason than that it is scarce.

- c As to the people, they are rather above the common stature, clean limbed, and well proportioned; but their features on the first glance are hideous; yet, notwithstanding the prejudices conceived from their unhappy aspect, Villault and Des Marchais agree in calling them the most rational, civilized, and polished people in all Guiney, and the same character they bear among all their neighbours. The reader must observe, that we speak of the natives of the Quaqua Coast; that is, from the river Drewin to Cape Apollonia; for as to the others, all authors represent them as the most barbarous, cruel, and savage of all nations. "However savage the aspect and external appearance of the negroes of this coast (speaking of the Quaqua Coast) may appear, they are," says Barbot, "gentle in their nature, honest in their dealings, sociable, and well disposed:" a picture the very reverse of what Smith has drawn. This writer calls them so brutal and thieving as not to be paralleled by any people on the face of the globe. If they see any thing on board a ship, which they have no opportunity of stealing, they will beg it; and, if it be denied them, they fly into a rage, swim ashore, and put a stop to all trade. Smith would not venture to send his boat on shore for provisions, but with an armed crew, and after he had cast anchor so near the shore that his cannon could cover the men. From descriptions so different we must either conclude, that these two writers mean different nations, or that Smith met with some accident that prejudiced him against the whole people. Villault, forgetting what he affirms a little before, or speaking of a different people, accuses them of eating the Europeans; adding, in proof of this assertion, that in the space of a few years they had eaten about fourteen Dutchmen: a fact greatly to be doubted, according to Snoeck; and, if true, applicable only to the natives to the westward, near Cape Palmas. Villault farther asserts, that they constantly seize upon all the white men, who wood and water on their coast, without any provocation, and merely from a brutal fondness for human flesh: however, says he, happily, no nation on the coast has such a dread of fire-arms. Smith calls them an accursed race of cannibals. The same prejudices, according to him, have been unjustly conceived against some other nations of Guiney, for eating monkeys, dogs, and alligators; but this alone deserves the appellation of savage, from that diabolical lust they have after mens flesh: whereas Des Marchais, after enlarging upon the humanity and refinedness of their manners, subjoins, This people drink a sort of beer, called pito, and wine drawn from the Bourbon palm, with which they mix water, to prevent the effects of its intoxicating quality. Drunkenness is a crime of so odious a nature among them, that the laws have prohibited it under the severest penalties, and on pain of death. Their maxim is, that to destroy one's health or reason, is to put man upon a level with brute creatures, to prejudice society, by robbing it of its useful members, and to destroy the effects of all law and government; for a man void of reason cannot be influenced by laws, as he is ignorant of the propriety of his actions.

- g THEIR diet, according to Atkins, is coarse and indelicate; their best dishes being what is called slabber sauce, a term probably given by the English, bomini, and a kind of black soup. The first is composed of rice, fish, fowl, kid, and elephant's flesh, all of them kept till they stink; and this haches, boiled with ochre (F) and palm oil, is deemed a royal dish. Bomini is made of fish, dried without salt in the sun, the more foetid the better. This they fry with palm oil and rice, and greedily snatch it up with their fingers. As for the black soup, it is a favourite dish all over Guiney, both among Europeans and negroes. The Europeans make it of flesh or fowl, with pepper, vinegar, salt, and some sweet herbs peculiar to the country; but the negroes add fish, ochre, and palm oil.

(F) We are at a loss for our author's meaning here. Surely the natives did not boil the mineral we call ochre with their food, which is now rejected even as a medicine, and could never communicate any degree of flavour to their food. All the argillaceous earths of this kind are equally insipid.

THOSE negroes detest the custom Europeans have of embracing each other, after a long absence, or on parting: this they regard as an unnatural action, and an affront to the fair sex. Their teeth are of the canine kind, and perfectly sharp, from the continual habit of pointing them; but in general they are crooked and irregular. They look upon long nails as a great ornament; and dress their hair into tresses, which they keep separate by a paste of palm oil and a kind of red earth. So fond are they of a quantity of hair, that they borrow large locks from the women, which they add to their own, forming a kind of peruke; and their bodies they anoint every day with the same kind of paste which they apply to their hair. They are continually chewing betel, with the juice of which, mixed with their spittle, they flabber over their neck and chin, imagining, that it gives a fine varnish and beautiful lustre to the skin. Round the small of the leg they wear large rings of iron, some of them, according to Barbot, weighing near sixty pounds; a circumstance almost incredible. They are charmed with the jingling sound of those rings and bells suspended to them, in the multitude of which consist all their grandeur and dignity. In a word, says the same author, they are a people highly disgusting at first sight, from the nature of their features, the manner of their dress, and the beastliness of some of their customs; to which may be added the strong, rank, and foetid effluvia from their bodies, which can never become supportable by habit to an European nose.

THE common people wear only a piece of cloth round the waist, out of decency; but the more opulent sort are covered with a sort of cloak, or surplice, with long sleeves, which they wrap round their shoulders and hangs down below their knee; and by their side they wear a hanger or short sword. As to the women, they cut off their hair, in order that the men may have a superfluous quantity. About Little Drawin the females have the curiosity to come down with their children to the shore, when the Europeans are watering, whom they seem to behold with great satisfaction. Villault says, that setting aside their complexion, which is jet-black, they would pass for beauties in Europe, so regular are their features, and so brilliant their eyes. He had seen above fifty, out of which number there was not one but was tall, slender, genteel, and handsome in the face; in a word, a fine woman; notwithstanding the men are for the most part gross and fat, though well made. Some of the women who wear their hair, adorn it with little plates of pure gold; in making of which there is the greatest emulation among the workmen and goldsmiths. These pieces are sometimes large, but in general thin, small, and of little value; however, some women wear such a number of trinkets, that the whole amounts to a considerable sum. A young and beautiful girl soon gets a husband, who by contract has no power over her jewels, though in other respects his authority is absolute and despotic. Even in this particular he falls upon means to gain a superiority, by denying her money to purchase other necessaries, till she pledges her ornaments with him; and no sooner is he in possession, than he disposes of them to the Europeans. The only dress of the women is a cloth, without any particular form, that falls over the fore part of their bodies, the hinder parts being left intirely naked: and indeed there is hardly a people in the whole coast of Guiney, so primitive and simple in this particular, as the natives of the Ivory Coast, and particularly of Quaqua.

THEIR form of salutation they have in common with all negroes; that of laying hold of the fingers, making them crack, and repeating the word quaqua several times, in a low voice. Here it is a constant rule, that the son follows the profession of his father; the son of a weaver is bred a weaver; that of a smith, a smith; and the same in all other occupations. This regulation is so firmly established, that the whole country, perhaps, does not furnish a single instance to the contrary: a custom that is attended with many inconveniencies, though upon the whole founded on reason, and the supposition that a son has better opportunities of becoming acquainted with his trade under a father than with any other master. Yet, after all, they are exceeding bunglers in the mechanic arts; and Atkins says, that a common door lock is so great a curiosity, as to draw a whole country together to see it; a watch still increases their admiration; and making paper speak, as they express it, is a perfect miracle. If they are sent with a note, and told the contents before, they frequently make the experiment whether the Europeans are deceiving them, in pretending they can interpret the thoughts of an absent person by those crooked characters: this they do by asking the contents when they have read the paper, in a jeering manner, as if they had caught them in a lie; but their surprize is inconceivable, when they are told literally the whole business the note contains; this being an act of which they can form no conception, and that gives them a very advantageous idea of the white men, believing they must necessary have some familiar dæmon, that acts as factor or broker on this occasion.

- a THE grounds of their religion are much the same with what we have related of the Gold Religion-Coast, it being founded wholly upon superstition and ignorance. If they revere their princes and priests, their respect arises less from their esteem of the order, than of the opinion they entertain of the dignity annexed. They are fully persuaded, that magic and sorcery are qualities and powers inseparable from majesty and priesthood. The king of Saka, a country near Cape Labo, passes, in particular, for the greatest magician in the universe. He observes annually a certain mysterious ceremony in honour of the sea, which is the tutelary deity of the kingdom. It begins in December, and continues till April following; during which time he sends, by intervals, some of his courtiers in a canoe to Axim, Sama, Commendo, and some other towns on the Gold Coast, to sacrifice to the ocean a quantity of old rags, b different kinds of stones, and horns filled with powder, with which they blow up the rest of the offering. A priest attends the nobleman, and is in a particular manner entrusted with the care of the ritual ceremony, which he executes by pronouncing certain words, in a low voice, to obtain of the sea a calm and serene summer season, which of consequence will be favourable to commerce and navigation. As soon as the first canoe is returned, he dispatches another, which, going through the same ceremonies, is succeeded by another, and in this manner alternately for the space of four or five months. When the first canoe leaves Korbi Labo, she is instantly followed by the negro factors of that port, who in canoes carry their stuffs and goods to be sold in the very place where the king has made his offering. On their return other merchants and factors follow the second canoe; and thus they go on c sacrificing and trading for the season. Wonderful regularity is observed throughout this religious ceremony; and all the merchants find means to dispose of their stocks. Towards the month of April the sorcerer priest leaves the sea at full liberty to storm, foam, and swell, as it thinks proper; and the merchants, fearing lest the ocean, fatigued with long restraint, may embrace this liberty, make all the haste they can to their several ports.

- WHATEVER judgment authors may think fit to pass on the natives of Quaqua, in point of religion and manners, certain it is, that their extreme regard to trade, and the assiduity with which they cultivate it, are no bad proofs of their understanding and sensible political notions. When they first discover a ship on the coast, they diligently attend to the d actions of the crew; and as soon as they believe their security confirmed by their apparent manners, they crowd on board with all the produce of their country, gold, ivory, provisions, and slaves; although they generally oblige the captain to pass through the ceremony of putting sea water in his eye; firmly persuading themselves, that if he violates this solemn engagement, the sea will punish him with the loss of that organ. On their side, they enter upon no promises; and, for this reason, European seamen are generally on their guard, to prevent sudden attacks or frauds, admitting only a certain number of negroes upon deck at a time. This is Villault's assertion; but Barbot observes, that they voluntarily perform the same ceremonies they require of the European captain, dipping their hands in the water, and letting it drop in their eye: meaning thereby, that they wish the loss of e the eye, if they be guilty of a breach of faith. Atkins relates this obligation with circumstances somewhat different. According to him, the captain presents himself to the chief person in the canoe, who immediately puts one leg on the side of the ship, while the other remains on the gunwall of the canoe. In this posture he takes up as much water as he can hold in the palm of his hand, and throws it in the captain's face, by which he gives the strongest proof possible of his friendship and fidelity; and so attached are they to this superstition, that without it be duly performed they will never enter a ship. It is pretended, that before the natives of the bad country, as it is called, west of Great Drevin, neglected this custom, no people on earth adhered more religiously to their engagements: now they are the most treacherous, base, and perfidious of mankind, owing intirely to the disrepute into f which this ceremony is fallen. It now subsists only in cape Laboe, the river St. Andrew, and cape Apollonia. In other provinces the negroes content themselves with curiously examining the ship, her strength, and the number and countenances of the crew: sometimes they spit a mouthful of sea water into the captain's face, which polite compliment they expect he should return, if his sincerity be unquestionable: but, according to the French writers, if the natives can distinguish the language spoken on board to be French, then they wave all other trial, and flock on board without hesitation.

- THE European factors divert themselves with seeing canoes filled with men crowd round them, every mouth uttering the same sound, quaqua, quaqua. As soon as any of them are hoisted on board, the anxiety of the rest is lively to an extreme; they move their heads and g eyes backward and forward, with the utmost impatience, as if waiting the fate of their companions; and it is with the utmost difficulty they are all prevailed on to come on board. The best method to overcome their fears is the ceremony we have mentioned; but Barbot says, that he has sometimes unsuccessfully tried this. It is probable, that some outrages committed by the European shipping has ever since inspired these timid creatures with that a dread and suspicion of injuries, particularly from the English, says Des Marchais : and indeed this reflection is in some measure confirmed by Smith, who relates, that, stopping at several towns and ports on this coast, and firing cannon as a signal of his arrival, he never could discern a single canoe coming towards him, or the smallest appearance that the natives proposed trading with him. “ It is certain,” says he, “ that they never approach an English vessel, “ without dread of being carried away into slavery :” whence it is probable, that some attempt of this nature has been made. He acknowledges, that they repose the greatest confidence in the French of any European nation : they even allow them to erect a standard on shore ; use the French language in bargains ; and not only trade with them at an easier rate, but also furnish them plentifully with fresh water and all manner of provisions : an acknow- b legement that does great honour to the civilized manners and prudence of that nation, however small the advantage is which they draw from the preference given them.

The timidity of the Qua-quans.

THE negroes of the Quaqua Coast come generally five or six in a canoe along the ship's side ; but it is seldom that above one or two have resolution to come on board, before they have seen in what manner their companions are treated. They most frequently enter the ships two at a time, with a couple of elephants teeth and some other goods ; these returning to the canoe, before the rest leave it. Those who come first narrowly inspect the state of the ship, whether the sailors be armed, and the number there is upon deck. When they have fold their goods they return, and acquaint their friends with the usage they have received.
No intreaties can prevail on them to go below deck, notwithstanding they pretend they c think themselves perfectly secure, and express great curiosity. So much do they dread firearms, that they all flung themselves into the sea upon Smith's firing a gun to bring to a ship
he discovered in the offing : and he observed, that if they discover the least appearance of arms on board, they immediately scud away to the shore, with all the haste they are able.

ONE may easily apprehend the difficulty and tediousness of trading with a nation so ti-morous and jealous ; whose language is unintelligible to Europeans, and all the European languages still more so to them (for what the French say of trading in their language is attested by no other authority). Every thing is transacted by signs and gesticulations, or by placing a certain quantity of merchandize near the ivory or gold that is wanted in exchange. In general the negroes are eagerly fond of presents, however trifling, as if they looked upon d these as pledges of esteem and affection. A knife not worth six-pence, a copper ring, a glass of usquebaugh, or a biscuit, are things which the richest negro thinks worth his acceptance, and on which he sets the highest value. However, as their avarice seems to grow with the liberality of the Europeans, Smith recommends great caution in the manner of making those dashees, or presents. “ It is a pernicious custom,” says that writer, “ which “ had its rise from the policy of the Dutch, who wanted to destroy the credit of the Portu“ guese, and establish their own, by those instances of generosity, for which they have since “ suffered, by the purchase of cargoes bought at double their value. Now every trade must “ be begun by dashees, to be renewed not only by every ship of a nation, but every day by “ the same ship, and by every individual on board. Thus one stroke of Dutch policy has “ ever since been a perpetual tax on all other Europeans, as well as on themselves, and the e “ presents now amount to as much as formerly would purchase a cargo.” The same custom prevails on the Gold Coast ; but with this difference, that there presents are made after a cargo is completed, and goes by the name of dassi-midassi : but on all the lower coasts, to the river Gambia, the negroes must have their dashee in advance : nor do they ever come near a ship, but that is the general cry among them.

Their arts.

THE usual trade carried on here consists of cotton cloths, ivory, gold, and slaves. According to Villault, the negroes manufacture a sort of strong stuff, striped blue and white, three quarters wide, and about four ells long. These sell well on the Gold Coast, and Europeans purchase them purely for this market. From the river Babas to the Rio de Suero f da Costa the country produces great abundance of good cotton, which the negroes of the interior countries manufacture with great industry. The cotton pieces made here are extremely fine and beautiful in the colours, especially the blue stripe, which, says Barbot, cannot be equalled even in France. The maritime negroes act as brokers to the inland negroes, sell their stuffs for them, and receive a certain sum per cent. by way of commission. Some of these brokers told our author, that, besides the trade carried on with the coast, the inland negroes drive a very considerable commerce with a white people that inhabit the very center of Africa, and come hither for cotton cloths with droves of raules or asses, with which they return loaded. They are described as accoutred with short swords or scymitars ; whence, it is probable, they are no other than the Arabians of Zara, on the banks of the Niger. The g Quaqua negroes manufacture a kind of plant, resembling hemp, into a strong cloth, to which they give beautiful colours, and some pretty flowers and designs, that speak them no bad artists in this way. They also have a considerable trade in salt with their inland neighbours, to

- a to whom they sell it at a very extraordinary price, on account of the distance and expence of carriage.

ALL the countries behind Quaqua furnish large store of elephants teeth, the most beautiful ivory in the world. It is constantly bought up as soon as brought to the coast, by the English, Dutch, French, and sometimes by the Danes and Portuguese: but, at the same time that the commerce of this country is free to all nations, the English and Dutch enjoy the greater part of it, and the emulation between these has occasioned the negroes to raise the price of their commodities, without reflecting how they diminish the quantity of the exports by this, and the alteration of fashions in Europe. In such quantities did this country afford ivory, that, in Barbot's days, it was no uncommon thing to see a hundred quintals sold in a day; and the negroes report, that the inlands, especially the mountains, are so stocked with elephants, that the natives are forced for security to bury themselves among rocks and caverns at night. They fall upon every possible contrivance to defend their plantations against the ravages of these sagacious monsters, and frequently lay traps for them, in which they catch a great many: but, if we may credit the relations of the negroes, and indeed the most probable accounts, the great plenty of ivory is owing to the elephant's casting his teeth every third year. This is Des Marchais's account; and Barbot and Villault confirm it by similar testimonies. They add, that, notwithstanding the perpetual war waged against them by the negroes, the elephants are so numerous, that the natives are forced to dig their habitations a great way under ground. However, of late years, their number has been greatly diminished, by a distemper that crept among them, and made terrible havock, as well as by the constant endeavours of the negroes to extirpate them, though the foundation of their commerce.

However, of late years, their number has been greatly diminished, by a distemper that crept among them, and made terrible havock, as well as by the constant endeavours of the negroes to extirpate them, though the foundation of their commerce.

VILLAUT, after wondering how the negroes come by such quantities of pure gold as the women wear for ornament, thinks himself at liberty to conclude, that the country certainly contains mines that furnish virgin native gold: for he supposes the inhabitants incapable of bringing it to that degree of fineness by fire. He says, that, upon repeatedly questioning them where they procured the precious metal, they always cast their eyes towards the mountains; and the natural inference in that case was, that they dug it themselves out of those mountains.

Of gold.

- d THE European commodities, which the negroes accept most readily in exchange for their own, are of much the same nature as in other parts of Guinea; with this difference, that here the bracelets and rings for the legs, whether of copper or iron, must be of an intolerable weight. Barbot advises, that small ships be only sent on this trade, the number of places to be called at rendering the heaving large anchors extremely tedious and troublesome; besides, the negroes come more readily on board, when they see no great preparations, or a number of cannon mounted, and decks crowded with sailors. But then the utmost caution is necessary against treachery, and not above a certain number of negroes to be admitted on board at a time. The sufferings of the Portuguese furnish examples of the necessity of keeping a strict watch. To conclude this short account of the Ivory Coast, we will observe, that although it be divided into a variety of petty states and kingdoms, yet they have scarce any separate interests; for among themselves war happens seldom, and, of consequence, the slave trade here bears but a small proportion to that traffick on the Gold and Slave Coasts.

- f AUTHORS have observed, that the Exomphalus Hernia umbilicalis, or preternatural tumour of the abdomen at the navel from a rupture, is a disorder extremely common on the Ivory Coast; but how to account for its frequency we are at a loss. All other deformities of the body are as rare as this is common; and out of an infinity of negroes which Barbot had conversed with, he never saw but two who had any reason to complain that nature was unkind; one of whom squinted, and the other was born without a nose. These are all the particulars we have been able to cull out of authors concerning the Ivory Coast. If the reader should find them less full and entertaining than he might expect, he will attribute it to the little acquaintance which Europeans have with these negroes, with whom they only converse on board ships; seldom or never going on shore, but to wood and water, and never venturing upon any kind of land tour<sup>a</sup>. They have, from two or three accidents, conceived such prejudices against the natives, that, till these are removed, we can never expect any distinct relation of the produce of the country, civil or political laws, manners, religion, or customs of the people.

Containing the geography of the Grain or Malaguetta Coast; a description of its towns, climate, natural produce, and trade; of the manners of the natives, their language, religion, and government; together with a description of the country round the river Sestos, of its inhabitants, &c.

*Of the name
and geography of the Grain Coast.*

AUTHORS are greatly divided both about the name and the limits of this coast. <sup>a</sup> Lemery and Prevost are of opinion, that the French term for Guiney pepper is derived from Melega, a town of Africa: but how or in what manner this commodity was imported into France they do not inform us; so that no inference can be fairly drawn from their assertion, admitting it to be true<sup>a</sup>. Villault, Barbot, Smith, and Des Marchais, think, with more reason, that the Europeans gave this coast its appellation, from observing, that it produced this species of pepper in greater abundance than any other part of Guiney; and we think it no weak proof of their conjecture, that the names of all the other coasts were imposed from the chief commodities they afford. The Slave Coast, for instance, is so called from its furnishing a greater number of slaves than any other country; the Gold Coast, from <sup>b</sup> the abundance of that metal found here; and the Ivory Coast, from the prodigious cargoes of elephants teeth bought up every year by the Europeans. It is true, that all these divisions produce much the same commodities; but as some particular species of merchandize was the staple or prevailing traffick of the country, so from thence it took its name, and is characterized. But, waving all such useless and dry disquisitions, we proceed to lay down its extent and geography.

STRICTLY speaking, the Grain Coast is contained between the Rio Sestos and Grova, a village two or three miles west of Cape Palmas, extending for a space of fifty-five miles along the shore. Villault says, that it begins at the river Sanguin, and stretches to Cape Palmas, which enlarges its limits to about sixty miles. Within those frontiers are the towns and villages of Sestos or Sestro, west of the river Sanguin, Bottowa or Battaway, Seno, Sestro Krou <sup>c</sup> or Kro, Wappo, Bado, Great Sestro, Little Sestro, Goyava, Garraway, and Grova, which last properly belongs to the Ivory Coast, with a number of intermediate towns and villages, whose names are not mentioned by voyagers<sup>b</sup>. As we do not find all these places described by any authors, the reader must rest satisfied with the imperfect accounts they afford. Little Sestos stands about four leagues east of the river of that name, a space that is occupied by a ridge of rocky mountains, or rather one long extended height. The negroes of this place fish and trade, free of all customs to their princes and governors, which is all that is known of their history. About three leagues farther east is the village Sanguin, at the mouth of a river of that name, that discharges itself in the sea south-south-east, and capable of being navigated for twelve miles up by small vessels, notwithstanding the chanel <sup>d</sup> is narrow, and bordered by lofty trees, that cast a shade all over the water. This town contains about an hundred houses; and formerly the English had a settlement here, which the bad disposition of the natives forced them to relinquish. The king of this district is subject to the sovereign of Sestos. He is usually dressed in a blue robe, after the Moorish fashion, and takes great pleasure in visiting the European shipping in the road. Formerly the Portuguese and Dutch drove a great trade here; but the prodigious offers of white merchants at length so raised the price of pepper and ivory, that the market sunk, and is now in a very declining condition. Upon emergencies this is a convenient port to wood and water at, and also to take in provisions, which are rather plenty than good of the kind. <sup>e</sup> About a mile eastward stands Baffa, or Bofo, a neat village, where abundance of ivory is kept in readiness for the first shipping that calls; nor is it deficient in pepper. It is easily distinguished by a long sandy point, surrounded with rocks, that project into the sea. The language they speak is a corrupted Portuguese, or rather a mixed language, or a kind of Lingua Franca. Next stands Setuna, two miles from Baffa to the eastward, a village that trades largely in pepper and ivory. A mile farther Battaway presents itself, and is easily known at sea, by two large rocks, that stand two miles from shore to the westward, and also by some high mountains behind the town. This is one of the best built places on the coast; populous and rich; but the natives much addicted to thieving. It trades extensively in the above commodities; but is greatly exceeded by Sino, a town four miles to

- a the east. This latter place is richly stocked with pepper, which the negroes greedily exchange for plates of copper, bars of iron, perpetuanas, and some other European commodities. They readily come on board any shipping they discover in the road; but, like their neighbours at Battaway, are such expert thieves as to require a strict eye over them. Six miles east from Sino stands Sestre Krou, a pleasant, large town, plainly distinguished at sea by a Sestre Krou. high cape, formed by three black hills, the west sides of which are covered with wood. Wappo, situated upon a small river, stands five miles from Sestre Krou. Here as well as at Wappo. Sestre Krou the elephants teeth are large and white, and the pepper in the greatest plenty and perfection. Between Wappo and Great Sestro stand two large villages, called Drova Dru and Nisso; each producing such quantities of pepper, that, for a bar of iron, Barbot
- b purchased three hundred pounds weight. The natives of these villages, and all the country round Wappo, are more civilized, gentle, and tractable in their disposition, than any other on this coast; but extremely covetous of dashees, or presents, before they enter upon the most trifling bargains. Their language is almost unintelligible to their nearest neighbours; but seems more articulate and soft than most of the others. From Wappo to Sestro Paris, or Great Sestro, on the river Escravos, the coast runs strait south and south-east. This large, handsome, and populous town, stands close upon the river, which is about a quarter of a mile broad at the town, but narrower at the entrance, where it is divided by two islands, some say one, which renders the navigation troublesome, and only practicable to small vessels. The town received the name of Sestro Paris from the Dieppers, who had a fac-
- c tory here; because it was the largest and best inhabited town within the frontiers of the Grain Coast (A). The houses are built after a different model from those of the other towns; for here they raise them, either square or round, four feet from the ground, ascending by a flight of steps to the door. At this height stands the first story, which is reserved as a chief apartment to eat, drink, or sleep in. It is lined with mats, made of the bark of trees, and in the middle is a chimney, where, in cold weather, they burn charcoal, and dress the victuals of the family; besides which it serves the farther purpose of drying their rice and Indian corn fit to grind. The second story, that runs up in a pyramidical form, is used as a store or lumber room, and is generally thirty feet high; which gives the town a very beautiful look, hundreds of spires raising themselves into the skies within so small a distance
- d of each other. Such are the conveniencies of private families: besides which, the town has a palaaver room, or council-chamber, where the chief men sit to deliberate on public affairs. This is a large apartment, raised high from the ground, and in the middle a kind of stage or orchestra erected, where those sages debate the affairs of society. Here the king and meanest slave drink and smoke without distinction of persons, as soon as business is ended; for with that the sovereign lays aside all the badges of majesty, and reduces himself to a private station. Here likewise it is usual to assort and value merchandize; and this, indeed, constitutes the chief part of the national business.

- The last place we meet with on the Grain Coast is Grova; though, strictly speaking, it belongs to the Ivory Coast, if we reckon the eastern frontier of the Grain Coast from Cape Palmas, so called from the great number of those trees with which it is covered.

- To give the reader the best idea of this division which our scanty materials will admit of, we shall observe, that the continual exhalations raised by the action of the sun from the rivers and sea-coast, are supposed to occasion certain inflammatory disorders, and malignant putrid fevers, almost always fatal to Europeans. This noxious disposition of the air prevails in a very high degree at Cape Palmas, and is sensibly felt at the distance of several miles from shore; an intolerable stink blowing off the land in the evening, when the north-east winds set in.

- The productions of the earth are pease, beans, gourds, lemons, oranges, bananas, and a kind of nut with an exceeding thick shell, a most delicious fruit, for which neither the natives or Europeans have a name. The palm wine and dates of this country are in the greatest perfection of, perhaps, any part of the globe. Cows, hogs, sheep, and goats, are also in great plenty; but what constitutes the chief wealth of the Grain Coast, is the abundance of Guiney pepper it produces; which draws a great trade, not only with all the neighbouring interior nations, but with the Europeans also. According to Barbot, it is called by the negroes of Sestos by the name of waizinzag, and by those of Cape Palmas, emanegbeta. The plant on which this elegant production grows differs in size, according to the nature of the soil and other circumstances: in general it shoots out to the height of a shrub, attaching itself, like ivy, to some neighbouring tree. What grows upon the plant thus supported

(A) From the name, as well as many other vestiges to be met with in the place, Des Marchais concludes, that no doubt can arise of the French having been the first Europeans who touched here. Many of the customs of the negroes plainly confirm it; and to this day, says he, they preserve their affection for their old friends, notwithstanding the Dieppers first settled here in the year 1336 (1).

is of a finer flavour, more pungent and hot to the taste than what grows wild in the fields, and spreads to a great extent. The leaf is twice as long as broad, pointed, soft, and of a delicate smell in the rainy season, soon after which it fades, and loses all its beauty and flavour. Bruised between the fingers, the leaf and buds have an agreeable aromatic flavour, like that of a clove. Under the leaves, and indeed along the stalk, are small filaments, by which it joins itself to the nearest tree; but its flower cannot be described, as it buds in those seasons when no commerce is carried on with the coast: however, it is certain that it does flower, the fruit succeeding in the form of angular figs, of various sizes; according to the quality of the air and soil. It is covered by a rind, which the negroes believe to be poisonous, and is no other than a thin film, that soon dries and crumbles. Such is the description of this fruit given by Des Marchais, which differs in nothing material from what is related by Barbot. At Rio Sestos the fruit is large, and the plant so tall, spreading, and thick, that at the first view it resembles a wood.

Of the trade.

BOSMAN affirms, that, besides the Guiney pepper, this country produces another species of fruit, extremely like cardamoms both in taste and figure, and, in effect, the same in quality: adding, that in the interior countries there is found a species of pepper differing in nothing from that of the spice islands and Moluccas. This is the pimento, of which we have already spoken: sufficient it is that we add some particulars regarding its abundance and cheapness here. The Dutch purchase it in great quantities; probably to prevent its interfering with their East India trade, in consequence of an agreement between the East and West India companies: they freight whole ships with it; and we have been credibly informed, that a fleet of five or six sail have left the coast, with little or none other merchandize on board. At present, however, this trade is greatly on the decline, their Molucca spices being so well established, as to their credit, that such artifices are thought unnecessary. Their example has been followed by other nations; though we are told the English still preserve some part of their former spice trade. Now the chief commerce of the Grain Coast consists in ivory and slaves. Marmol relates, that before the arrival of the Portuguese on the coast of Africa, the merchants of Barbary used to traverse the continent, and trade largely with the Grain Coast in Guiney pepper; exporting it again to Italy, and all the southern parts of Europe.

Of the manners of the natives.

THE natives of this division are guilty of no excesses in eating or drinking, or indeed of intemperance in any kind of luxury. They admit the Europeans into all familiarities with their women; and even invite them to love banquets with their own wives and daughters; nay, some of them prostitute their wives to their own children; and when reproached by the Europeans for such a trespass upon decency, and the law of nature, they smile and call it a trifle. One quality they have in common with all negroes, which is a propensity to steal whatever they come near, especially from strangers and foreigners, though they never omit the opportunity whoever the person be. Sons will steal from their fathers, and they again purloin from their children; even the things they may have for asking or commanding, they chuse to possess themselves of by dint of genius and address. If they are received on board of a ship, nothing comes amiss; they steal the heads of old rusty nails, rather than go away empty handed; yet are they clamorous for presents or dashees.

Of the language.

THE language of this people is so difficult and peculiar in the idiom, that it is not only utterly unintelligible to Europeans, but to the nearest neighbouring nations, none of whom are able to act as interpreters. All trade is carried on by signs and tokens, not the most decent; the Europeans are forced to make love to the negro women by tokens, which, with the assistance of a lively imagination, they soon make shift to comprehend. In general they are well shaped, and handsome in their persons and features. The common dress is a paan, or unshaped piece of cloth round the waist. They are extremely subject to scrotal hernias and ruptures, but for what reason cannot so easily be determined, without a more thorough acquaintance with their manners; and Barbot has seen them of so extraordinary a kind, that the scrotum hung down as low as the knees. When any of them chances to travel out of his own little district, and is met by a stranger, they mutually embrace, pressing each others shoulders closely, and pronouncing the word towa. Then they begin and rub each others arms up to the elbow, still repeating towa; after which they apply to each others fingers, which they crack, and finish their extraordinary salutation, with crying out enfanemate, enfaneemate! that is, my dear friend, how do you?

THEY have some excellent mechanics among them; particularly smiths, who perfectly understand the art of tempering steel and other metals, and making arms, and all steel instruments, to the highest proof; nor are they deficient in shipwrights, who build their canoes of different sizes, upon certain regular principles. Experience hath taught them many useful improvements in husbandry, particularly in respect to the means of cultivating a rice, millet, and Guiney pepper; the chief instruments of their subsistence and trade. Their Of their Taba, Taba seyle, or as others call him, Tabo seil, or king, exerts an arbitrary power and government.

 despotic authority over his subjects, and never appears abroad but with the utmost pomp and magnificence. His people raise his power by certain implicit sentiments of a natural submission, and that awe, with which they would regard a superior Being. Their ignorance attaches them to paganism; but natural reason dictates a future state, as appears by the ceremonies performed to the souls of the deceased, which they pray they may meet happy in another world. They welcome the new moon with songs, dancing, and diversions of every kind; and their superstitious regard for forcerers is extreme.

- As the country round the river Sestos has been more accurately examined by Europeans than Of the country
 b the Grain Coast, we shall extract whatever we can find in authors deserving notice. Phillips lying round the seems to have taken great pains in sounding the depths of all the different bays, creeks, and river Sestos.
 branches, towards the mouth of the river, and as far up as shipping of any burthen can enter; concluding, with Des Marchais, that the anchorage is every where good and secure, but that the sea is rough, and the currents strong towards the south-east and north-west of the chanel. It is besides blocked up by blind rocks, covered with six feet water, and two that raise their tops in sight, which is the principal reason why this navigation is dangerous to shipping, but safe enough to small craft and light vessels. The true chanel is between that rock, standing in the middle of the largest eastern branch; here the breadth is half a cable over, and the depth thirty-seven fathoms, beyond which the river is broad and beauc tiful, where ships of an hundred tons may anchor securely; within a cannon shot are some springs of excellent fresh water, from which the women of the country supply ships with any quantity, while their husbands are hewing down wood for the same purpose. The river has its source high up the country; but whence is not ascertained; however, some voyagers affirm, that barks and small craft can penetrate above twenty-five miles; after which it is filled with rocks and flats, which render it impassable, only by canoes. All its banks are adorned with fine trees, richly planted with villages, and refreshed with cooling streams of fresh water, that tumble down from the higher grounds and fall into the river.
 All the country on both sides is fertile, wild fowl are abundant, and rice and millet the common sustenance of the inhabitants; these, together with ivory and Guiney pepper, form d the staple commodities of trade. But with all the wealth of this beautiful country, the climate is extremely unhealthy to strangers, and usually subjects them to dangerous and long diseases, many of their acute fevers terminating in some chronical distemper. Here is found a beautiful kind of flint or pebble, more transparent than agate, hard as a diamond, and almost equal in lustre when well cut. At the distance of an hundred paces from the mouth of the river stands a negro town, consisting of above an hundred houses, neat, well built, and commodious; which may be seen at sea three miles from land. Des Marchais describes two other towns, a little above, of almost equal dimensions, and separated by a pond of fine clear fresh water. The first of these stands on a peninsula, that helps to form the bay towards the entrance of the river, and is the principal seat of commerce.
 e BARBOT, who visited the king of this country in the year 1687, describes the seat where the monarch resided, as a little town of thirty or forty houses, on the banks of a pleasant rivulet, built with mud, and surrounded by an earthen rampart. Every house is at least one story above the ground floor, some three, and all of them whitened with a lime made from calcined shells. Their floors are made with rough beams, or branches of palm, laid close to each other, which renders it difficult to walk across the chamber without stumbling;
 and the roof composed of the same materials, covered over with banana and palm leaves.
 In the council chamber, Barbot was surprized to see cut out in basso relievo the figure of a woman, holding an infant in her arms, about three feet in length. On each side of the block of wood were cut out little platters to hold meat and drink for the fetiche; for such f it appeared to be. In this chamber, and before this idol, it was that the negroes performed all oaths, binding them to the execution of any contract or promise.

g This prince's name was Bafaw, or Peter, a man of an agreeable aspect, soft disposition, but of a weak judgment, bordering upon folly. Of this I had sufficient experience, says our author, during my residence, as he never parted an hour from me during my stay here.
 He adds, that the town has hardly any other inhabitants besides the women, children, court, and slaves of the king. He had thirty women, wives and concubines, but the author had only seen six, one of which was beautiful to an extreme, though advanced in years. Her arms, legs, and other parts of the body, were marked with the figures of birds and beasts, seared on the skin with a hot iron, and at a little distance appearing to be in bas-relief; an ornament that is reckoned strikingly beautiful in this country. The king and all his children wear a cap made of the twigs of osier, the only badge which distinguishes them from their subjects; for, in other respects, the children labour in the same vocations and employments as the meanest negro. When Barbot at any time made a trip of pleasure on the water, he was always attended by some of those young princes, who performed the office of watermen, and rowed the canoe. Both Barbot and Des Marchais remark, that although his power was absolute, capital punishments were rare, as the king found it more his interest to sell the criminals as slaves; and indeed this was partly owing to the clemency of his nature, and the good disposition of his subjects, who were seldom guilty of crimes of so heinous a nature, but constantly employed in the domestic cares of their families, or in trade and fishing.

It is the observation of the last-mentioned writer, that the negroes of Sestos, are the most obliging and civil that he had ever met with; a glass of brandy being a sufficient inducement or reward for the most important services; but whether we are to ascribe their civility to their love of brandy, or their natural disposition, is what can only be determined by trying what good offices they will do for a stranger, without any reward or expectation. They are rather of a tall stature, well made, robust, and of a martial air; their courage corresponding with their aspect, as appears by their frequent incursions into neighbouring inland countries, in quest of slaves. Very few merchants, or rather factors, reside here; for the perpetual state of hostility in which they live with their neighbours breaks off all commercial intercourse, and renders gold but little known in Sestos.

THE sole employment of many of the negroes of this country is fishing, and every morning presents large fleets of canoes ranged along the shore, upon this business. Their common method of fishing is by a hand line and hook, which they seldom draw empty out of the water.

WHILE Snoeck staid in the country, he heard no mention nor saw any appearances of war, except with a neighbouring nation, that had entered the country and burnt some villages. This occasion was, however, sufficient to confirm the relations of former authors concerning their warlike disposition; for they attacked and drove the enemy, though superior in number, before them, slew a great many, and made a multitude of prisoners; which they sold to Snoeck and other European merchants.

DES MARCHAIS relates, that the natives of Sestos never wear any covering on their head, or hardly on any part of their bodies, in the most scorching seasons of the year, and heaviest rains. In this particular they surpass all the nations of Guiney; neither men nor women wearing any more than a small rag before to cover their nakedness. Nor is their diet less simple than their dress, their chief nourishment being from vegetables, notwithstanding they breed great quantities of cattle and fowls, in order to supply the shipping that touch on the coast. He adds, that from the French they borrowed the custom of taking Christian appellatives, such as John, Thomas, Paul, James, &c. though it is restrained to their captains and leaders, being given to them as a distinguishing name. If an European has engaged their affections either by his virtues or vices, they request leave to bestow his name on their children, and granting their petition is esteemed the highest favour; and for a century together those names have been found hereditary in their families, descending regularly from father to son. Their method of saluting differs but little from that which we have mentioned is practised among the surrounding nations, and other people on the Grain Coast.

They have but few ceremonies previous to marriage; indeed, the only material one is a sum paid to the parents, after which the lover may carry off his mistress when he pleases: he drinks a few bottles of spirits with the relations, and then conducts the bride to his hut, where she is received by other women, who prepare every thing for celebrating a wedding. The night she passes with her husband; after which all distinction ceases, and she goes to labour with the rest of the women, receiving the honour of her husband's embraces in her turn, or at his pleasure. Such wives as bring their husbands the first child, and confer upon them the honourable title of father, have peculiar privileges ever after; they are the favourites of their spouses, and the chief persons in the family, which is intirely directed by them; yet in the end this felicity costs them dear, for they are buried alive with them, if they happen to die first. The captain or chief of the village, dying either a natural death, or of the consequences of a debauch in drinking strong spirits, immediately his wives set up loud lamentations, that warn the whole neighbourhood of the event; upon which all the other women in the place flock to the house to mingle their howlings with those furies. The favourite distinguishes herself by the violence of her plaints, which are perhaps the only sincere expressions among the whole, as she alone has cause. The parents of the deceased come and condole with the widow, and bid her the last farewell; the marbuts examine the body, and declare it fully and naturally dead; then, after washing, they anoint it, assisted by other priests, with a kind of fat or grease, from the head to the feet; in which condition it is placed on a mat in the middle of the house. All the women take their seats round the corpse, and the favourite places herself with a good grace at the head, as the post of honour; the stranger females making another circle round the former. They endeavour to rival each other in the violence of the hoarseness or shrillness of their cries, and the mad

a fury with which they tear their hair. All of a sudden, a pause of silence interrupts this dismal noise, and the virtues and the noble actions of the deceased are recited by one of them, by way of interlude; after which they resume their cries with redoubled vehemence. After this infernal music has continued for the space of two hours, a couple of stout negroes, without speaking a word, enter the chamber, and laying the body upon a litter composed of the branches of trees, they carry it away on their shoulders, running through the town, and counterfeiting despair and drunkenness, with gestures so highly ridiculous, as cannot be equalled but by the women from whom they have taken the corpse. This absurd circuit being performed in the space of an hour, the body is taken down from the litter, and laid upon the ground where it is to be deposited, when the cries of the women again begin.

b WHILE this howling employs the company present, the marbut is busied in digging a grave large enough for the two bodies. He kills a goat, sprinkles the grave with the blood, and makes an elegant repast of the entrails, part of which he gives to the favourite widow, now to become a sacrifice to her husband's affections. At length, when the marbut thinks it time to close the ceremony, he takes her by both arms, and delivers her to two negroes, who lay hold of her in a rude disrespectful manner, and tie her hands behind. In this situation they throw her on her back, lay a plank along her breast, upon which they mount one behind another, and crush her almost to death; after this they throw her half alive into the same grave with her husband, and immediately fill it up with earth and stones, all the spectators standing rather in a stupid admiration at the spectacle, than filled with that horror which might naturally be supposed to take place in the human breast. During the whole of this barbarous transaction, a profound silence reigns through the whole assembly; and as soon as it is concluded, every one departs with the same tranquillity as if nothing extraordinary had happened.

TRAVELLERS inform us, that though there are ingenious workmen in iron and metals in every part of the Grain Coast, yet that at Sestos they are peculiarly expert, having first learnt the art from the French, and since greatly improved it; insomuch that in tempering steel they greatly exceed any European nation. Of their artists.

c THE Portuguese were the first who dispossessed the French of their trade here, as well as in other parts of Guinea (if they really ever had the trade which their historians assert). For a number of years they exercised a despotic authority over the poor natives; but the great advantages they have derived from this commerce, having excited the emulation of the English and Dutch in 1664, their power began to give way to the more warlike and commercial spirit of these rivals. They lost gradually all their settlements, and being forced to retire into the interior countries, they resolved, as the last effort, to unite themselves with the natives by marriage; whence sprung that mixed progeny of mulattoes, more numerous here than in any part of Guinea. From policy, and perhaps from natural national affection, the Portuguese entrust them with the care of the small remnant of trade they now have, give them the appellation of phidalgos or gentlemen, reconcile them to the church of Christ, nay even admit them into holy orders, and render them useful in propagating Christianity and the gospel. Of the Portuguese mulattoes.

THESE African Portuguese have established an extensive power in many parts of Africa; their complexion and alliances gaining them every where the liberty of commerce. They have penetrated into the interior countries, north of the kingdoms of Gago, Benin, Mandingo, and the remotest parts of Ethiopia, superior and inferior. Those settled on the banks of the rivers Sierra Leona, Sestos, and Sanguin, carry on a trade with the rivers Gambia, Kasamansa, Rio St. Domingo, and Rio Grande. It is certain, that the many advantages those mulattoes enjoy, and especially the credit they have with the negroes, would put them in a condition of driving perhaps the richest commerce in the world, if they were regularly supplied with European commodities and merchandize.

f THE ships employed in the slave trade touch at Sestos to take in rice, which they buy at the rate of two shillings per quintal in exchange. The European merchants send to the council room of Palaaver their merchandize, such as copper vessels, lead, and powder, which they exchange for goats, fowls, and other provisions. Half an ounce of powder will more than purchase a fine fowl, nay often a goat, and other things are bought at an equally reasonable price.

g WE cannot resist transcribing, from Barbot, an account of two extraordinary personages he met with at Sestos, though it does by no means relate to the general idea of the country we intended to convey. One of these men was of a large robust stature, his complexion almost white, but chequered all over with small black spots, that made him resemble a tiger. The complexion of the other was, on the contrary, a black ground spotted with white; but what rendered him still more curious was, that his whole life had been consumed without scarcely stirring out of the same place, and employed solely in smoking tobacco. His scrotum was of an incredible size, and the penis intirely sunk in its immensity. Barbot was shewn the small passage through which he made urine, and he compares it to the juice passing through the prominence on the small end of a lemon; so diminished in comparison was the penis. He imagines, that, besides hernias, these two men had been afflicted with leprosy from their birth, notwithstanding they felt no inconveniency from the discolouration of their skin, and discovered no other symptoms of this disease*. It is certain, that leprosy is so frequent in the country, as to countenance in some measure his conjecture; but then it appears with far more malignant and fatal symptoms; and Barbot seems in another place to be of opinion, that the natives did not believe them infected, as they conversed familiarly with them; whereas they cautiously avoid the least communication with persons suspected of the smallest taint of the infection. It is probable, indeed, that their complexions were a kind of lusus naturæ, a variety in which nature sometimes delights, arising from some slight cause impervious to human reason. a

THIS is all we know of their manners; and how travellers come to know so much, we are at a loss to conjecture; as they all profess themselves ignorant of the language, and little conversant with the people: but we have ventured to relate these particulars on the faith of writers, in some degree of repute for integrity and intelligence. To conclude our account of this coast, of which we know so little, we shall observe, that the months most favourable to trade, are February, March, and April; that small vessels are more convenient than large ships, on account of entering the rivers and sailing up the country; and lastly, that the south-south-east winds begin to blow in the month of May, bringing constantly along with them heavy rains and tornadoes, extremely dangerous to shipping, with thunder and lightening that is terrible. b

Containing a geographical description of the country of Sierra Leona; the rivers Scherbro and Sierra Leona, with the trade carried on by means of them; the government, religion, dress, language, and customs of the natives; with a short account of the kingdom of Bolm; and several other particulars.

Geographical
description of Sierra Leona.

THE next country we come to is Sierra Leona, a name given to some of the mountains on this coast by the Portuguese, on account of the great number of lions bred there. Others derive this name from the terrible noise made by the beating of the sea against the shore, which they have compared to the roaring of a lion, with what propriety we cannot say. The Moors call this division Bulombel, signifying a great country; and indeed, in its largest extent, it seems to merit the appellation. Geographers, however, are not at all unanimous about its precise boundaries, though the most distinct limits, as laid down by Roberts, in his Atlas Geographique, are from the Grain Coast on the south-east, to Cape Verga, or as Labat calls it, Cape Vega, on the north-west; comprehending within these frontiers an infinity of different kingdoms and states, of which we know not so much as the names. Labat again extends the Grain Coast to the river Scherbro, which he calls the south-east frontiers of Sierra Leona, and Cape Verga the north-east. Other writers still reduce these limits, and confine the country strictly called Sierra Leona, between the Capes Ledo, or Tagrim, and Verga, these two promontories forming that spacious bay into which the river Scherbro discharges itself. Towards the inland, its limits are uncertain; though Barbot has ventured to affirm, that the lake Combuegudi and the great kingdom of Mandingo form the northern frontiers, by this means comprehending under the division of Sierra Leona, a tract of country altogether prodigious*. d

Of the river
Scherbro.

THE great river Scherbro, which by some writers is called Madre Bomba, by others Rio Selboba, and by others Rio das Palmas, separates the country called Sestos from that region strictly called Sierra Leona; having its source a prodigious way up in the superior Ethiopia, and emptying itself in the sea on the frontiers of Bolm Monu, or Monow, forming there a great number of large marshes. Large ships go up as far as Bagos, twenty five miles from the mouth of the river, where the English formerly had a factory, and vessels of sixty and eighty tons burthen as far as Kedham, above two hundred miles from the sea, and indeed to the borders of the kingdom of Mandingo; whence it is probable, that the Scherbro is a branch either from the river Gambia, out of the lake Sapor, or from the river Senegal, both of them stretching eastward at right angles to it. As you penetrate above Kedham, the chanel grows gradually narrower, and in many places would seem to be blocked up by the branches of large trees crossing it; otherwise, in the months of April and May, during the rainy seasons, when vessels cut down the timber called cam, the chanel is ten feet deep, and even in the e a dry seasons has seldom less than five or six feet soundings. The navigation of the Scherbro, as it is chiefly in the rainy season, is frequently interrupted with tornadoes, on the approach of which the vessels are obliged to fasten themselves strongly with cables to the large trees on the banks.

At the mouth of the river stands an island, by the English called Scherbro, by the Portuguese, Forulba or Furelbocus, by the Dutch, Masta Quaja, and by the French, Cerbera; stretching south-east and north-west along the coast, and forming a large bay between it and the continent. On the west point of Scherbro are three small islands, called Tota, in a direct line with it, to which the English have given the name of Plantain Islands, from the quantity of that fruit they produce. As to the island Scherbro, it extends ten miles south-east, producing great abundance of rice, maize, yams, bananas, potatoes, Indian figs, ananas, citrons, oranges, water melons, the nut called kola, with a variety of other fruits and roots. Fine pearls are found in an oyster bred on the shore; but the fishing for them is dangerous, on account of the numbers of crocodiles, allegators, and sharks, that infest all the mouth of the river. Wild fowls and elephants are also found here in such plenty, as could not be expected in an island of so small dimensions. The inhabitants are idolaters, notwithstanding which they practise the Jewish rite of circumcision.

On a little island to the north-east of Scherbro, called York Island, the English erected a fort, which they mounted with twenty pieces of large cannon; and at the distance of twenty paces from the fort on the same bank, they raised two large parapets, each defended by five pieces of artillery. All these works were built of stone, and the garrison consisted of thirty-five Europeans, and fifty or sixty negroes. Before the building of this fort, the English had a lodge on the continent, close to the sea, and fronting the eastern point of Scherbro; but both this and York Fort were relinquished in the year 1727, the factors retiring to Jamaica, a little island so called, four miles west of York Island: now they are all abandoned, the company maintaining no factory at all on the island or river Scherbro.

ALTHO' the Scherbro is the first river of distinction between the Rio Sestos and the river Sierra Leona, there are a number of intermediate streams and rivers of less note, some of which are navigable for several miles up, particularly Junco, the most eastern river of the whole, the Rio de St. Paul, Rio de Galinas, and the Rio Maguiba or Nunez; and north-west of the Scherbro, besides the river Sierra Leona, there are also navigable by small vessels, the Rio St. Ana, Rio Pugomo, Rio de Capor, and the Rio des Pedras, all of them succeeding in a regular course north-west.

WE shall begin our description of this country with Cape Monte, the first place of note we meet with north-west of Sestos, or Cape Mesurado, except the inland kingdom of Folgia, now conquered by the king of Monu. This cape, which the natives call Wash Kingo, is seen several leagues at sea, having the appearance of an inland or great mountain, surrounded by the sea, in ten degrees five minutes north latitude; but, according to M. D'Anville's charts, in seven degrees forty minutes north. It is a true peninsula, stretching east-south-east, and west-north-west into the sea, affording secure anchorage in two fine bays, on the west side. There is a small river of the same name, that falls into the bay within half a mile of it, and supplies the shipping with good fresh water. On the banks of this river is a plain several leagues in extent, and covered with villages, and all kinds of quadrupeds, as oxen, cows, goats, sheep, hogs, deer, hares, antelopes, with an infinite number of others; being in this particular one of the richest and most beautiful spots in the universe. Fowls of all sorts are found here in the utmost abundance; nor is the earth less prolific in fruits, roots, maize, rice, and millet. Here are pine-apples, citrons, lemons, oranges, and all the rich fruits of Europe, Asia, and America. The palm-wine is excellent, the air moderate, and the spring waters cool and refreshing; in a word, the country round Cape Monte is, except in the rainy season, the paradise of this part of Guinea.

DES MARCHAIS describes the inhabitants as not undeserving of so happy a situation, for they are mild in their nature, generous and sociable, handsome in their persons, industrious and disinterested, their labour being the result of reason, not of avarice. Snoeck conveys the same idea of this happy people, and indeed launches out into the highest encomiums on their virtues. Their chief occupations consist in cultivating rice, grain of all kinds, and making salt; certain portions of which are paid as a tribute to their monarch the king of Quoja, who holds them in the most abject subjection, but without diminishing their felicity, as his authority is intirely raised by their servile awe, rather than any extraordinary power he exerts. They are little acquainted with war, preferring peaceable negotiations to arms, in all disputes with their neighbours. The men are permitted to keep as many women as they can maintain; and as the females are no less laborious than the males, they find their interest in the multiplicity of their women; nor are the husbands at all jealous of the freedoms which strangers take with their wives. The supreme power under the king, and the courts of justice, are in the hands of the caboceroes, who deliberate upon all public affairs, and and decide by a majority of voices. The officers of state are at the same time captains of a villages, and it is their fidelity, prudence, and courage, which obtain them those honourable employments.

CHILDREN of both sexes go naked till they arrive at the age of thirteen or fourteen years, when people of distinction wear a little cotton paan, and the common people remain in their primitive nakedness. None besides the king, his court, and officers of the household, go always cloathed. The women of a middle degree wear girdles of rushes or palm leaves, at a certain time of life, when nature dictates that nakedness would be indecent; and these are prettily woven, hanging down to their knees, bordered with a fringe of rushes, or flounced with palm leaves. They likewise wear brass, copper, or iron bracelets round their wrists, and large rings of the same metals upon their legs, to which they hang silver bells, which make a sound not disagreeable when they dance; an exercise of which, like all other negroes, they are passionately fond, especially of imitating the European manner. In other respects they are more chaste, more modest, and industrious, than the generality of negro women; and their husbands more jealous, says Villault, contrary to the testimony of Barbot, Snoeck, and Des Marchais, as well as Labat, who bestows the highest praises on the indulgence of the men in this instance; perhaps because they found it convenient.

Dress.

BUT the most common dress among people of condition of both sexes is the tomi, made of woollen cloth, manufactured by themselves. The women tie this round the waist, letting it fall to the knee; but the men fix it before, and bring it betwixt their legs, tying it to the girdle behind. Both sexes take great delight in dressing their hair, or the wool of their heads, intermingling with it little plates of gold and other ornaments, an employment in which they bestow all the time they can spare from their other amusements and necessary avocations. Besides this, the women have another passion, that is, in making what they call a fetiche, and dressing themselves out in the manner most engaging to the men. Their chief ornament on this occasion consists of a line of paint, either white, yellow, or red, drawn across their forehead, which, being laid on wet, falls down in streaks to the eyebrows and cheeks before it dries. They have likewise circles of paint round their arms, legs, and waist, the negroes discovering extraordinary beauty in this diversity of colours. The ornaments among the men are much of the same kind, only differing in the size of the rings and bracelets, with which their arms, legs, fingers, and toes are loaded. Hardly the meanest negro goes without some of these, and the number increases with the wealth and vanity of the wearer.

Buildings.

IN their houses, which are of the same model we shall have occasion to describe when we come to Senegal, they are neat and cleanly. The royal palaces and the houses of the great are an oblong square, with one story floored with beams in the manner we have mentioned in our account of Sestos, and covered with palm leaves so closely united, that it withstands the heaviest rains, and most scorching beams of the sun. The floor they divide into a number of apartments, allotted to different purposes; the first being a chamber of audience, surrounded with sofas, raised about a foot above the floor, and covered with mats of palm leaves, beautifully united and diversified with a thousand elegant colours. Here it is that the great pass most of their time, stretched along those couches, with their heads resting in the laps of their favourite women; here they eat, drink palm-wine, and smoke tobacco, when they receive strangers; another apartment answering those purposes when the family is alone. In their manner of eating they are more civilized than most other negroes; for here they eat off plates of a hard wood, and dishes of ivory neatly turned, and kept white with abundance of care. They use wooden spits for roasting: and that their elegance may be more uniform and consistent, their kitchens are intirely separated from their houses, to prevent their being incommoded by the heat, smoke, or fumes of the victuals.

Language.

IT is observable, that the language of the negroes alters gradually as you pass along from east to west. Arts and sciences being intirely unknown among them, their language is formed by a few words, sufficient to express the necessities of life; that is, all the ideas they have; and hence perhaps reigns that silence observable in all their public meetings and entertainments, their ideas being insufficient to enliven conversation, and furnish a constant fund of discourse. Voyagers observe, that the same sounds frequently occur, even in a short discourse; and that their songs are only a repetition of five or six words. Villault says, that in his time a corrupt Portuguese mixture was in great vogue among them; nor need we be surprized at this, considering the number of mulattoes spread all over that part of Africa, who have formed to themselves a language, by blending together the Portuguese and negro tongues.

Religion.

WITH regard to their religion, the same author observes, that it is difficult for Europeans to procure a distinct idea of it, it being a mixture of Mohammedism, borrowed from the Moors who cross the continent, of idolatry, ignorance, and superstition. He was once seriously told that the white men worshipped God, but the black men were votaries to the devil;

a devil; and Des Marchais assures us that they pay great regard to this being. They pray and sacrifice to him, but without acknowledging his divinity or loving him; and Sneek remarks, with great appearance of truth, and from many instances, that their religion consists in paying an intire submission to the will of their king and governors; in this is contained the sum of all virtue; as for what passes above, they give themselves no trouble about it.

ALL the French writers affirm, that the Roan company carried on a regular trade hither, about the year 1526; although the seat of their factory can be discovered by no remaining monuments. When the East-India company sent some ships to Cape Monte, in the years 1666, 1669, the king of the country, probably the king of Queja, received the admiral b with all possible marks of respect; granting the freedom of all his ports, and an exemption from every kind of duty or impost. The reigning prince at that time was considerably advanced in years, of a noble and majestic deportment, tall in stature, and full of sweetness and engaging manners. His name was Fullam Bure, and he greatly delighted in the sprightly manners of the French nation.

ALL the Europeans who trade hither, the English, Dutch, &c. buy up great quantities of Trade. mats, cotton cloths, and ivory, which is nothing inferior to what they find on the Ivory Coast; however, what the natives purchase from the northern negroes is of a yellower cast, and of less value, though larger than what they produce in their own country. Here also are purchased the skins of lions, tigers, panthers, and other fierce animals, with which all c the mountains are filled. This coast likewise affords five or six hundred slaves yearly; but they are such as they buy, or get in exchange for their commodities from the king of Mandingo, and the interior regions of Africa; for custom forbids their enslaving any other besides criminals, which are sold for the king's emolument. Cape Monte furnishes as much gold, Des Marchais believes, as would support the expences of a factory, although it is drawn from the interior countries. Besides all these articles of commerce, the woods abound with trees useful for dying, which the negroes cut down and carry in logs to the shore, in pieces of about five feet in length, ready to be shipped. This is the wood which our merchants call cam, and prefer in many respects to brasil wood. Atkins observes, that d the timid disposition of the natives is almost the only obstruction to an advantageous trade with this coast. They surround the ship in canoes, which they row with great dexterity, and sing all the while out of respect, if they happen to have a cabocero on board. Before they board the ship they examine her closely, and after they mount deck betray their fears, by a certain impatience and anxiety visible in every countenance, which makes them hurry on business, and upon the slightest accident throw themselves into the sea. When a cabocero comes on board, he immediately presents to the captain a certificate from the last European ship that touched there, in testimony of the honour and kindness with which she was treated; a custom of great use, if practised with discretion and judgment; but if followed indiscriminately, through good nature, of bad consequence, as it only furnishes the negroes with the fairer opportunity of plundering and stealing.

e It would be endless to treat of every separate kingdom within the division of Sierra The kingdom of Leona, and indeed unnecessary, as the natural productions and manners of the people have Mesurado. nothing strikingly different; it may not however be improper to give a short account of the kingdom of Mesurado, before we proceed to the north-west end of Sierra Leona. Notwithstanding this country comes first in order in course from the south-east to the north-west coast, yet we have deferred our account of it, as of less importance, and in some measure dependent on the former.

BETWEEN Cape Mesurado and the river Sestos, is Rio Junco, a beautiful river, called Customs, man-ners, and reli-gion, of the natives. likewise Rio del Punto, under five degrees fifty minutes north latitude, about 500 paces wide at its entrance, the banks cloathed with a perpetual verdure, from groves of oranges, f limes, and all manner of fruit trees. Six miles east from hence is the river Jabo, on which stands a fine village, large and well peopled. Near this it was, that the merchants of Dieppe established a factory, some vestiges of which still remain; enough indeed to assure us, says Des Marchais, that the Normans traded hither. As to Cape Mesurado and the adjacent country, Sneek affirms, that the chief wealth of the natives arises from the excellent palm-wine produced in this country, in great abundance; and that rice holds the second rank in trade. The natives take in exchange bujis and kowris, the most valuable of all possessions in their opinion; insomuch that Phillips, for about half a pint of these shells, bought thirty pounds weight of rice. They are also fond of bars of iron and scarlet cloths; but the country produces nothing worth while to carry a cargo thither. Des Marchais on g the contrary affirms, that Cape Mesurado furnishes 1500 or 2000 slaves yearly, 500 quintals of ivory, gold in proportion to the address and diligence of the factor employed, and as much dying wood as can be required.

The country is populous, and the villages stand so thick along the coasts, that they resemble one continued town. The women are so remarkably prolific, that one is amazed how how the country finds sustenance for such a number of children. Although the laws of a proportion are but little regarded in building particular houses, yet their towns are laid out with the strictest order, and in a manner so analogous, that they can hardly be distinguished from each other, but by the surrounding country. The king's palace differs in nothing but extent and the number of apartments from other houses; only that here he has a magnificent state room; magnificent at least, for the simplicity of their manners, and ignorance of all the arts of refinement and luxury. In the middle of each village stands, upon pilasters about six feet from the ground, a town hall, what the natives call a kaldé, or conversation chamber. As the doors of this hall always stand open, you may enter at any hour, and meet with company and palm-wine. Here they transact bargains, talk over their narrow politicks, drink, and smoke tobacco. At Cape Mesurado there is one piece of luxury practised, but little known in any part of Guiney, from Cape de Tres Puntas to Senegal, and that is a kind of litter or palanquin of palm-leaves, in which persons of condition are carried on the shoulders of slaves. Phillips had occasion to go to Andrea, the capital and residence of the then reigning prince, who was called Peter; a name that had descended for generations, from king to king of this country. It stands about eight miles up the little river Mesurado, surrounded by wood, and intirely hid till you are ready to enter it. Like all the other villages and towns of the kingdom, it is walled round by a strong high earthen parapet and ditch, which intirely conceals the houses, and defends them. Instead of gates are little holes in the wall, just enough to creep through, that being their method of fortifying. Their mats on which they sit are elegant, and prettily diversified with red, white, yellow, green, and a variety of other colours. One thing remarkable in their buildings, especially the kitchens, is, that they are open to the contrary side to what the wind the blows. If they have an easterly breeze, they throw open the west side, if a south breeze, they receive the cool air from the north; having by this means a fresh draught of air, without the inconveniency of a brisk wind. In general those houses resemble theatres, more than dwelling houses. Besides these, the negroes have large buildings, intended for granaries, and for the most part well stocked with rice, millet, pulse, palm-oil, and aqua vite. Every week's provision is given out to the women by the master of the family, and then the magazine is locked up. An admirable order and regularity is preserved in all domestic concerns, every woman having her particular province appointed her; they take care of their children, render mutual good offices to each other, neither ambition or jealousy raising heats and contentions to disturb the tranquility of the family; but all living rather with the harmony of sisters, than with the rancour of rivals, in the affection of their lord.

THE religion of the country is the grossest idolatry, confused, and without any certain principle; their fetiches altering with their humour, and according to their caprice. The most constant object of worship is the sun, to which glorious luminary they make sacrifices and offerings of palm-wine, oil, fruits, and different sorts of animals. Formerly they used to sacrifice human victims; a barbarous custom! that has ceased, since commerce pointed out to them that their true interest consisted in the multiplicity of their slaves and prisoners, whom they sell to the Europeans. These offerings are made by the hands of the high priest or marbut, who shares with the king all that is valuable in it, the rest being left to the populace. The doctrine of Mohammed has never yet had footing among this people, altho' the name given their high priest seems to countenance this opinion; whence it is probably a name applied by the Europeans, and received into their language by the negroes.

Sierra Leona. NORTH-WEST of Scherbro is the great river Sierra Leona, by some called Mitomba, and by others Tagrin, or Tagrim. This river derives its origin from a lake in the kingdom of Mandingo, according to some geographers; while others maintain it to be a branch of the river Senegal, or rather of the Niger; neither of which opinions are supported by unexceptionable proofs. The mouth, or first opening of the river, is three miles, some say three leagues wide; but four or five miles up its breadth is reduced to one mile. The entrance is not above two fathoms deep, except a narrow chanel close under the mountains, which varies from six to ten fathoms water; a circumstance that greatly affects the trade and navigation of this fine river. It abounds with fish, but is infested with crocodiles as far as it is known by the Europeans, probably indeed to its very source. It is bordered, without a single breach, with fine large trees, and filled with little islands all covered with wood, particularly the palm, whence the natives make incredible quantities of wine. When Villault was here in 1666, the English had a factory in one of the most fertile and beautiful of these islands. Their house was built of brick and hewn stone, defended by four pieces of cannon, and a small garrison.

BARBOT observes, that the north side of the river being low and flat, it is the southern country which is filled with high mountains, that, properly speaking, is called Sierra Leona: however, most voyagers give all that coast from Sestos to Cape Verga this general appellation. In the open and plain country, although the heat of the sun be intolerable

- a before a breeze rise, yet a refreshing gale always springing up towards the middle of the day, renders the country supportable enough, except it be woody and mountainous. In Of the climate general it must be allowed to be an unhealthy climate to Europeans, as but too many instances of losses sustained by this nation evidently confirm. The continual thunder and rain, with a close, stifling, and malignant heat, that prevails for six months, and especially for four months of the year, bring on such a corruption of air, that myriads of insects are produced, and all animal food reduced in a few hours to a state of thorough putrefaction. People are confined for several days together in their chambers, to avoid as much as possible the pestilential infection of the atmosphere. Sometimes tornadoes produce a scene the most frightful and astonishing, day is turned into night, the most horrible darkness overcasts mid-day, and the face of nature seems all of a sudden to be changed. However this may seize strangers with amazement and terror, it is seldom attended with consequences that are fatal, or in the least dreadful to natives : so powerful is custom and habit.<sup>b</sup>

- SIERRA LEONA is inhabited by two nations, the one called Vieux Capez, as the French Of the Capez and Manez nations. spell it; the other Kombus Manez. The former pass for the most polished people in Africa; the latter for a barbarous, bold, warlike, and restless nation; esteemed men-eaters, or anthropophagi, as we are told the word Manez imports in the negro language. The Portuguese of Congo and Angola, look upon the Capez and Manez as the same race with the Gagos and Galas, who inhabit the east and north-east parts of Congo, and who have long been the terror of all their neighbours. They are all believed to be sprung from the Galas Monous, possessing those interior lands at the source of the river Sestos, as from one common root. The Capez and Manez nations were at perpetual war, till the year 1505, when the latter, leaving the inland countries, resolved to settle on the coast, of which the former were the natural inhabitants, taking the cruel resolution to ruin their country, and sell it to the Portuguese, who had about that time settled on the western coast of Guiney. After their arrival, they found the soil so rich and fertile, that they determined to remain there, and to sell all the Capez prisoners they could make to the Portuguese, and eat all those who perished in battle. Despair however animating the Capez nation, and giving vigour to their arms, the enemy found it impracticable to compass their design of wholly subduing or rather extirpating them. They maintained a part of their territories, while these barbarians possessed the rest; continual wars ensued, which lasted to the time Barbot was on that coast, in 1678. At that very time the Manez were preparing for a vigorous descent, and the others for a no less vigorous resistance; whence it may be conjectured, how destructive to both nations those incessant hostilities in so long a course of years must have proved. The Capez were the greatest sufferers, being despoiled of a part of their fine territories, their arts and commerce disturbed, the nation depopulated, and every thing kept in constant confusion by the alarms of those formidable and cruel neighbours. Their battles began however to be less bloody than formerly they had been; both sides were exhausted, and nothing hardly remained but the desire of hurting, the ability being spent. It is affirmed, that now they both are subject to the king of Quoja, who has his residence at Cape Monte. Flanfin, one of the predecessors of those princes, having conquered them, his posterity have ever since continued to govern them by viceroys, called donghas; in time, however, these donghas erected themselves into a kind of independent princes, and were, at the time Atkins was in the country (1727), at war among themselves, the younger brother with the elder. The younger, called Tom, then about sixty years of age, resided at Tombey, within a mile of Bagos, at a place where the English shipping usually come to an anchor. Their frequent wars.

- THE north side of the river Sierra Leona, towards its mouth, is possessed by two petty Of the kingdoms of Burri and Bolm. kings, the monarchs of Burri and Bolm, the first to the south, the other to the north. The king of Burri commonly resides at a village of the same name, which consists of about three huts, and five hundred inhabitants fit to bear arms. As to the king of Bolm, we are told that he and several of his court have been converted to Christianity by the Portuguese missionaries; how enlightened they may be we are not informed. In the language of the country, according to Barbot, Bolm signifies low ground, which some pronounce Bulom and Bulon, adding Berre, or good, from which they make out the name Bulomberre, by which the whole country of Sierra Leona is sometimes denominated. The coast of Bolm is low and flat in comparison of that of Burri, behind which lie the famous mountains, the Portuguese call Sierra Leona, forming a chain of the highest hills, except the Ainbofes, of any on the south or north of Guiney. Within these mountains are such a number of dens and caverns, that a cannon fired in the bay, makes a frightful echo here; nor had thunder a less dreadful effect, the first time it was heard in this country. Hence it was, that the Portuguese called them Montes Claras.

- To return to the river Sierra Leona: it is filled with islands and little rocks, that resemble a number of hay ricks. The chief islands are Togu, Taffo, Benfe, in the last of which Of the islands in the river Sierra Leona.

the English had a factory and little fort, fronting the palace of captain Tom. The fort was a built of stone, flanked with parapets, mounted with five pieces of heavy artillery, with an intermediate curtain and platform mounted with ten cannon. The garrison was usually composed of twenty white and thirty black men, free negroes, who lived in huts covered by the cannon of the fort. In 1704 it was taken without resistance by two French men of war, under the command of the Sieur Guerin. At that time the garrison amounted to an hundred men, all of whom, except a gunner and six soldiers, abandoned the fort, headed by their commander, on the approach of the shipping. After pillaging the fort, and making prize of four thousand elephants teeth, together with other merchandize proper for the country, the French razed it to the ground. As for the fort on the island of Taffo, it was destroyed by De Ruyter in the year 1664. b

the country.

A SMALL distance from the head of the bay of France, a creek near the entrance of the river, Barbot takes notice of a bason of fresh water, which tumbling down the mountains is collected in this reservoir in such a quantity, that an hundred tons may be filled in an hour by a few hands. Nothing can exceed in beauty this delightful spot, surrounded with hills covered with wood, which afford a perpetual shade, in a country parched with the sun, the numberless cascades gliding down the mountains in gentle murmurs, or rushing with an impetuous stream and noise, which either lull or rouse the attention, just as you happen to apply the object, or assist to give an additional coolness to the scene. In this agreeable retreat it was, that our author used to dine, and spend whole days, when his business would permit. In a wood, at a small distance from hence, is the house of captain Tom, c or rather the residence, composed of a number of little huts, round which he has a well cultivated plantation, filled with delicious fruits. He exacts a duty of two or three crowns from shipping, for the privilege of wooding and watering here. The whole country on every side the river is rich in rice and millet, which makes the chief sustenance of the inhabitants. The women grind the rice and form it into little balls or cakes, while the men steep it in water, and eat it greedily without any other preparation. Lemons, oranges, citrons, and bananas, are produced in great plenty and perfection; but they have but little Guiney pepper, that however being excellent that the country affords. Farther up the river, all the above fruits, together with ananas, Indian figs, water melons, wild pears, cassava, white prunes, manioke, different sorts of pulse, and the nut kola, are in extreme d abundance. These provisions they carry upon their shoulders to the shore for the use of shipping in the road.

BESIDES fruits, roots, and the spontaneous productions of the earth, there are in great abundance, fowls, hogs, hares, and deer, which mariners may purchase for a little aqua vitæ, of which the natives are extravagantly fond, preferring it to the best palm-wine. The mountainous parts are well stocked with elephants, lions, tigers, wild boars, different sorts of apes and monkeys, together with serpents of so monstrous a size, that, if we may credit writers, each of them is capable of swallowing a man whole. The negroes pretend to have a plant of sovereign virtue against the poison of this animal; but as it is scarce, the natives frequently perish of their wounds before it can be procured. Monkeys are so plentiful, that, e forming themselves into bodies, they make incursions into all plantations, which they ravage and spoil with that eagerness for mischief peculiar to this ugly animal. One kind of them they call barry is of a monstrous height, and amazing docility. When young they learn to walk erect, and seldom chuse any other posture: they grind their rice or millet, steep it in water, carry it in vessels on their heads, and turn the spit when meat is roasting. Nothing is too difficult for this imitative animal; they will even open oysters, of which they are great lovers, with a knife. Here the negroes are fond of their flesh, preferring it to that of all other animals, except the elephant. The woods furnish a retreat to an infinite number of parrots, paroquets, pigeons, and other birds, of the most beautiful kinds, but they are not easily taken, on account of the thickness and closeness of the trees. The sea and rivers afford the same fish f as the other parts of Guiney, and a constant supply of fresh provisions to the European mariners; for the negroes here are too indolent, says Barbot, to make the instruments of fishing, and catch no other fish but what is left by the sea among the rocks.

EVERY part of the country is covered with wood and fruit trees, some wholesome and congenial to the human constitution, others virulently poisonous. Finch, in his voyage, mentions a tree resembling a beech, which the negroes call agon. it bears an oblong fruit, like the pod of a bean, distinguished into three kinds from its size, but all of the same malignant qualities. The negroes use them in poisoning their arrows, for which purpose nothing can be better contrived, the smallest quantity of it, entering the humours of the body, being fatal. Within the pod are inclosed four or five square beans, almost like the seed of a tamarind, incircled with a hard rind, containing a yellow kernel, from whence g the poison is extracted.

a THE inhabitants of this part of Sierra Leona, that is, on both sides the river, are not so black or flat nosed as most of the other negroes. They adorn their ears with a great number of toys they call kazubos; and it is usual with them to mark their cheeks and noses with certain figures, raised by a red hot iron. Their fingers are loaded with iron rings, and their arms with bracelets. Both sexes go naked to the age of fifteen; at which time they begin to dress in a little piece of cloth, wrapt round the waist or the back, or leaves of trees formed into aprons. They also wear a leathern girdle or belt, to which hangs a long knife or poniard; but persons of condition appear abroad in a long flowing robe of striped callico, like the Moorish dress, with this girdle buckled over it, or under, according as they intend to be more or less dressed.

b As they are naturally malicious, turbulent, and jealous in their dispositions, they seldom live long without quarrels and dissensions among themselves: and the Euproeans, who are continually exposed to their insults, can contrive no better means of vengeance, than by burning their huts and ruining their plantations. On the other hand they are temperate and sober, from a dislike to gluttony and drunkenness. Tho' they are beyond belief lovers of spirits, brandy, usquebaugh, &c. yet do they never drink to excess, deeming the loss of reason to be one of the most beastly vices a man can commit. They have likewise a quickness of apprehension, and a delicacy of sentiment, particularly the Capez nation, not to be met with in other negroes; however they are, it must be acknowledged, extremely lascivious and effeminate; though their constant wars with the Manez has somewhat exalted their courage, and improved their military skill. Every house in this country is provided with a public room or school, to which all parents send their daughters to be taught singing, dancing, and other accomplishments, under the eye of a matron of noble birth. After a year's residence here, the young ladies have a public ball, where they give proofs to all the inhabitants of the town of the proficiency they have made at school: and this may be called the school of love; for here young men chuse their wives, pay their first address, and are first attracted. No regard to birth or fortune is heard of here; but every one chuses the woman whose accomplishments he thinks are most likely to render him happy. A lover no sooner declares his affection, than he is already looked upon as married, provided his circumstances will admit of making certain presents to the parents of the young lady, and to the matron entrusted with her education.

VILLAUT affirms, that all sense of decency and modesty is confined to the men, the females being the most abandoned of all prostitutes. According to him, their women are all in common: a man takes a certain number of wives, or as many as he pleases, confining his embraces to a few; the rest he lets out upon hire to his neighbours or strangers. She who holds the first place in the affections of the husband, and properly bears the title of wife, is served with great submission by the rest, and her virtue narrowly watched by the husband. Their methods of punishment and purgation of crimes are similar to what we have described in our account of the Gold Coast. On a charge of adultery, murder, and the most heinous crimes, the accused must drink off a certain red water, prepared by his judges; that is, if his life has been disorderly, or strong presumptions appear that he bore malice to the deceased. Of this he drinks till he swells up and dies; it being prepared strong on purpose: but when the judges intend to mitigate the punishment, they dilute the water plentifully, and weaken the force of the ingredients; which passes, from the effects, as proof of the innocence of the accused.

THEY have their palaavers, or town-houses, where the chief persons of the village meet, to adjust differences among the inhabitants, or with Europeans. On coming into the great hall they salute each other, by bending the elbow and touching their forehead with their hand. After both parties are heard, and the case fully canvassed, the equity of their several claims is settled by a vote of the majority of the judges. Panyarring is a term for stealing men, or indeed any thing else. If a man has been defrauded by his neighbour, custom has established it into a law, that he may retaliate to the amount of his loss; but he must prove before the judges at the palaaver court, that he is no gainer by the exchange of property.

ATKINS mentions a few peculiar customs omitted by Barbot, Villault, and Labat. He says, that the migration of whole villages is frequent among them, if they dislike their situation, or prefer another to it: they soon clear ground enough for their new habitations and plantations; nor is this reckoned any encroachment on the property of a neighbouring village, as all uncleared grounds are in common, and they become the lawful proprietors who render it first useful to the purposes of society. "Captain Joseph," says our account, "a Christian negro, has lately shifted his residence from this place (at the mouth of the river Bullom), which was a neat, well-built town, higher up the river, where he has to begin building afresh." Their huts are generally of an orbicular form, a spacious area in the middle, the doors paved with oyster and cockle shells, two or three crosses erected in different ferent parts of the house, and the whole surrounded with limes, papas, pine-apple, and plantane trees, and beehives, which they make out of the trunk of a tree, and erect upon high poles <sup>a</sup> (A).

ANOINTING their bodies, especially their arms and legs, with palm oil, is a daily practice with the negroes of both sexes; which cannot be omitted without the imputation of slovenliness. Some use civet, or musk, procured from an animal found here on the banks of the Scherbro, about the size of or larger than a cat, with a head resembling a fox's. This species of perfume cat we have already described.

As to their religion and government, Barbot observes, that they hold some particular tenets, no-where else to be met with. Before the Capez and Manez had erected themselves into independent states, they were governed, as we have taken notice, by viceroys, who administered justice according to the laws of the country. They held their courts and other public meetings in a hall that surrounded their palaces, which they call fankos, at the upper end of which was seated the viceroy, as supreme judge, upon a throne raised high, and covered with a beautiful mat for a canopy; the saltatesquis, or counsellors, being placed round him on benches. Here the parties with their advocates are produced, and, after pleading their several causes, the viceroy sums up their arguments, which he refers to the counsellors, as to a jury. Sentence is pronounced according to the opinion of a majority, the judge having a casting vote, and immediately executed, whether it be a fine, or corporal punishment, or banishment. The advocates or lawyers are no less preposterous in their dress than the gentlemen of the long robe in Europe; for they use clappers in their hands and bells on their legs, with which they would lay an emphasis upon those parts of their pleadings which they would have particularly attended to by the judge, by jingling their bells and striking their clappers. They are dressed in long robes, or a kind of cassock, adorned with large plumes of feathers, which to an European give them an air of extreme buffoonry; nor are the ceremonies accompanying the election of a saltatesque a whit less ridiculous. The candidate is seated in a wooden chair, dressed in the manner of the country. After the viceroy has several times struck his face with the bloody entrails of a he-goat, killed for the occasion, he then rubs his body all over with the same piece, claps a red bonnet on the head of the candidate, and pronounces the word saltatesque. This disagreeable and uncleanly ceremony being ended, the new counsellor is carried in his chair three times round the fanko, and for three days gives a public entertainment, celebrated with bonfires and the discharge of musquetry; and, to close the ceremony, and be duly elected, he sacrifices an ox, which he cuts in pieces, and divides among all his brother counsellors.

AFTER the conversion of the king of Fatima, by father Bareira, a great number of negroes in all countries, we are told, followed his example, and received the light of the gospel. This conversion, of which the Jesuits boast so greatly, was effected in the year 1607; since which time the natives of the coast, and indeed interior countries, have relapsed into their former idolatry. In Sierra Leona, as well as in many other parts of Africa, the negroes wear on their arms, legs, or breasts, little figures, they call grisgris, to which they pay constant worship and adoration. Whenever they eat or drink, they offer a part of their food to this little deity. Fully assured that this idol has a particular influence and authority over the element of water, they never enter their canoes, either on the sea or rivers, without being secured from danger by this preservative; and as they attribute the success of their voyage to the kind interposition of the fetiche, so they redouble their adoration, zeal, and acknowledgements for his favour, on their return from any expedition. Barbot once saw a grisgris fetiche, or land deity, which represented a man's head in miniature, upon a pedestal. It was covered over with a little tent, to preserve it from the air: and he was informed by good authority, that in the provinces of Bolm and Timna, numbers of these are found in every house and upon every road, either in honour of the dead, or for the protection of the living. In worshipping them the negroes have been often heard to pronounce the words Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and some names mentioned in the gospels; probably a remnant of the instructions of the Jesuits. The same writer adds, that he never heard of a Mohammedan upon the coast, or within some hundred miles of the sea, that sect being established only in the interior countries, and about the Niger: however, he says, that all the inhabitants of Bolm, Timna, Silm, Kondo, Quoja, Folgia, Galas, and, in a word, all this country of Sierra Leona, are circumcised; and, he might have subjoined, of all the

(A) It would appear from Atkins's account, that some houses have an open area: "for," says he, "I have seen a large tree in the middle of the area or court, with 500 hanging nests upon it (1)." These are built by a small familiar bird, that builds upon the flen-dereft twigs, their nests floating suspended in the air, like fruit, and declaring the force of instinct, which prompts them by this ingenious contrivance to protect their young against monkeys, parrots, and squirrels; the branches being too small to sustain their weight.

a interior and maritime provinces of Guiney, and every negro country; this practice being derived no more from the Mohammedans than from the Jews; but a custom established among almost all primitive nations, particularly of warmer climates; and taking its origin, perhaps, from a mode of cleanliness, which it would be unnecessary to explain.

LABAT is more particular in his description of the persons and religion of the negroes of Burri. Both men and women are tall and agreeably shaped, of an extreme black complexion, regular features, lively piercing eyes, and white teeth. There is not to be seen among them a flat nose, or thick lips, nor any of those blemishes of features, esteemed beauties among other negroes. The men have as many women as they are able to purchase by presents to the parents: but though they treat them with extreme regard, they are jealous only of one woman, who is in fact the wife, the others being rather on the footing of concubines, permitted to prostitute themselves to strangers for hire, which they share with the husband. Nor is there the least reproach annexed to their incontinence: on the contrary, they are looked upon as faithful servants, attached to the interest of their masters, and labouring diligently in their vocations. During pregnancy a husband has no commerce with his wife, nor for the term of four years after her delivery. The prince who reigned at Burri, in 1666, had embraced the Christian religion, and was baptized by the name of Philip; but he allowed his subjects liberty of conscience, not pressing their conversion, tho' he entertained the missionaries at his court, the one a Jesuit, the other a Capuchin. LABAT says, that the zeal of those fathers had but little effect in checking the extreme passion of the natives for women and wine, the two most obstinate vices in the breast of a negroe: yet the other writers extol them as mirrors of sobriety and temperance. In other respects, say the Jesuits, they are honest, sincere, humane, and hospitable to strangers. They still retain something of the manners of the Normans, who were once settled among them, if we may believe the French writers; who have an admirable talent in complimenting their own nation upon the most trivial occasions. The prevailing religion, says LABAT, is idolatry; but without principle, order, festivals, or ceremonies. The number of their gods is indefinite, or rather infinite; every one creating his own deity, as caprice directs. One worships a horn, another a crab shell or claw, a third a nail, a bird's head, a cockle, or a stone; and all these objects of their devotion are called fetiches: in this respect differing in nothing from the more eastern provinces of Guiney. Their fetiches they wear in little bags round their necks, adorned with bits of glass, shells, &c. called cowris, and other such trinkets; and feed them morning and evening with their best provisions. Such are the bounds of their religion: narrow indeed, and overcast with deep ignorance: "but still more happy" in it than the savages of America," says LABAT, "who are frequently beaten by the devil; whereas here they never receive any injury from their fetiches:" a puerile remark, that shews how ignorant this author must have been of the manners he describes: for it is certain there are negroes on the Guiney coast, who entertain the same notions as the savages of America of the devil; and complain, that they are frequently roughly treated by him<sup>d</sup>.

BARBOT informs us, that in the province or kingdom of Capez the royal dignity was hereditary in the same family, before they were conquered by the king of Quoja; the youngest son always succeeding to the crown: but in case of deficiency of heirs male, the next of blood was called to the throne, with some very peculiar customs. A number of the nobility visit him at his house, tie his hands behind, and in this condition carry him to the palace, amidst crowds of people, who scoff and insult him by the way, and have even the privilege of beating him with rods; intimating, that this is the last time he will ever see the real inclinations of the people. On his arrival at the palace he is invested with the badges of royalty in the fankos, or great hall, where he is attended by the saltatesquis, and nobles of the kingdom. The oldest counsellor then harangues the people on the necessity of chusing a prince, and enlarges in the praises of the monarch elect; after which he puts a hatchet into the king's hands, signifying thereby the necessity of punishing crimes injurious to society. The prince is then crowned amidst the acclamations of the people, all of whom flock to the throne to offer their submission and fidelity<sup>e</sup>.

THE deceased kings are buried in the public road leading to the capital; in favour of which custom they observe, that persons so much elevated above the rank of other men in their life-time, should likewise be distinguished by some extraordinary ceremony at their deaths. All the other ceremonies resemble those we have mentioned in our account of the Gold Coast. Every one is buried with what he possessed most valuable, and a small opening is left at the head of the grave. The body is carried to the grave by a silent company of friends, more or less numerous, according to the quality of the defunct; and the hired mourners pour out their plaints and tears in proportion as they are paid.

WE shall conclude this section with a short extract from Atkins, concerning captain Joseph, of whom we have made mention a little above. This little prince had removed from his village on account of the expence of living so near the English factory (B); and also for the a conveniency of panyarring. He had been in England and Portugal, at the last of which places he was baptized, and received into the bosom of the Christian church. He had built a little chapel, for the preaching the doctrine of Christ, where he and his people that were Christians used to assemble. Here he erected a cross; taught several of his people to read, and dispersed among them little Romish prayers. Through dint of industry and commerce he has enriched himself, and made his people happy, the country round him abounding in beautiful plantations of grain, roots, and fruits; while his inland neighbours are forced to live upon honey and manioko root. When Atkins visited him he was dressed in an European habit, gown, slippers, and a cap, and received him with great courtesy and hospitality. b

He sent his canoes with the Europeans to shew them the diversion of catching manatees, and left nothing undone that could contribute to render their visit agreeable to them, or impress a favourable idea of his own character.

Containing a geographical description of the interior countries from Rio Sestos to Sierra Leona; particularly of the empire of Monou, and the kingdoms of Quoja and Hondo:
also a description of the manners, religion, government, &c. of the natives.

Description of the interior countries, from Rio Sestos to Sierra Leona. WE begin this section with an account of the interior countries between Rio Sestos and c Sierra Leona. The first people of note we meet with are the Quabes, inhabiting the southern banks of the river Sestos. They had formerly been conquered by Flansire, king of Folgia; but, having thrown off their subjection, they have ever since remained a free people, though under the protection of the emperor of Monou, or Manu (A). Next follow the powerful nation of Folgia, and great empire of Monou; the limits of both which are utterly unknown. Both kingdoms are watered by the rivers Junco and Arvorado, which divide Folgia from the kingdom of Karrow: but since the union of these two nations, the monarch of Karrow resides in the kingdom of Folgia. The Folgians are dependent on the emperor of Monou, and the Quojans upon them.

Of the empire of Monou. THIS powerful monarch extends his authority over all the neighbouring nations, and has d reduced them almost to a servile obedience, a few only excepted. They pay him an annual tribute of the produce of their country, or of European merchandize purchased from the maritime negroes; such as glass, toys, bars of iron, or slaves: and the Folgians expect the same tributes in their turn from their vassals. They give the emperor of Monou the cogno-men of Mandi, which signifies lord, and to the Quojans that of Mandi Monou, or servants of the lord; esteeming it an honour to be distinguished as tributaries to his imperial majesty.
Hence it is that our geographers are fallen into the mistake of confounding the provincial or tributary kingdom of Quoja with the empire of Monou<sup>a</sup>. Notwithstanding this submission to the emperor, each king enjoys an unbounded jurisdiction within his own territories, and can make laws, declare war or peace, without permission from any one, and of his own e will and choice. It is really astonishing, that a people, once so despicable, and dominions so confined as those of Monou formerly were, should be able in the course of a few years to establish so potent, extensive, and vast an empire as it now is, by force of arms alone; and it is perhaps no less amazing, that so potent a people as the Folgians should quietly submit to the yoke, without once offering to recover their liberty. No other cause can possibly be assigned for events so extraordinary, but the situation of the countries, and the admirable policy of the court of Monou, of which we shall have occasion to speak farther, after we have described the different kingdoms of this division.

Kingdom of Quoja. NEXT follows the powerful kingdom of Lower Quoja, comprehending all that space from f
Cape Mesurado to the river Scherbro, surrounding the sea-coast behind, in an arc of a circle. Upper Quoja is situated farther north-west; and is bounded by the Scherbro, the kingdoms of Hondo on the north, Silm on the north-west, and the kingdom of Eastern

(B) This factory was abandoned in the year 1728. It was probably that on the island of Beuse, of which we have spoken. graphers Mendi Manou; and even the Sieur D'Anville, improved by Bolton, has it so in his chart of the coast of Africa; but we have preferred the authority of Barbot and Dapper (1).

(A) We find this empire called by the English geo-

a Bolm on the south (B). Barbot affirms, that all the interior country, from Cape Monte to Wacongo, near the river Sierra Leona, bears the name of Quoja: but we have ventured upon the authority of Dapper, D'Anville, and the accurate geographer Bolton, to lay it down more south-east, and beginning with Cape Mesurado.

As to the kingdoms of Galas, Galavey, Hondo, and Karrow, we know nothing besides their names, and that they form a chain behind the maritime provinces from Quoja to the kingdom of Mitombo. Thus much travellers inform us of the kingdom of Galas, viz. that its capital is called Gala Falli; that the country is filled with towns and villages, most of which stand on the banks of the river Maffilagh. The kingdom of Hondo is divided into Hondo a four principalities, Maffilagh, Dedouagh, Dangyrni, and Dandi, whose viceroys or princes powerful state. are appointed by the king of Quoja. They have all an equal authority, and pay the same tribute to their superior, viz. copper vessels, cloth of Quaqua, from the Ivory Coast, scarlet cloths made in the country, and salt.

b THE two last kingdoms are Silm, or Cilm, and Bolm. The first, according to Dapper, is forty miles from the sea. Amidst a number of other towns and villages, voyagers take notice of Quanamora in particular, which contains at least five thousand families; the inhabitants having the reputation of a faithless, perfidious people. Eastern Bolm stands on the Scherbro, and is no more than a province of the former kingdom, which is itself tributary to the king of Quoja, and he again subject to the emperor of Moncu; so that here are degrees and a subordination of vassalage. The town of Bogos, or Boga, is the residence of the king; and contains about two hundred houses.

c THE negroes of the interior countries, as well as those on the coasts, are libidinous, and much given to venery, which greatly abridges their lives, and emasculates them before the prime of life. The women, who are no less addicted to the pleasures of sense, use philtres, potions, and herbs, supposed to be possessed of provocative virtues, in dressing their husbands' victuals. In a word, nature is soon extinguished by the eager desire of making it perform actions above its powers. This is their greatest vice, and indeed the most prejudicial to society of any other: in all other respects they are temperate, modest, gentle, and sociable, to a degree much superior to the coast negroes. They take no delight in shedding human blood; ambition seldom occasions wars, upon which they never almost enter, but in self-defence. They live in the closest bonds of friendship, always ready to succour and relieve each others' distresses, and remove the slightest inconveniences. With a friend under misfortunes they will share their cloaths, their victuals, and their all; expecting or receiving the same treatment from him in their turn. If a person happens to die when his effects are insufficient to bury him, his friends contribute to the expence of his interment, and attend with the same respect, and even form, as if he had divided an estate among them. Among each other stealing, the common vice of negroes, is hardly known here: for, by the benevolence of their temper, it is rendered unnecessary; however, they are less scrupulous with strangers; owing chiefly to the narrow minds and selfishness of European merchants, who have no idea of the generosity that reigns here. Upon the whole, one would imagine, that writers are describing an Utopia, and a phantom republic of the imagination, not a rude uncivilized nation of negroes, whom we unjustly term savage and barbarous.

d HERE, as in all other negro nations, polygamy is suffered, and encouraged by law: but whatever be the number of women, the husband attaches himself to one in particular, who has the government of all the rest, and of all domestic affairs. Here she is distinguished by the name of makilma; the marriage ceremony being the same as in other countries, with this difference only, that the bridegroom must necessarily make three nuptial presents to his intended bride. The first, which is called taglo, usually consists of a piece of coral, or some glass trinkets; the second is called jafin, and for the most part is composed of pieces of cloth and apparel; and the third, called lafing, is a small chest or box, with a lock, in which to deposit her jewels and valuable effects. All these are proportioned in value to the wealth and affection of the bridegroom, and the humour of the bride. In return for this munificence, the father of the lady presents the husband with two suits of cloaths, a quiver filled with arrows, a sword and belt, and three or four baskets of rice. The care of the male children devolves upon the father, that of the females on the mother: nor do the men much regard the age of their bride, provided she bring a handsome portion. Here, as on the coast, they abstain from connubial embraces from the moment a woman is discovered to be pregnant<sup>b</sup>.

(B) The reader is to observe, that geographers in their charts make two Bolms, one on the Scherbro, and another on Rio de Sierra Leona (1).

TEN days after the child is born he has a name given him; upon which occasion the father, with all his domestics, armed with bows and arrows, make a tour round the town or village, singing and bawling out a kind of triumphant song or chorus, which is echoed by all the people they meet in their way, accompanied with instrumental music. After this a person charged with this ceremony takes the infant out of the mother's arms, and lays him upon a shield, placed in the midst of the assembly, with a bow and arrow in his hand, then pronouncing a long and laboured discourse to the spectators; which finished, he begins another, turning to the infant, and addressing himself to him. This whole harangue is made up of wishes for his prosperity, that he may resemble his father, be industrious, faithful, and hospitable as him; that he may be able to build his own house, conduct his own affairs, have no inclination for the wives of his neighbours, be affectionate to his own; and, lastly, that he be neither a drunkard, glutton, or spendthrift. The harangue being finished, he gives him a name, delivers him into the arms of his mother or nurse, upon which the assembly disperses, every man to his own home, except a select number of friends, who have an entertainment made for them, and spend the day in mirth and festivity. If the child prove a female, the mother or nurse carries it to the middle of the town, where the concourse is greatest, and there lays it upon a mat, with a stick in the hand of the infant. A female orator is appointed to pronounce the harangue, which she does with prayers, that the child may inherit all the accomplishments of the mother, and, like her, be possessed of all the female and domestic virtues, such as chastity, obedience to the will of her husband, affection for her children, and resolution to aid, follow, and support her lord in all hazards, dangers, and difficulties.

THE eldest son inherits all the effects and women of his father, except small portions given to the younger sons, to prevent their being reduced to poverty on his death: but a married man, who dies without male issue, passes over his daughters to leave his fortune to his nephews. If the whole male line chance to be extinct, then the effects belong to the crown, with this restriction, that the king provide a father to the daughters.

THE chief occupation of the negroes consists in cultivating the earth; for they have no fishing, but what arises from a few rivers; nor trade, but in exchanging the productions of their plantations for the fish and other commodities of the coast-negroes.

Language and arts.

THE general language of all the inland countries is the Quojan; though several provinces have their own particular dialects, which almost form a new language. For instance, the kingdoms of Hondo, Mendo, Folgia, Galas, and Gebbes, have languages all derived from the same root as the Quojan, or rather dialects of it; but so variegated, that they seem to have no affinity to each other, nor connexion with the mother tongue. The most elegant branch is the Folgian, in which they have considerably refined upon the Quojan, and formed a smooth, soft, and vocal language, at the same time that it is full and expressive: for this reason it is called Mendisko, which intimates the superiority it has over all other tongues. The negroes of rank pique themselves upon talking with elegance, and find a peculiar beauty in similes, allegories, and parables, insomuch that the most trivial discourse has something in it of poetical ornament and dignity. Nor are they intirely ignorant of the sciences, particularly astronomy; for they know the hour of the night by the stars, and distinguish the middle of it by the fifth star in the head of the bull, that appears with the Pleiades, which they call monjading.

THE ceremonies of interment in this country resemble in general those we have related of others, but they differ in some circumstances. After the body is washed they place it in an erect posture, well propt up, and the hair finely decorated. They dress it in its best cloaths, place a bow and arrow in its hands, and in the mean while the friends perform a kind of mock skirmish; after which they fall upon their knees, with their backs turned upon the dead corpse, and, with a menacing air, draw their bows, and declare vengeance against any one who dares to asperse the character of their friend, or has been accessory to his death. They next strangle some of their slaves; recommending it to them diligently to attend their friend in the next world; a barbarous custom, which indicates, that they have some faint idea of futurity and another state. Before these unhappy victims are offered at the shrines of superstition and ignorance, they feed them with all the delicacies the country affords, and bury with them as much food and wine as they believe will last them during their journey, advising them to secrete no part of it from their master. While, on the other side, all the women, who have any connexion with the deceased, throw themselves at his feet, repeating the word byune, that is, console yourself, wipe your tears! At length the corpse is laid upon a plank or bier, and carried upon the shoulders of men to the grave, into which are thrown with it the bodies of the sacrificed slaves, their mats, basons, and kitchen utensils: over them is thrown a mat, and this is covered with abundance of earth, to prevent noxious exhalations from the putrid bodies. The relations build round the grave a hut, with an iron rod at the top, to which is suspended the arms of the deceased, by way of escutcheon.

a If the deceased be a female, instead of arms all the implements of domestic industry are hung up; and for several months all kind of provisions and liquors are brought to the tomb, to nourish the deceased in the next world, till they have cleared plantations and formed connexions in a strange country.

It is customary to bury all those belonging to the same family in one grave, at a small distance from the place where they have died; and these cœmeteries, or bury-places, are commonly chosen in some deserted village, which they then call Tombrouy. They esteem human blood too precious to be spilt, and therefore strangle the slaves destined for sacrifices. However, this barbarous custom begins to wear out of fashion in most provinces; and where it is still retained, the parents generally conceal themselves and children, upon the least appearance of danger to the king's life; tho' they seldom escape without a reprimand, and censure of ingratitude, that, after having lived on the bread of their lord, they should now refuse to die for him. Another custom they have is, to observe a fast upon the death of a near relation or intimate friend. In general this fast continues but ten days, unless it be the king, or some person very dear to them: in which case it seldom is prolonged to less than a month. Those who are bound to keep it, lifting up their hands to heaven, swear they will not touch rice during that period; that they will drink nothing but so much water as a certain vessel, which they shew, will hold; and that they will wholly refrain from the nuptial embraces during the period of their mourning and humiliation: while, on the other hand, the women vow they will wear no other dress than white paans; that their hair shall be neglected, and the earth their bed as long as the fast continues; at the end of which the penitents hold their hands up to heaven, in testimony of their having fulfilled their engagements.

No nation among the negroes abound more with formal ceremonies than the Quojans; Obligatory ceremonies. and the surest method to gain their esteem is, to mark the taste of the nation as to manners: many of them are such as do honour to humanity. If a woman be accused of adultery, and no other proof than the allegation of her husband appears, she is acquitted upon her oath. She swears by belli paaro, that she is innocent; beseeching that spirit to confound her, if she varies from the truth: but if, after the oath is made, she be convicted, the law ordains, that her husband bring her in the night to a public place, where a council sits to judge her, and pass final sentence. Here, after invoking the jannanins, or certain spirits, her eyes are covered, Punishment of adultery. to prevent her seeing those beings who are to carry her out of the world; and the criminal is left for a while in the belief, that this will certainly be her fate. When she has undergone the most dreadful apprehensions and irksome suspense, the oldest in council begins a solemn discourse, representing to her the shamefulness of a disorderly loose life, and threatening her with the most cruel punishment, if she persist in it. All of a sudden a confused murmur, which passes for the voice of the jannanins, is heard over the room, declaring, that her crime, though meriting the most rigorous chastisement, will be pardoned, as being the first trespass; enjoining certain mortifications and penances, and recommending so austere a chastity, that she will not take a male child in her arms, or touch the cloaths of a man.

e Hitherto the Quojans are persuaded, that fear and shame are punishments adequate to the offence: but if she fall under the same censure a second time, and the presumptions be clear, the bellimo, or high priest, with one of his saggonoes, or ministers, attended by proper officers, go early to her house, making a prodigious noise with a kind of rattles. They seize her, and bring her to the court, obliging her to make three tours round the market-place, attended by the same noise and instruments, and all those of the society of belli being admitted evidences of what happens. Then, without hearing her defence, or promises of reformation, they conduct her to a wood, sacred to the jannanins, from which moment she is never again heard of, nor are the people permitted ever to mention her name. The negroes believe, that she is carried out of the world by the jannanins; but Barbot supposes, with great probability, that

f she is put to death in the wood, and her body interred in the most secret manner.

When a man is accused of murder or theft, without proofs sufficient to convict him, he Trial by is condemned to the trial by bellimo, which is a composition of certain herbs and barks of bellimo, or trees, which they oblige the accused to hold in his hand; fully persuaded, that, if he be a kind of guilty, blisters will immediately rise upon the skin. Sometimes the bellimo consists in obliging purgation. the accused to swallow a large glass of a liquor, composed from the bark of the neno and quoni, trees which the negroes believe to be virulently poisonous. Those whose consciences are clear reject it immediately by vomit, and are deemed the more pure for this trial of their innocence; but the guilty shew a froth about the mouth, and are accordingly judged worthy of death. Thus convicted, the criminal is carried off to a secret grove, far removed from all habitations, and there suffers capital punishment. He is placed upon his knees, his head is cut off, and stuck upon a javelin; after which his body is severed into four quarters and sent to his women, or rather given to them, for they generally assist at the execution, to receive and burn the last remains of the deceased. The friends boil the head, sip the broth, and nail up the jaw bone, in testimony of their having discharged their duty: a horrid custom, totally inconsistent with the other manners of this sensible people.

THEY acknowledge One Supreme Being, the Creator of all things; but their ideas are too exalted to admit of a definition, or even a description of the attributes of this Being, whom they call Kanno. However, they attribute to him infinite power, infinite knowledge, and ubiquity, or that universality and immensity of nature which makes him every-where present: but they are not agreed about his eternity; some affirming that he will be succeeded by another being, who punishes vice and rewards virtue. They believe, that the dead are converted into spirits, whom they call jannanins, or protectors; their business being to guard their parents and antient friends. A negro who flies from any danger hurries to the tomb of his patron spirit: if he escapes, it is attributed to his interposition; in acknowledgement for which he sacrifices a cow, rice, and palm wine, as an offering, in presence of the living friends of the jannanin, who celebrate the occasion with singing and dancing round the tomb. The Quojans who have received any injury fly to the groves, the supposed residence of the jannanins, and there pour out their complaints, and beseech, that the jannanins will either themselves assist in avenging them, or mediate with the Kanno. In all emergencies and difficulties they have recourse to the same support, as well as in all enquiries concerning future events. For instance, if no European vessel arrives upon the coast (for this affects them as much as it does the maritime negroes) they interrogate the jannanins about the cause of their stay, when they will arrive, and whether they are richly laden? In a word, their veneration for the spirits of the deceased is extreme; they neither eat nor drink without first tasting in honour of the jannanin. The king himself is as much addicted to this superstition as the meanest subject; and the whole nation harbours the deepest veneration for the Kanno; though the jannanins alone are publicly worshipped. Every village has a sacred grove set apart for their worship; to which, in the seasons of the year, great quantities of provisions are brought. Here it is that persons labouring under any affliction implore the aid of the jannanins; and hither women, children, and slaves, are prohibited to enter; a trespass of this nature passing for the most abominable sacrilege, which they suppose will immediately be punished by the spirits in a manner the most exemplary and tragical.

NOR do the Quojans believe less firmly in the magicians and forcerers than in spirits. These they imagine to be inveterate enemies to mankind, poisoners and suckers of human blood; for which reason they call them sava manifestin, which expresses their malicious nature. They also believe in the reality of other enchanters, whom they stile billis; these they are persuaded have a power over the seasons, and can forward or intirely stop the growth of rice. Those who indulge melancholy, and leave society from some sudden fit of despair, are taught, they imagine, by the sava, or devil, the qualities of herbs and roots possessed of enchanting virtues: from this malignant spirit they learn certain incantations, gesticulations, grimaces, and the power of hurting mankind imperceptibly. Death is the infallible punishment of such as are accused of this diabolical art; and the smallest suspicion of living in a manner different from other people, is admitted as proof and clear evidence.

THE Quojans never pass through a wood without company, dreading to meet with a billi, busied in culling plants and herbs; and they generally fortify themselves with a charm against the sava and all his ministers. But it would be endless to recite all their absurd superstitions, so little of a piece with their excellent civil policy, and otherwise sound understandings.

AMONG the negroes of the interior kingdoms of Sierra Leona, it is usual, upon suspicion of a violent death, first to wash the body before it is examined. They then begin their inquest, by making a bundle of shreds of the deceased's cloaths, the pairings of his nails, and locks of his hair, sprinkling it with powder of mammon, or pulverized corn. The bundle is tied to the bier, which is carried by two negroes to the most public part of the town, while the two priests precede it, strike their hatchets, which they hold in their hands, against each other, interrogating the corpse, where, when, and in what manner, it was deprived of life. After the spirit of the deceased, or jannanin, has, by certain movements, imperceptible but to priestly eyes, discovered, that to the sava manifestin he owed his death, the priest then enquires, whether the forcerer be male or female? This question being answered by the same invisible signs, which those pious rascals interpret as their spleen, hatred, passion, or interest direct, they repair immediately to the house of the forcerer, seize him, bind him, and drag him before the corpse, to be condemned upon the accusation of the spirit. If he denies the charge, the quoni, or bitter draught, is administered, and if, after drinking three large cupfulls, he vomits, he is acquitted; but if only a froth appears at his mouth, he is delivered to punishment upon the spot; his body is burnt, and the

- a ashes thrown into the river: from which fate neither his power nor his wealth can save him, there being no distinction of ranks, or mitigation of the law by favour, in cases of sorcery.

ALTHOUGH no author affirms that the natives of these countries worship the sun or moon, yet it is customary to have a holiday and recess from labour on the approach of the new moon. This custom is chiefly observed in country villages; and strangers are rigidly prohibited from mixing themselves with the people during the celebration of those orgies. The reason they assign for this practice is still more ridiculous than the custom itself: they say, that the first day of the moon being a bloody day, their rice would change to a red colour, were they to neglect these ceremonies. Barbot relates two other superstitious ceremonies, no less absurd than the former, and equally observed by the negroes of Folgia,

- b Hondo, Monou, Gebbe, Sestos, Bolm, and Silm<sup>d</sup>. In all those places there is established a society or sect called belli, which is properly a school or seminary for the education of children, renewable every twenty-fifth year by order of the king, who is visitor or superior of the college. Here the young men learn to dance, to fight, fish, hunt, and above all to chant a certain hymn, which, in the language of the college, they call bellidong, or the praises of belli. These songs consist only in the repetition of the same lewd expressions, enforced by the most indecent and lascivious postures. When a young negro becomes an adept, and perfectly instructed in his lesson, then he is raised to the rank of an associate or fellow of the college, which renders him qualified for all employments, spiritual and temporal, and intitles him to a number of important privileges: but the quolgas, or dunces, who have either not been admitted into the society, or were incapable of instruction, are by an established law excluded from all public offices, and places of trust and profit: an example we should gladly see followed in our own country.

- c THE seat of this instructive foundation is chosen in a thick wood of palm trees, including a compass of nine or ten miles, in which they build huts, and clear plantations, for the support of the scholars. When persons of fortune send their children to this seminary, proclamation is made, strictly forbidding all females to approach the sacred grove, during the whole course of their education, which takes up the term of five years; and, to render this prohibition the more effectual, girls are taught from their infancy to believe, that, if they violate so sacred a law, the bellis will destroy them with the most excruciating torments.

- d THE saggonas, who are the elders of this sect, have the royal commission to preside over this establishment; and immediately upon entering their offices, declare publicly to their pupils the laws and regulations of the community, with the penalties annexed to their violation. The first law is a rigid prohibition from passing the bounds of the college, or conversing but with the students, during the course of their exercises; and as these are known by peculiar marks upon their bodies, no excuse is admitted in palliation of the offence. This mark is made extremely visible, being no other than cicatrices raised from the ear to the shoulder, by ignited iron instruments: a painful operation, which all students are forced to undergo, before they are duly matriculated; after which they have a new name imposed, as if by entering this school of wisdom they became regenerated. During their residence in this laborious retreat they go quite naked, are fed by their saggonas, or tutors, and presents are frequently brought by their friends and relations, who are notwithstanding denied the privilege of conversing with them. On the day appointed for finishing their studies, they are conducted to a little town, built on purpose by the king, at some distance from the frontiers of Minerva's school, where they receive the visits of their relations of both sexes. Here are all the conveniencies for bathing, anointing, and performing the other exercises of the society: but their retreat, like European colleges, is so far from polishing their manners, that they quit it the rudest and most learned of the people.

- e AFTER a few days are bestowed by their parents in fitting them to the manners of the world, and refining their exteriors, they are presented with cloaths, and the dress of the nation, their necks being adorned with glass beads and leopards teeth, as a distinction of their superior education, their legs charged with copper rings and bells, and their head covered with a cap of osier, which falls down over the brow. With these marks of wisdom, and a paan, adorned with plumes of feathers, they are conducted publicly to the king's palace, where they are ranged in order, amidst surrounding crowds of spectators, especially women, who flock from all quarters to gratify their curiosity. The first thing done by the young students is, to uncover their heads, and let their hair down loose about their ears; a ceremony which we imagine must prove a little difficult to a woolly head; this they do with great solemnity, to afford the spectators an opportunity of examining their figure, and afterwards repeat one after another the hymn and dance taught them at college for the occasion.

- g Those who do not acquit themselves adroitly are rallied on all hands by the women, who cry out, that they have wasted their time in eating rice—Fruges consumere nati. The dance <sup>a</sup> being finished, each saggona calls his own pupil, and delivers him over to his parents, acquainting them with the name he had given him upon entering the college.

As to the belli, so highly revered among negroes, that has denominated this sect, it is a creature formed by the hands of the high priest from the bellimo, being sometimes of one figure, and sometimes of another, just as caprice and accident determine. It is inconceivable the impression this substance makes upon the minds of the negroes, who hold it as sacred, and believe that the most terrible judgment will fall upon whoever is wanting in the most profound veneration to the bellimo; yet they imagine, that the belli must derive his authority from the king, without which he has no power of punishment: so that even superstition itself is here dependent on civil policy, and the most unruly passion of the mind <sup>b</sup> reduced to the standard of government. It is, upon the whole, no more than a cheat, invented by the king and the priesthood, to contain the people within the bounds of their duty: they have been for ages taught to regard the bellimo as an unfathomable mystery, and this doctrine being implanted in their tender infancy, takes root, and acquires proportionable strength as they grow up: the whole intention being simply this, to subject the people to the priesthood, and them again to the throne.

The school for young ladies.

THE other society we mentioned is a female institution, which had its first rise in the kingdom of Goulla. At a time appointed by the king, a number of little huts are built in the middle of a remote wood, for the reception of girls and young women, who chuse to be initiated in the mysteries of the society. The sisterhood is distinguished by the appellation <sup>c</sup> of sandi-sinodisino, or the daughters of sandi. When the society first meet, the soguilli, or lady abbess, that is, an antient matron of distinction, expressly commissioned by the king to preside over this nunnery, enters upon the office with a festival and entertainment which she gives to the young ladies her scholars, called sandi-lati. Here she exhorts them to a compliance with the laws of the sisterhood, to a perfect harmony among themselves, and labours to conciliate them to this short recess of four months from the world. Upon this they shave their heads, throw off their cloaths, and remain naked during their abode in this seminary of virtue. They are carried to a rivulet within the precincts of the abbey, if we may so call it, where they are washed, anointed, and circumcised, by cutting off the clitoris; an operation extremely painful, but soon over, and easily healed. Their studies <sup>d</sup> consist in learning to dance, and sing those verses called sandi, which are equally indecent, both in the words and postures, with those taught the boys in the male college. They are denied the visits of all men, and even the women who enter the bounds are first stripped naked. When the term of their noviciate is expired, the parents send them pieces of scarlet cloth, glass necklaces, copper rings, and bracelets, with other female ornaments, which they snatch greedily. Thus equipped, they range themselves in order, and march to the royal palace, preceded by the matron; the inhabitants of whole provinces assembling to behold them. The lady abbess alone sits idle, while the girls frisk it away, dance and sing merrily to the sound of a tabor; after which they are remitted to their several families, with applauses proportioned to their merit, and the proficiency they have made. <sup>e</sup>

Of the policy and government of the Quojans.

BEFORE we close our account of the manners of these nations, we shall observe, that if the Quojans maintain their authority over the extensive and potent kingdoms of Silm, Bolm, &c. it is by the same wise policy by which the emperor of Monou preserves his power over the Folgians, Quojans, and all that country from Rio Sestos to this of Sierra Leona. Their councils are composed of the oldest, wisest, and most experienced men of the nation; their government is mild, and the distribution of justice simple and equitable. To impress a high opinion of their power, they never permit the northern nations to traverse their country in their way to the eastern parts, nor those of the east in their journey to the west. This rule, invariably adhered to, engrosses to them the chief share of all the commerce with the coasts: they maintain factors, agents, and even ambassadors at neighbouring courts, to <sup>f</sup> transact the affairs of trade, and, in a word, conduct a regular system of policy and commerce through every part of the constitution, which is as wisely modelled as prudently managed.

ALTHOUGH the Quojans are dependent and tributary to the Folgians, yet that prince gives the king of Quoja the name of dandaghs, the same which he himself has from the emperor of Monou; and the king of Quoja permits it in his turn to the monarchs of Silm and Bolm, who pay him just the same submission that his superior exacts. The title of dandagh is conferred with some very magnificent ceremonies. When the king of Quoja is installed by the king of Folgia, he prostrates himself on the ground, in which situation he remains till the other monarch has sprinkled a handful of earth all over his body, and asks him what title <sup>g</sup> he chuses to bear. When he has made his answer, it is proclaimed by an herald, in a loud voice, repeated by the king of Folgia, and echoed by the joyful and numerous assembly of spectators. The new dandagh is then desired to rise, and the king of Folgia, with his own hands, invests

- a invests him with the sword of state, a quiver upon his left shoulder, a bow in one hand and arrows in the other; signifying thereby the obligation he is under of defending, with all his might, the dominions with which he is entrusted. The ceremony is concluded by his doing homage to his superior, which consists in making him some presents of cloth, kitchen utensils, and table furniture.

THE dandaghs are absolute within their dominions, and jealous to an extreme of their prerogative; which, however, they only defend against the encroachments of the people, while they never scruple submission to a superior dandagh. A great part of his state consists in the number of his women, brought to him from distant countries. When he appears in public, he is seated, leaning upon a shield, which his subjects call koreda; importing, that he is the defender of his domains, the leader of his armies, and the protector of his own people, and also of all oppressed nations. If any lord, accused of mal-administration, is slow in appearing to answer to the charge against him, the dandagh sends his koreda, accompanied by two drummers, who never cease beating at the offender's door till he consents to pay his submission, and go along with them. If he be admitted to an audience of the dandagh, he prostrates himself on the ground, covers his head with dust, asks pardon for his fault, with the most humble respect, and acknowledges himself unworthy of the protection of the koreda, or of the countenance of so just a prince.

- WHEN a subject demands an audience of the dandagh, he begins by making presents to the chief women of the seraglio, who carry them to the prince, and solicit that he will graciously permit such a nobleman to enter his presence, and prostrate himself before him. If his majesty consents, the presents are accepted, and the visitor introduced; otherwise they are returned with all possible tenderness and gentility, and the petitioner retires without presuming again to approach the palace, till he has made his peace with the king. Nor is this a matter of difficulty in slight offences; the culprit is introduced with the same ceremonies, he makes his submission, and meets with a kind reception; but majesty does not easily forget gross affronts or heinous trespasses. When the offender has obtained his pardon, and leave to approach the monarch, he advances slowly towards him, with a profound reverence, and low inclination of his body; when he comes before the mat on which is majesty is seated, he falls upon his knees, and kisses the king's hand, extended for that purpose, respectfully, pronouncing the word dandagh; upon which the king calls out numadi, I forgive you, and orders him to sit down upon a stool or mat placed at a little distance, if he happens to be a person of high rank or a foreigner, otherwise he stands all the while he is in his majesty's presence.

- WHEN a foreign ambassador proposes coming to court, he stops on the frontiers of the kingdom, and sends a gentleman of his train with notice of his approach; upon which a nobleman is immediately dispatched to welcome him, and in the mean while preparations are making for his reception. On the day appointed, he makes his public entry, attended by a great number of officers and guards, all dressed in the richest manner of their country, a bow in their hands, and a quiver well stocked with arrows slung over their shoulder. This procession is made amidst the sound of warlike instruments, and thousands of people skipping and dancing to the time of the music. On their arrival at the royal palace, the ambassador is received between two lines of the dandagh's body guards, fully accoutred and new cloathed for the occasion, along which he passes to the chamber of audience. If his excellency happens to be sent from the monarch of Folgia, then his attendants are permitted the vast privilege of dancing between the lines of the life-guards; but this honourable distinction is denied to all other nations by his Quojan majesty. When the dance is finished, the whole retinue enter the audience chamber, and are allowed the honour of kissing the ground before the king; after which, they approach the simnora, or throne, while the ambassador, turning his back upon the king, bends his bow, falls upon his knee, and by this menacing posture, intimates his inclinations to defend his majesty against all his enemies. While this ceremony lasts, his retinue sing and dance to some songs composed in honour of the king, and the Quojans return the compliment, by reciting scraps of poetry in praise of the ambassador and his master. In this ceremony, which is called polo somnah, the most flattering and complimentary expressions are repeated so frequently, that the ear is fatigued with the repetition of the words, kemnee, bolle, machang, which is all that authors give us of their language, although they pretend to call it energetic and full.

- THE mutual eulogies being ended, the ambassador sends the principal person in his train to prostrate himself before the king, his own character exempting him from that submission, and during this new scene the dances go on. All of a sudden the ambassador commands silence, and begins to pronounce his harangue, which the royal interpreter explains word by word. If the discourse relates to matters of state, it is referred to the king's council; otherwise an immediate answer is given, and his excellency is conducted to the apartments provided for him. Then the officers of the household bring into the king's presence the merchandize intended as presents to the foreign minister, explaining each article, and the reasons of their having made choice of it. At night a number of servants flock to the house of the minister to offer their assistance in providing necessaries, and rendering his situation commodious; and last of all the king's women, cloathed in their richest habits, attend him with plates of rice, and the most delicate foods the country affords; the king after supper sending him large quantities of palm-wine, and presents to his master, which consist generally of large vessels and dishes of copper. We have dwelt the longer upon this ceremony, as it marks the politeness of those untutored negroes, and especially the dignity annexed to the character and function of a king. We shall now proceed to a brief recital of the conquests of the powerful kingdoms of Karrow and Folgia <sup>a</sup>.

Of the conquests and wars of the kingdoms of Karrow and Folgia.

WHILE the former inhabited the banks of Rio Junco and Aguida, they were engaged in perpetual disputes with their neighbours the Folgians, which at length terminated in an open rupture between the two nations. The Folgians being defeated in several battles, and greatly weakened by their losses, had recourse to the art of a famous sorcerer, called Jakelmo, who advised them to throw boiled fish, with their scales, into a tank or pond belonging to the enemy. It was a tradition of very ancient date amongst the Karrows, that their first ancestor dropt down from heaven in one of these baths; they therefore made offerings to the pond, and the fish it contained; but being strictly forbid by a law, almost as ancient as the tradition itself, to eat fish either boiled or with the scales, they believed the pond profaned by this act of the Folgians: dissensions and civil discord sprung up among them; and the Folgians seizing the opportunity, when every thing was in confusion, and the enemy were weakened by their civil wars, attacked and defeated them, slew their king, and obliged his son with all his subjects to submit to their yoke. But the Folgians conceiving a great esteem for the bravery of the Karrows, treated them more upon the footing of allies than of a conquered people. Flansire the Folgian monarch, married Wavalla, sister to Flonikerri, the young king of Karrow, leaving his brother-in-law in possession of his ancient dominions. <sup>b</sup>

ABOUT this time the Quabi, a people bordering on the Rio Sestos, attacked the Folgians; when Flonikerri, hasting to defend his ally, obtained a signal victory over the enemy, and returned home after having made an absolute conquest of the country of Quabi. During this war, Medino emperor of Monou, to whom the Folgians were tributary, died, not without suspicion of poison; Manimassa his brother, accused of having been an accomplice in it, was forced to drink the quoni. He justified himself by taking the drench; but being odious to the nation he could not obtain his right, nor establish himself in the throne of his brother: besides, the Monouans, not contented with the trial by quoni, determined to consult the forcerers. Manimassa, incensed at this fresh indignity, after declaring that he was no longer able to support it, quitted the country, attended by the jannanins or spirits of some deceased friends, taking his rout northward. Arriving in the kingdom of Gala, which was at that time without a king, he soon obtained such a degree of credit by his prudence, equanimity, and gentle disposition, that he was unanimously raised to the throne. However, the respect of this simple people was of so short duration, that Manimassa quitting the kingdom, went to the court of Folgia; he having formerly married the king's sister. Flansire warmly espoused his interest, and sent an army under the conduct of the brave Flonikerri his ally and brother, who soon subdued the Galans, and firmly established Manimassa on the throne. <sup>c</sup>

FESIA, the nephew of Flonikerri, talking to his uncle about the beauty of the country of Vey Benkoma, or Cape Monte, whither he had made a journey, raised a desire in the king to attempt its conquest. The nephew furnishing him with sufficient lights to judge that this would be a matter of no great difficulty, Flonikerri, whose soul was equally ambitious and great, consulted his brother-in-law, the Folgian monarch, upon the subject, and procured his assent, after warm debates in the council. He was soon at the head of an army, and joined by a body of Folgians, with whom he immediately began his march towards the south of Cape Monte and the village of Tombi, conquering this, and with it the whole country, in the space of a few days, and as soon as he could traverse it. The vanquished appeared before him with their heads covered, which is a mark of the deepest submission here, and prostrated themselves before the conquerer, acknowledging his power, paying their homage, and praying his clemency. Flonikerri granting them their lives and liberty, contented himself with erecting a monument of his conquest, and entered into an alliance with them, which was confirmed by the following extraordinary ceremony. The conquered taking the blood of a number of fowls, killed in their presence, sprinkled it on the earth between the two parties; then boiling the fowls, they eat the flesh all but the legs, which they gave to Flonikerri as a pledge of their fidelity; and to be shewn them upon all occasions, whenever they appeared deficient in their duty, or relaxed in their engagements. <sup>f</sup>

a FLONIKERRI's ambition being rather fired than gratified with the number of his conquests, meditated fresh projects, more extensive than any of the former; but scarce had the people of Cape Mount began to taste the sweets of their new alliance with their conqueror, but Miminiko, forgetting his father's obligations to Flonikerri, marched against him with a powerful army, and assisted by the alliance of two potent nations, who began to dread the growing power of so ambitious a prince. Miminiko was the son of Manimassa, established on the throne of Galas by the bravery of Flonikerri: but now ambition, jealousy, and the dread of being eclipsed in glory by this hero, pushed him on to the ruin of his benefactor. His troops were so numerous, that the Karrowans gave way, Flonikerri alone maintaining his ground. This brave prince drew a circle with the point of his sword, within which he
b fell upon his knee, and vowed that there he would either conquer or die. His defence was long and obstinate, though supported but by a few of his guards, whom shame had brought back to their duty; but covered at length with arrows and darts, he failed in strength, though nothing abated in courage, and breathed out his last upon that spot; an eternal monument of his noble perseverance in that course of glory in which he had ever lived. His death was a spur to the courage of a nation accustomed to conquer; the Karrowans rallied, returned to the charge, and fought with such fury, that the enemy was soon discomfited, and forced to yield up the victory, with prodigious slaughter, and the loss of many thousand prisoners.

KILLIMANZO, the brother of the gallant Flonikerri, succeeding him in command, pursued
c the victory, attacked the enemy a second time in their camp, defeated and pursued them to Pay Monu, which they left to be pillaged by the victorious Karrowans. At length advancing to Quoja Monu on the banks of the river Maguiba, or Rio Novo, he received the submission and homage of the vanquished army and nation. Thus the Karrowans, assisted by the Flogians, extended their conquests over all the neighbouring states, and rendered their name famous, and arms formidable, among the nations west of Guiney. What d deserves notice in all these wars is, that no sooner was a people conquered by another nation, than, instead of being made slaves, they were taken into the strictest alliance with the conquerors; their ambition rose with their defeat, and they themselves became the conquerors of other nations. This appears further in the conduct of Killimanzo, who had no sooner received the homage of Miminiko, than he made him his ally, and the instrument of fresh conquests. With him he marched towards the river Magualbari or Gallinas, and subdued the Quilligas, retiring after so many glorious successes to his palace at Tombi, where he died loaded with glory, but not without strong suspicions of his having been poisoned.

His eldest son, who was called Flanfire, mounted the throne, under the tuition of his uncle Gemmab, by the father's side, who was charged with the administration during the minority of the young prince his nephew. Flanfire, inheriting the courage of his ancestors, had scarcely arrived at the age of manhood, when he meditated schemes for enlarging his dominions by new conquests, which should raise his glory, in proportion as they augmented his power. Putting himself at the head of his army, he passed the river Magualbari, and e subdued all the nations west of it, as far as the river Sierra Leona, obliging them in an incredibly short time to receive the yoke, and granting a commission to his uncle Gemmab to reign over those provinces. Another of his lieutenants he made governor of the countries upon the river Scherbro; this man's name was Selbore, and from him the river bears that name, though by corruption called Scherbro. Sitre, another officer of rank, was made viceroy of those nations bordering on the river Magualbari; and having thus settled his conquests, Flanfire returned to his palace at Tombi, where he lived long in peace and glory. But while he was thus enjoying his felicity, he received advice that his uncle was driven out of his dominions at Sierra Leona, by Dogo Falma, king of Dogo, in the country of Hondo, and forced to retreat to a strong hold in the island of Banana. This insult roused the warrior, f and he instantly gave orders to the nobles of Bolm to assemble all the forces of the country, and rendezvous at a place where he appointed to meet them. In the mean while he had private intelligence of a conspiracy formed against him by his brother, to which he gave so little attention, that proceeding in his design, he committed the government of the kingdom in his absence to that very brother, taking with him his son Flambure, afterwards king of Quoja. This was a rash step; but he relied upon gaining over the affections of his brother, by his generosity, and the confidence he reposed in him, without reflecting that such is the malignity of some hearts, that heaping favours upon them is only adding fuel to their rancour, and nourishing those weeds of jealousy and envy, which can never be rooted out of the bosom in which they are indigenous, and the spontaneous growth. Flanfire saw, that g the levies of Bolm went on but slowly; and though he had discernment enough to discover the causes, yet a mistaken policy made him wink at them, and set out on his expedition, supported only by his courage and a handful of troops. His first measure was to pass in canoes to the island of Banana, where he joined his uncle, and collected his scattered forces, with which he proceeded directly against Dogo Falma.

THIS man had been one of the most powerful lords of the kingdom of Hondo; but being discovered in an intrigue with one of the king's women, his majesty, instead of punishing him in the usual manner by a fine, ordered his ears to be cut off, and himself banished. In this situation he remained some years, till the king's indignation wore off, and he had found means to make his peace; upon which he returned to court. Instead, however, of trying to regain his master's esteem by acts of submission and obedience, he more and more irritated him by fresh offences. One day he had the presumption to tell the king, that the punishment he had undergone having rendered him ridiculous and contemptible in the eyes of the court, he ought to insist that all persons guilty of the same crime should be punished in a similar manner; and that unless this was done, he had determined to proclaim the injustice done him on every high road and public place in the kingdom, and apply for redress to the jannanins and forcerers. The king, struck with the boldness of Dogo Falma, and also with the justice of his complaint, referred the matter to his council, who gave it unanimously as their opinion, that one example ought not to be established into a law for all; however, in some measure to give satisfaction to Dogo Falma, the king gave him the command of an army, then marching to Sierra Leona. This was the enemy Flansfire had to oppose; a general, who found it necessary to wipe off by his glorious actions, the contempt into which the loss of his ears brought him at court. After the arrival of Flansfire, the fortune of war hung long in suspense; courage alone was unable to weigh down numbers; and yet that hero performed prodigies of valour. At last finding there was no dependence on the arrival of the troops from Bolm, he found means to engage a few white men, probably Portuguese, into his service, and with them laid siege to the city Falmaba. Having forced the gates, he began to fire the buildings, when Dogo Falma, who was besieged within it, finding no other resource against the vigour of his enemy, resolved to save himself by flight. Flansfire pursued him, but was not able to overtake him, though his successes had however gained him the title of Dogo Falma-Jundo Mu, or the conqueror of Dogo Falma.

AFTER having restored his uncle to the throne, and settled the affairs of his kingdom, he hastened to apply a remedy to some other disorders that had arisen, when advice arrived, that the repose of his dominions were disturbed in his absence by the revolt of his brother, who had usurped his throne, ravished his women, and put to death his children; a rebellion that was immediately followed by the invasion of the Gibbes Monou, a people inhabiting the country round Cape Mesurado. They had entered the countries of Cape Nunez and Donalla, burnt a number of villages, and carried off men, women, and children, into slavery. Flansfire now saw the weakness of his own policy, and the falsity of that opinion, that a corrupt heart could be changed by generosity and kind usage; he applied however with vigour to repair his error, and instead of sinking under the weight of his misfortunes, seemed to be animated by them to a double exertion of all his faculties. Marching to the river Magualbari, he there invoked the jannanins, that they would punish the guilty, and relieve the oppressed and innocent; but knowing also that human means were not to be neglected, he crossed the river with his small army, gave battle to his brother, and obtained a complete victory. The war however went on, till the usurper Guamana was slain in a skirmish by his nephew Flambure, the eldest son of Flansfire; upon which the rebels were disheartened. Flansfire, though he had now the power to punish them as their infidelity merited, was generous enough to pass over all their misconduct, and grant them a free and full pardon.

HIS affairs here being happily re-established, he turned his victorious arms against the Gibbes; and though they were prepared to receive him, he defeated them, made a terrible carnage among them, and ravaged their country: but proposing to himself only a happy tranquility as the fruits of so many victories, he retired to his palace at Tombi. Here he was hardly arrived, when Dogo Falma re-entered his dominions, with a more potent army than he had ever commanded; and was ravaging every place with the fury of a barbarian, irritated with his disgrace. As he had now disbanded his army, Flansfire was forced to take refuge in the island of Massa, in the river Plizago. His enemies believed his ruin infallible; and his friends, though they knew his prudence and courage, greatly dreaded the event. Dogo Falma was collecting canoes to transport his forces to the island, in order to surround Flansfire; and every thing was in such a train as threatened his destruction; when unexpectedly one of Flansfire's generals, having got together a choice body of troops, fell upon the enemy's rear. The king no sooner discovered this from his retreat, than getting into some canoes he had on the island, he attacked the enemy in front. The battle was long and obstinate, owing to the inequality of forces; but courage at last triumphed over numbers, Dogo Falma was utterly defeated, his army dispersed, the king relieved from his distress, and his faithful general rewarded equal to his merit, and far beyond his expectations. In this manner were the interior countries of Sierra Leona conquered, by the bravery

a very of the Karrowans and Folgiens, who were themselves tributary to the emperor of Monou; a set of princes superior to each other, and forming a chain of dependencies not to be met with in any other country, or perhaps paralleled in history.

As to the natural productions of these kingdoms, they have nothing hardly in them peculiar, or that has been omitted in our description of other nations. A species of porcupine is however described by naturalists, which we believe is found in no part of the globe but this. It is about the size of a large boar, armed on all sides by long, sharp quills or prickles, streaked with black and white rays in a very beautiful manner. These quills are so strong, that they are proof against the most violent blow. In nothing besides the size does it differ from those commonly seen in Europe. In this country are likewise four kinds of eagles, all extremely ravenous and large; the first, the natives distinguish by the name of kequolantia; it perches and builds in the loftiest trees in large forests, is a bird of prey, and feeds chiefly upon monkeys, which it conveys whole and alive into the nest. The next, which is called kequolantia klow, has this peculiarity, that it prefers fish to all other food, and lives upon the banks of rivers and lakes. The talons of this bird are extremely strong and crooked. The others have nothing particular, only that the fourth called poy, delights in fishing for crabs, lobsters, and small fish, which it devours with great voraciousness. The sea coasts afford abundance of fish of an extraordinary kind; but they are not so minutely described as to give us a clear idea of them; and to retail the names given to them by the natives, would afford but an insipid entertainment (C).

History of the kingdoms of Mandingo, Fouli, and Jaloff, or Oualof, with some account of the manners, customs, religion, &c. of the natives; their method of trafficking, as well among themselves as European nations; a description of some particular kinds of birds, beasts, &c. found therein; a relation of their wars; with several other curious particulars.

c FROM the river Sierra Leona to Senegal, are an infinity of kingdoms, principalities, and petty states, of which we know not even the names, voyagers having only related trivial circumstances, which fell under their own observation, or such occurrences as related merely to trade and the navigation of the river Gambia. With regard to the extent of dominions, the peculiar customs of different nations, their religion, policy, and laws, they are intirely silent; except a few particulars relative to the three great kingdoms of Mandingo, Fouli, and Jaloff, all of them interior countries. With respect to their precise frontiers, although their dominion, on account of their power, is in some measure established to the sea coasts, voyagers give us no satisfaction. That the reader may not intirely be left in the dark, we shall extract all that travellers agree in, concerning the three powerful kingdoms above mentioned, and begin our account with Mandingo, as the first in order.

d ALL the numerous nations inhabiting the banks of the river Gambia, and extending to Cape Verga, go by the general name of Mandingoes; and Jobson says, that they exactly resemble each other in complexion, features, and language, as well as in their general manners and policy. He affirms, that they are all of a jet black colour; though Moore says, that in general they are so, as if however there were some exceptions. This kingdom is of vast extent, both along the coasts and into the interior countries, on the banks of the river Gambia; but geographers and voyagers differ so greatly in the limits they lay down, that its frontiers cannot be described with any degree of certainty. According to the same author, they are more sociable, rational, and humane, than they have been represented by other travellers; for on all the occasions he had to visit their towns, he met with the most cordial reception, the men running out to welcome his arrival by kissing his hands, though some women, who had never beheld a white man, fled at the sight of him, and could not be prevailed on to approach him. Some have pressed him to enter their huts, have entertained him in the best manner they were able, and produced their wives and daughters for him to salute; his complexion, habit, speech, and manners, all of them equally raising their astonishment and curiosity.

e THE Mandingoes are in general a lively joyous people, who consume half their time in dancing, music, mirth, and good humoured gaiety; yet being much addicted to company,

warm and impetuous in their disposition, they fall into frequent quarrels, which commonly terminate in blood, and spoil the society of the day, by the unhappy discord of the night. Nothing is more usual than challenges to single combat, upon any affront or injurious expression; but as their heat subsides almost as soon as kindled, they seldom come to deliberate blows; and all the accidents of that nature which arise, are generally the effects of sudden passion. However, when they do engage, nothing can be more furious than their transports, and the animosity with which they rush upon each other, with whatever weapons come in their way<sup>a</sup>. The fury of tygers, says Jobson, is not to be compared to theirs, every organ and limb expressing the most malignant and rivetted hatred; their eyes strike fire, their teeth gnash, and the most opprobrious and vilifying expressions are poured out, upon the most trivial occasions, the dispute ending in the death of one of the parties, and possibly in a bloody war between two nations, each taking part with their own countrymen<sup>b</sup>.

How to reconcile this account with what Labat asserts, we shall leave to the reader, after we have laid before him the following sketch of their character, as drawn by that writer. The Mandingoes, according to him, are a lazy, indolent, ignorant people, unskilled in commerce, in arts, and every manly exercise and science. Necessity and self preservation oblige them to sow and reap, but this labour does not last above two months in a year; the other months are spent in idleness and sloth all the day, and at night in dancing under the shade. A few childish diversions they have, which they perform with abundance of address; but every thing manly is neglected: fishing and hunting unknown, though no country affords better opportunities for both. Smoking tobacco is their whole pleasure, which increases their natural sloth, by destroying their appetite for food. It is of the growth of their country, and they smoke in wooden pipes, five or six feet in length, the bowl made of wood, hardened and dried in the fire, and finely polished.

MOORE says, that the nation of Mandingo, in points of honour, are jealous and delicate to an extreme; nor are they less possessed with that foible of almost all nations, pride of birth and ancestry<sup>c</sup>. While the author was at Butto on the river Gambia, he saw a dispute of honour arise between Bo-John a prince of the blood, and the son of the reigning monarch. Each flew to arms, and their resentment appeared so keen, that the spectators had the utmost difficulty to prevent fatal consequences, and yet the whole contention was a matter of small importance, and indeed, no other than a comparison of their parentage. Though the combatants had been parted for the time, there was no preventing a formal challenge from passing, after which the author found it no hard matter to reconcile them, each looking upon this as a salvo of his honour. There was something ridiculous in the manner of their reconciliation; for at the very time they were vowing a sincere friendship, they also threatened to resume the dispute, as soon as fit occasion offered; believing menaces were necessary to establish an opinion of their courage in the by-standers.

It is observable, that the characters of those people inhabiting the interior parts of the river Gambia, are altered greatly for the better. Formerly they were crafty and knavish, in the most trifling affairs; insomuch, that if they had the misfortune to break a pipe or to want money, they remedied the loss by a piece of cunning, artfully laying it among the feet of the Europeans, insisting that, as they broke it, they should repair the damage, which they computed at twenty times the real value. In this situation the Europeans found themselves under the necessity of immediately satisfying the unjust demand, unless some friend interposed and proved the fraud; nor were little crafty tricks of the same nature uncommon in their dealings with one another, though they seldom ventured to carry the imposition so far, as when they had to deal with strangers, and persons unable so readily to detect the imposture. If a person had sold any thing in the morning, it was allowable for him to retract his bargain, upon offering restitution before sun-set; a custom that opened a large field of corruption and fraud; for if you had bought only a fowl or an egg, it was a risque to eat it before next day, as you were subjected to pay ten times the value, should restitution be offered, and you unable to produce the equivalent. However, those pernicious and dirty practices are in a good measure abolished, commerce with strangers having shewn them the necessity of paying the strictest attention to their word, and being delicate in points that affect their credit.

THEIR mode of salutation is to shake hands; but if a man salutes a woman, he runs his nose close to her, as if to smell her, and falls back twice. It is the grossest indignity to offer the left hand in salutations. When a man returns to his family after an absence of two or three days, his women throw themselves on their knees before him, an omission of which is deemed a heinous crime, and a proof of her little esteem for her lord and tyrant. Fora merly it was customary, when a woman offered her husband any thing to drink, that she first fell down on her knees and tasted it; whence voyagers deduce, that the practice of poisoning had been frequent in this country.

WRITERS assert, that nothing is more easy than to distinguish a native of Mandingo or Flup, from their extreme flat noses and thick lips, they being in this respect the ugliest of all negroes in the eyes of an European, but in their own the handsomest. Janequin, however, in his journey to Libya, affirms, that those features are by no means natural to them, but the consequences of that custom of suckling children over their shoulders, when they are employed in any other business<sup>d</sup>. More attributes it to the great care taken to form their features to that cast, nothing in their opinion being so beautiful as large nostrils, flat b noses, thick lips, and among the women large, loose, and flabby breasts.

IMMEDIATELY after a child is born, he is bathed in cold water three or four times a day, and after being carefully dried, anointed with palm-oil along the spine, elbows, hams, and neck. They go naked to the age of eight or ten, and frequently paint their faces and breasts for ornament. Sound health and fertility in marriage are the common qualities of almost all the negroes of this country, it being equally difficult to find an infirm young man, and a barren woman; they are, however, subject to some very dangerous acute diseases, but few chronical, the small-pox in particular making terrible havock, and sweeping off incredible numbers every year. It must indeed be owned, that they are not wholly strangers to the king's-evil, worms, especially the Guiney-worm, which swells their
c legs to the size of their bodies, the yaws and maladies of the head; but as these are not frequent, the people may in general be reckoned, perhaps, the most healthy in the universe. Besides the inflammation in their legs, arising from that species of worm almost peculiar to this country, they are sometimes subjected to swellings, arising from other causes, among which are reckoned certain herbs, which they mix with their food, to excite mutual love and affection among the men, and raise the passions between the sexes. To all their diseases they apply no other remedies than Grisgris or Fetiches; a superstition that extends even to their hair, and their bows which hang over their shoulders.

EVERY part of domestick oeconomy is left to the care of the women, while the men cultivate the small quantities of rice wanted for the family, and pass the rest of their time in d the indolent manner we have described. After laying up a quantity sufficient for the consumption of the family, the women have a right to dispose of the rest, but are accountable for the profits that arise to their husbands. The same regulations take place in regard to their poultry, of which they breed a great number, these two articles being their principal support, and the staples of commerce, next to slaves. Many of the Mandingoes have a pride in keeping a crowd of slaves, whom they treat with such gentle usage, kindness, and humanity, that it is not easy to distinguish the master from the slave; especially the women, who wear necklaces, bracelets, and ear-rings of amber, coral, and silver, as if the men had purchased them only to become their husbands. Moore affirms, that he has seen female slaves wear trinkets to the amount of thirty pounds sterling in value. Most of these slaves
e are born in their families, and naturalized to them as their own children. At Butto, there is a whole village of two hundred souls, composed of female slaves, all of them belonging to one nobleman of Mandingo, who treats them with the tenderness of wives and children. In most other parts of Africa, the master has a right to sell all slaves born in his family; but in Mandingo this is treated as a crime; inasmuch, that if any of them are disposed of without their own consent, and against the will of their fellow slaves, they all abandon their master, and seek a retreat in some other kingdom: for though in this case he has no power to punish them, yet they reckon it dishonourable to enter into the service of another master in the same kingdom.

Kingdom of Fuili, or Fouli, or Pholey.

f THIS large country is divided from the kingdom of Jaloff, which we shall describe in this section, by the lake called, in the language of the Mandingos, by the name Kayor. From this lake to the village of Embakane, on the frontiers of Galam, that is, from west to east, it stretches about 187 miles, but its limits from south to north are not ascertained; though travellers affirm, that it extends a great way southward. The reason why the frontiers of all these kingdoms, bordering on the rivers Gambia and Senegal, are so inaccurately marked is, that the French and English, who were furnished with the best opportunities, made commerce the sole object of their care, neglecting every thing that did not assist in promoting that chief end of all their labours. The interest of their companies, as well as their own private concerns, engrossed all the attention of the factors, and they gave, <sup>a</sup> no more of their time to the gratification of their curiosity and their passion of knowledge, than what was necessarily spent in the pursuit of riches. All then that we know with certainty of this powerful kingdom is, that its boundaries are of great extent, its lands fertile, its inhabitants numerous, and capable of rendering themselves a rich and happy people, were their industry in any degree proportioned to the advantages of nature, by means of which they might drive a prodigious commerce with foreigners. Voyagers are not agreed upon the etymology of the name Fouli, nor is their language sufficiently known to afford room for such an inquiry. They are in general of a tawny complexion, though many are of as fine a black as the Mandingoes. It is supposed that their alliances with the Moors have given them that mixed colour, between the true olive and the black. Their <sup>b</sup> stature is rather low, but their gait comely, and their shape easy and genteel, with an air peculiarly delicate and taking. However indolent they may be in pushing all the trade the country is capable of supporting, they are by no means so in private industry, which they cultivate with as much assiduity as other negroes. They are diligent farmers and graziers, and raise millet, rice, tobacco, cotton, pease, roots, and fruits, with abundance of care; nor are they less expert in rearing cattle, in which consists a great part of their traffick with the neighbouring countries. Their mutton is sweet and delicate, their beef fat, and their goats the best which are to be met with almost in any part of Africa; and hence it is, that their markets are better stocked, and their kitchens supplied with the most luxurious plenty of any negro people, unless we except the Whidans. The Foulis are fond of hunting, <sup>c</sup> and extremely skilful and eager in the chace. The elephant is the object of their diversion, of which they are never disappointed, as the country is filled with these monsters. The sword and dart they manage with great dexterity against this furious animal; and such as have been taught the use of fire arms by the French, have applied them to great advantage, both in hunting and in battle. Their disposition is lively, and their manners polite. Fond they are to excess of European commodities; but as they are much addicted to pilfering, they prefer gaining possession of them by stealth to a regular and fair commerce. They love music so much, that their princes reckon it an accomplishment to be able to touch an instrument with a genteel air; while their neighbours of Jaloff condemn music as <sup>d</sup> an effeminate soft exercise, that degrades the character of a man. Their musical instruments are various, and their compositions tolerably melodious, tender, and pleasing; and as dancing is almost a natural consequence of their love of music, their passion for it is such, that they will dance three or four hours after the hardest labour, by way of relaxation*.

THE women are low, but well shaped and handsome. Their features are delicate, the air of their face sweet, and the symmetry regular. Their hair, which is long, like the Moors, is of a shining jet, soft and thick, nor are they at all negligent of it, dressing it in different fashions composing their chief labour, next to dancing and music, which the females of this country carry to a pitch of extravagance. They are passionately fond of French cottons and morees, of which they make long flowing robes, extremely becoming, were they made of silk, which Labat is amazed the European factors have not introduced <sup>e</sup> here. The women, he observes, fall into fits of spleen, and are seized with the vapours, whenever their husbands refuse to gratify their passion for dress; and this he makes use of as an argument of the power the women have over the men, and the facility with which they introduce any fashion that would set off their charms.

THE account which Jobson gives of this people is somewhat different, and perhaps not very consistent with the above. This traveller affirms, that the women are tall and handsome in face and person; but that the men are not proportionably large or agreeable, which he attributes, though falsely, to the nature of their employment and living. As their chief wealth consists in their cattle, they lead a wandering life, and roam about from field to field, from country to country, with large droves of cows, sheep, goats, and horses; <sup>f</sup> for although they have some fixed habitations, yet they use them but little, removing as the dry or wet seasons require, from the low to the high lands, residing in no one place longer than the pasture for their cattle will admit of. An hard laborious life, says our author, that is greatly increased by the continual necessity they are under of defending themselves and their cattle against the depredations of those fierce animals, with which the country abounds, lions, tigers, and elephants, assailing them from the land, and crocodiles from the rivers. At night they collect their flocks within a circle of tents and huts, in which they live, and where they light large fires to terrify those animals from approaching them; but we must acknowledge, that we do not see how all this should suppress their growth, as the nature of such an employment cannot be so laborious as to constrict the <sup>g</sup> solids, or produce the effects of untimely old age, which sometimes happens from hard painful exercises of mind or body. Besides, the Foulis have all the advantages of climate they

a can desire; nor will the comparison he makes with the Tartars by any means hold, the latter being equally pinched in their growth by cold and by poverty. Hence it is, that we are inclined rather to credit the relations of Labat and De Brue than of this author, who seems to have formed his general idea of the nation from some particular instances.

In their peregrinations through the kingdom, this people carry on a trade with other commodities besides their cattle; for they sell milk, cheese, butter, all of them equal to any to be met with in Europe; and these they carry in baskets and gourds, so neat and clean, as would do credit to the most refined dairy in Europe. The women have the sole care of this traffick, and they exchange their goods for those trinkets on which all negroes put so high a value, glass beads, bits of coral, and little knives; but salt is the commodity b they prefer to all others, which they call ramdam. Jobson and his company were so delighted with the spirit of these women (though in another place he says, this people are but a degree less stupid than their cattle) that they continued all day in bargaining with them, in order to engage their company longer. They observed that the smallest mark of contempt, the slightest reflection upon their merchandize, kept them whole weeks away, which seems to be a proof of the great delicacy and sensibility of their disposition, and a kind of presumption, that neither sex merits the epithets of stupid and ignorant, which he so liberally bestows on them: for it may be laid down as a general maxim, that the tempers of both sexes differ but little in the general run of a whole nation, the disposition depending no less upon the manners and customs of people, than upon nature itself: or, to go higher, the c manners are formed from the natural disposition of both sexes, without depending wholly upon either.

THE Mandingoes have erected a kind of tyranny in Fouli, and by virtue of it seize upon the wealth of the kingdom. Their power arose not from conquest, but from constant migrations into this from their own country, a few coming at a time, not probably with any view of one day becoming masters of the kingdom and a deep refined policy; but from motives of private conveniency and choice. But finding their numbers so considerable, they were induced to usurp that superiority their strength could maintain over the natives and lawful possessors. They submit however to the former government, and have rather undermined the private property, than overturned the public government. Moore says, d that in every province you will meet with troops of Mandingoes, who greatly resemble the Arabians in some of their manners and language, which, like the Latin in Europe, is become the learned language of all the schools on this coast of Africa. Almost all the Pholeys, as Moore calls the Foulis, speak it, though they have a proper language of their own.

THE king of this country is called a siratick, and though he seldom appears with the badges of majesty, he is a prince of great authority over his subjects, and as much respected by his neighbours as any on the coast; yet does he govern with so much moderation and gentleness, that all his decisions seem to be those of the people assembled in a body, rather than of a single person. Jobson says, that they never remove from their habitations, or drive their cattle into another field, without leave from their prince; he probably means some of his officers settled in the large villages; for it is inconceivable, that, in e so large a kingdom, they should be able to apply to court upon every trivial occasion. Besides, Labat, Moore, and De Brue, affirm, that they ever form societies, and build towns, without being at all constrained to wait for the king's leave, or even at the trouble of afterwards gaining his approbation. The Mndingoes assume still higher privileges, and take it upon them, if not to dispute with the king, at least to avoid his displeasure, by removing in a body from one province to another, as soon as the prince has laid a tax upon that province, for the support of his civil list and dignity. Among his vassals, the siratick of Fouli reckons the king, the great brak, and all the lords and nobles of Hawal, who pay him every fourth year a tribute of forty-three slaves, and a certain number of cattle.
f His army is no less strong in cavalry than in infantry; for the Moors, his neighbours, furnish him with as many horses as he pleases. The arms used by his troops are bows and sabres, and his nobility are dispersed among the provinces, to execute the various military and civil offices, that become their station and circumstances in life. The employment next in rank to that of siratick, is the lieutenant governor's, who is looked upon as the representative of his majesty's person, and attended by a court little inferior to royalty itself; after him, the officers next in quality are, the solidné, ardobude, gheri sambu, lama de bossé, farma vavalarde, akson, boukar, lanktor, lali, lamenage, ardogbedè, farbe voagali, &c. a list
g of names which we enumerate, rather to give the reader some notion of their language, than that we are able to prefix clear ideas to each, and distinguish the duties of each office. All we know of them is, that every man raised to those posts holds them conditionally, that he furnish the siratick with his contingent of foot and horse to be ready upon a call; their charge to be supported by the sale of such prisoners as are made by that division of the army: and besides, by selling for slaves all such negroes within their jurisdiction as are not in arms for the king, or have refused to enlist themselves; a privilege which even the king cannot deprive them of, without destroying the fundamental maxim of government, notwithstanding they frequently use it to the worst of all purposes, the gratification of a sordid avarice, the oppression of the poor, and the satiating revenge and private animosity<sup>f</sup>.

Laws of succession.

History of the prince of Sambaboa.

By the established laws of this monarchy, and indeed of a number of negro kingdoms, although none but princes of the blood can be called to the throne, yet the crown descends not from father to son, but from brother to brother, or nephew to nephew; that is, if the king have no brother, his rights descend to his nephew by his full sister, or in preference to the son of his mother's daughter only, as the blood royal is most assuredly untainted in the female line. With regard to the children of the king, their blood is always dubious, as the king's women generally indulge themselves in acts of gallantry and intrigue: nor is it thought very safe to rely on their word, since the methods anciently used to oblige them to a true confession are now abolished. The only instance in which the king's sons pretend to the throne, is when they have married a princess of the blood, because in that case, the blood is sure upon one side at least; and if by any accident they fail of succeeding themselves, the right of their children is however indisputable, and always admitted<sup>g</sup>. But without regard to these customs, the siratick siré, who reigned towards the close of the last century, endeavoured, from a natural affection for his children, to raise them to the throne, and with that view he invested the eldest with the dignity of kamalingo, a post always filled by the presumptive heir. The prince of Sambaboa was at that time possessed of the office, but deposed, to make room for his cousin the siratick's son, notwithstanding his amiable qualities had attracted the esteem and engaged the affections of the nobility and people, who had long with pleasure beheld him as the heir apparent. He was the king's nephew, handsome in his person, easy in his address, of noble sentiments, liberal and generous in his disposition, and of approved courage, which he had often signalized against the enemies of his country. Such was the person removed to make way for the young siratick; a circumstance that gives us a mean idea of the old king's policy, though we cannot blame his preferring the interest of a son to that of a nephew, had the latter been possessed of less amiable qualities. The old siratick intended to have confined his nephew; but, penetrating into the king's intentions, he withdrew from court under a strong guard; and although he had nothing to fear from the negroes, who were to a man strongly attached to him, yet knowing that his uncle had drawn over the Moors to his views, he retired to the frontiers to avoid involving the nation in a civil war, and bringing those calamities upon the people, which they might avoid under the government of the worst of princes. However, all his endeavours could not prevent numbers of the nobility from joining themselves to his fortune, and forsaking their country, rather than their affections and zeal for so esteemed a prince; acession which the enraged siratick looking upon as a kind of rebellion, raised a numerous army to suppress. As the siratick with his army advanced, Sambaboa, who resolved not to draw his sword against an uncle to whom he had always given the name of father, continued to retire; but at last finding himself hard pushed by this defensive war, his faithful attendants exposed to all the calamities of fugitives and outlaws, and lastly, that the command of the king's army was given to his rival, who had usurped his dignity, he determined to come to an action. His cousin, whose forces were greatly superior, better provided, and flushed with what they esteemed equal to victory, driving the enemy before them, did not at all hesitate to embrace the occasion. A battle was fought, Sambaboa was victorious, and the siratick's son, with his potent Moorish army, totally defeated, through the conduct of the brave prince and his intrepid faithful little army. Reflecting, however, upon the consequences of a civil war, which must inevitably terminate in the ruin of the people, and in establishing more firmly the power of the Moors, who were already possessed of the confidence of the monarch, he took the noble resolution of removing into some distant kingdom, and sacrificing every ambitious view to the duty to his country and uncle, who he desired might die in peace; after which, he thought he might recover the throne through the affections of the people, in spite of all the arts made use of to supplant him. A conduct that reflects equal honour upon him, and disgrace on more enlightened princes, who for a petty state, or trifling additional title, lay aside natural affection, duty to their people, the ties of friendship, the most solemn engagements, and whatever ought to be dear to reason, honour, and religion.

THE old siratick, whose mind seems to have been enervated with age and bodily infirmities, fell on a sudden into the most austere fit of devotion, from a life not very strict or scrupulous; and this made him commit the government of the realm into the hands of his son, while he spent his whole time among the marbuts, placed round him by

- a the insidious Moors, to draw his attention from the affairs of the nation by religious zeal, and thereby to establish their own influence the more firmly. They knew the young siratick rested his security upon their support, and that, by raising him to the throne, they might get the reins of administration into their own hands; it was their business therefore, to shut the old king's eyes against the merit of his nephew, which could not be done while he continued to meddle with the public affairs, and the marbuts were made the pious instruments of this artful policy. Their endeavours were soon followed with all the success they could wish; that weak old prince became so passionately enamoured of the alcoran, that he carried a huge folio of text and glossaries upon the doctrine of Mohammed slung about his neck; although he laboured under the enormous weight of this sacred burthen, inclosed in leaves
- b of massive silver, yet would he never lay it aside, or be prevailed upon to change it for a more commodious and portable copy. He heaped honours, preferments, and wealth, upon the marbuts, who had always access to him under the cloak of devotion. So intirely was he weaned from all temporal concerns, that he looked upon a pilgrimage to Mecca as the highest proof of human wisdom, of pure religion, and claiming the best right to the title of saint; the highest dignity that human nature was capable of acquiring. He had sent one of his prime ministers into the kingdom of Kayor, to conduct from thence, at a great expence, a celebrated marbut, of whose virtues he had been told some marvellous stories; and this same saint and his noble attendant made a visit to the French, in the isle of St. Lewis, by whom, out of respect to the siratick, they were received with great honours and extraordinary marks of distinction.

- c THE banishment of Sambaboa continued for the space of thirty years, part of which time he lived upon the frontiers of Fouli, perpetually in arms to defend himself against the attacks of the Moors, and the artifices of the young siratick. At length he demanded protection of the king of Galam, and a safe retreat into his dominions; which that prince, after having been informed of his character, readily granted; though at first hearing only of his valour, he was greatly embarrassed how to conduct himself in so delicate a situation, fearing on the one hand to offend such a hero, or to violate the rights of hospitality, and on the other, to admit so dangerous a prince into the bowels of his kingdom. Being acquainted with the cause of his banishment, the justice, the piety, and the valour, of this unfortunate prince,
- d he sent a great body of his nobility to conduct him into his dominions, assigned lands for his support, officers for his household, and treated him in every respect with those honours due to his rank and character; a conduct of which he had never reason to repent, as the fugitive prince ever repaid it with the utmost fidelity, attachment, and gratitude. In this situation he lived many years, adored by the king of Galam, beloved by the nobility, and the idol of the people, who wanted nothing so much as to raise him to a throne, to which he formed no pretensions: such, however, was his prudence and moderation, that the wishes of the people excited no jealousy either in the old king of Galam, or the prince his successor; they too well knew the equity of Sambaboa, and the inclinations of the Foulians, to apprehend a rivalry. In the year 1702, as he was beginning to sink under age and mis-
- e fortunes, his uncle died, his cousin was deposed, and Sambaboa called by the numerous voice of the people, to fill that throne, from which he was so long banished, and reign over that people who always loved him.

- f His reign began with expelling the Moors, who had caused so many misfortunes to the nation, with fortifying several provinces that lay exposed to the insults of the neighbouring states, and with reforming all those abuses which had crept into the administration, during the indolent and weak reign of his uncle. His wise design was to render his people happy, and himself secure, by the felicity he communicated to them; but he was cut off in the midst of all those joyous prospects by a sudden death, which De Brue scruples not to attribute to poison; and the artifices of the Moorish priests, and the deposed prince, son to the late king. He was succeeded in the throne by Samba Dondè, who soon afterwards fell in battle, by the hands of his own brother, Bubaka Siré, raised upon this event to the crown; an usurpation of which he was in a short time deprived, by Gbelongbaya, a person he had elevated from a low station, to the high rank of kamalingo<sup>h</sup>.

- g It may not be amiss to relate some transactions that passed between Sambaboa and the French factory, on the island of St. Lewis, as they will help to elucidate the character of that great prince, and afford us a specimen of the insidious and artful conduct of those French merchants. Prince Sambaboa had two strong causes of complaint against the company, the first of them of such a nature as to be palliated by no excuse. It happened in the year 1680, at the time when that prince was embroiled in a quarrel with his uncle. Being upon the eve of a battle with the siratick's army, the event of which he foresaw would be doubtful, he committed his treasure, to the amount of a thousand crowns, into the hands of a French factor, to be kept till the sword had decided his fate; a deposit which this treacherous friend thought fit to appropriate to his own use, and convey into the island of St. Lewis, from whence the prince could never recover a shilling. The next occasion of complaint arose from the imprudence of the Sieur Chambonneau, the director general, who had taken one of the prince's women, upon her dropping some hints about the coldness of her husband, who bestowed all his favours upon her rivals. It must be acknowledged, that both these actions deserved the severest chastisement, and the prince had all the opportunities of revenge he could wish, long before his restoration, as the king of Galam had frequently offered him an army to redress his grievances; but revenge was not agreeable to the disposition of this amiable person; and the French company was an object too mean to call for his vengeance; however, he still harboured some dislike against the French, and these notions they were, which De Brue had the address to remove, after the prince's restoration. No sooner was he seated on the throne, than De Brue sent a letter of apology, accompanied with some handsome presents. By this embassy the king was assured that the company had no concern in the fraud of their factor, whom they would have punished, had he not avoided the law by a speedy retreat. They likewise protested to the king, that if he could seize the culprit, they would cheerfully resign him to the punishment which his conduct so well merited. As to the princess, whom Chambonneau had seduced, they blamed the credulity of the director; but assured his majesty at the same time, that he had been deceived by the information of her brother, who protested that his majesty desired nothing more than being rid of her. They farther declared, and De Brue staked his honour, that she should immediately be surrendered, if his majesty required it<sup>1</sup>.

Nothing could be farther from truth than the whole of this justification; but the address of De Brue, and perhaps the prudence of the monarch, who was desirous of cultivating a strict correspondence with the Europeans, made it all pass for sacred. The French congratulated themselves on the refinement of their policy, and the prince was contented with enjoying the advantages which resulted from a perfect harmony with the French (A).

Character of the Fouliaus.

THE people of Fouli are celebrated by travellers as an extreme hospitable nation, all persons, without distinction of country, being freely admitted into their huts, and the best accommodations they can afford; nor is their humanity in any other particular less commendable; for as soon any of them has the misfortune to fall into slavery, all the rest join stock to redeem him. When any of them is well stored with provision, no poor person goes away empty handed; or rather every thing necessary to life is made common, and only that looked upon as private property, which supplies the luxuries of living, and creates the distinction of rank. Moore says, that quarrels are so rare among them, that his long stay afforded but one instance, where a Fouliau was insulted by another; which proceeds not from their tameness or want of courage, for there is not in all Africa a braver people, or men who know better how to resent an injury<sup>k</sup>. Even the Jaloffs themselves dare not attack them; but their politeness, their natural affection, and naturally mild disposition, are perhaps without example; a character that does not perfectly agree with what Jobson alleges, or indeed with the relation of the civil wars we have just recited from De Brue. According to Moore, their arms are composed of bows and arrows, lances, swords, daggers, and occasionally a kind of small fusée, all of which they use with great dexterity, and an address superior to most negro nations, particularly in hunting, a diversion in great esteem among them. Elephants, lions, tygers, and the fiercest animals, are the game they pursue. Twenty or thirty of them, some on foot, some on horseback, follow the chase, and seldom return but laden with the spoils of some of these desperate enemies. The elephants teeth, the lions, leopards, and tigers skins, they sell, and the flesh is smoked and dried for use and winter store. In such numbers are the elephants bred here, that they are seen in droves of two hundred together, plucking up the small trees, and destroying whole fields of corn with their terrible trunks; pleasure therefore alone is not the object of their hunting, but necessity and self preservation.

(A) About this time, De Brue engaged in another negotiation, which he conducted in such a manner, as to acquire great honour to himself, and considerable advantages to the company. The daughter of the siratick fire, married to Lali Lord of the Red Country, had left her husband from some notions of jealousy, or inconstancy, and retired to her father, who refused to send her back. De Brue was so closely linked in alliance with Lali, that, by his good offices, he obtained in 1720, at a low price, about 1600 quintals of gum for the use of the company, charging himself at the same time with procuring the restitution of his wife. This cost him no more than one letter to her father, and a few well directed presents. The lady was sent back to her husband, and Lali, in acknowledgement of his obligation to the company, permitted them not only to establish factories in every part of his dominions, but invested them with the intire property of the island of Sadel, to settle colonies, build forts, or do whatever they pleased with it. De Brue besides got the thanks of the lady's mother, which she expressed by a number of genteel presents, and acts of civility (1).

(1) Labat, t. iii. p. 293.

As to the dress of the Foulians, it is as peculiar to themselves as some of their customs; but it would be difficult to convey an idea of it in words. Sufficient it is, that it is composed of white cotton cloths, agreeably folded round their waists, all of the manufacture of the country, nothing else being permitted to be worn there: a prudent institution, that greatly promotes trade and industry, and first set on foot by their wise prince the Siratick Sambaboa. This is all we know of this people, except their religion, which they have in common with the Jaloffs, Mandingoes, and other inhabitants of the rivers Gambia and Senegal, and which we shall describe under one general head.

Of the customs and manners of the Jaloffs, or properly Oualoffs.

BEFORE we come to speak particularly of this potent nation, it may not be improper that we lay down, as minutely as our authorities will permit, the precise situations of the Mandingans, Fouli, and Jaloffs, as those are the three great states to which all the others are tributary, and, in a measure, dependent. The last-mentioned nation is by much the most powerful, though perhaps the least extended in territory. The Fouli inhabit the interior country on both sides the river Senegal, stretching from north to east; the Jaloffs stand south of them, and extend westward along the ocean, possessing all that tract of country across Cape Verd, from the river Senegal to Gambia; and the Mandingoes lie south and east of the Jaloffs, occupying both sides of the river Gambia from its source perhaps to the ocean. No historians pretend to mark the precise limits of either of these nations; and we are only able to speak in general terms, and rather from conjecture, than actual mensuration or positive authority: for though the navigation of these rivers is well known, yet no Europeans have penetrated far enough into the country on each side to give us an accurate geography, much less a topography, of which we are intirely ignorant.

THE Jaloffs, Jaloifs, or, according to some writers, Ghialoffs, or Oualoffs, inhabit, by Moore's description, the north side of the river Gambia, stretching a great way into the interior country, and likewise to the river Senegal; so that they and a part of the country of the Fouli border on each other*. They are of an exceeding black and more beautiful complexion than most of the surrounding nations; nor have they, like the Mandingoes, flat noses, or thick lips, the characteristics or distinguishing marks of almost all genuine negroes. Moore assures us, that he had seen numbers of this nation, all of whom had a smooth black skin, and fine regular features. Barbot, speaking in general of the negroes on the banks of the rivers Gambia and Senegal, and the intermediate coast, says, that they are of a beautiful black complexion, strait, well made, active, and robust: that their teeth are small, white, and regular; their nose rather flat, and lips thick, but not in that extreme observable in almost all other negroes†. From these descriptions one may conclude, that the Jaloffs are distinct from the other natives, as well in features as in customs, laws, and manners (L). No author besides Moore seems to have distinguished the native Jaloffs from an infinity of other nations intermixed with them; and this seems to be the cause of that diversity of descriptions we meet with. What seems to confirm the truth of Moore's relation is, the acknowledgement of all writers, that the notions of beauty the Jaloffs entertain are much the same with those of the French: they admire a small well-proportioned nose, little mouth, thin lips, with a gentle pouting in the under lip, and lively eyes: for it is seldom that a people does not fix the standard of beauty among themselves, and judge by that symmetry of features the most familiar to them.

Character of the Jaloffs, or Oualoffs.

AUTHORS differ no less with respect to the qualities of the mind than those of the body: Moore admits, that their disposition is in general warlike, their constitutions vigorous and strong; but asserts, that they are good-natured, generous, and hospitable; whereas Barbot paints them as the most treacherous, lascivious, and villainous people upon the face of the globe. They are, says that writer, debauched, lazy, impudent, cowardly, vindictive, haughty, vain, and much addicted to theft and lying. They equally indulge in eating, drinking, venery, and every other kind of intemperance; nor will they stumble at any means to gratify those desires: friendship, honour, oaths, and religion, are all set at nought, wherever their passions stand in the way; that their treachery in trade cannot be paralleled.

(L) Villault, describing the inhabitants of Rio Fresco, near Cape Verd, a people probably the same with the Jaloffs, or rather a part of that nation, says, that he never met with one flat-nosed or thick-lipped person of the nation; an account quite the reverse of Le Maire (2).

The inhabitants of the towns of Joali, Portodalli, and Yaca, are the greatest thieves in nature, especially the latter, who have the address to steal from the Europeans while they are smiling in their faces, without being perceived. Barbot has seen them make use of their feet in these employments, while their hands have been busied in some obliging office. But we must observe, that our author speaks here of the natives of the coast. Labat makes much the same remark on the Jaloffs towards Senegal. It is not upon their hands only, says that writer, that you must fix your eyes, if you would prevent their frauds, but on their feet likewise; for, from a habit of going barefoot, they acquire the same dexterity in those parts as Europeans have in their hands, and will even pick up a pin with their toes off the ground. If they chance to see a knife, scissars, or toy, that attracts their inclinations, they will turn their backs upon it, engage you in conversation, and slyly seize it between their toes, with which they have the art of throwing it into a kind of pouch, which they wear behind. Nor do they deal much more honestly with their countrymen of the inland parts, to whom they give the name of simple mountaineers; for, when they come to trade to the coasts, the maritime negroes immediately offer their service in carrying their goods, which they seldom quit before they have stole half, while the owner stands amazed by what enchantment and conjuration he should be so great a loser, while his eyes are kept constantly fixed on his property <sup>m</sup>.

BUT they go still great lengths; and where address fails, they scruple not to have recourse to force, assassination, and the most cruel murders, which are seen every day on the highways. To such a degree of barbarity do they carry their avaritious disposition, that many of them sell their fathers, mothers, children, and neighbours; of which Barbot gives a great number of instances. Le Maire gives one ridiculous example of this practice: an old negro intending to sell his son, sent him with a load to the French factory; but the young man, suspecting his father's design, resolved to out-wit him, and accordingly hastened to the factor, to sell the old parent; so that on his arrival he was seized, as the property of the merchant. The old man cried out in vain, that he was the father of that monster who had sold him; but the son swore vehemently it was false, and the bargain remained firm. The son, returning home triumphant with the price of the father's liberty, was met by the lord of the district, pillaged of his ill-got riches, and carried as a slave to the very person who had just before bought his father. A number of children are daily kidnapped by their neighbours, who have found them strolling in the woods, or driving away the birds from the corn fields and plantations, according to the custom of the country; and in times of great scarcity, many negroes sell themselves, in order to be assured of bread, and make no scruple of disposing of their children for a few handfuls of rice <sup>a</sup>.

WE are told by the same authors, that the Jaloffs are much addicted to magic and sorcery, which they exercise by the means of the grand socerer's ministers, the priests; who, they believe, have a power over serpents and monsters. Walla Filla, king of Jaala, a province of Jaloff, passed for the greatest conjurer of his time, and was reckoned the most expert poisoner in the whole country. This man could, according to the tradition of the negroes, assemble all his forces in an instant, by virtue of his art, and at the same time disperse those of the enemy. Le Maire mentions it as a proof of the stupidity of the negroes, that their interpreters are not able to give the sense or convey the meaning of a foreign tongue in their own, though they perfectly understand both languages; thus, by their dullness, occasioning numberless embarrassments in business. If they once know that they are necessary or useful to an European, then they become insupportably troublesome, are perpetually drunk; and the spirits, which they procure with great labour and pains, are squandered away prodigally in one debauch: for palm wine is not so common in this country as to become a general liquor among them. They have not the least idea of gratitude, nor the smallest notion of returning kindness by reciprocal good offices; all their actions arise from some mean, selfish view, and indirectly to gratify some brutal appetite; nay, their ignorance is so gross, that it would be difficult to make them comprehend how two and two make four. So total is this stupidity, that they know not their own age, or the day of the week, for which they even have no names: and indeed the only virtue of which they are possessed is hospitality, if it be a virtue in them, who invite a stranger to their houses only that they may gain by them <sup>o</sup>.

BARBOT, speaking of the Jaloff princes round Senegal, compares them to the worst of the Mandians, another nation he has celebrated for their vices; but they join cunning to their impudence. They begin a bargain or treaty with begging trifles that cannot well be refused, in order to sound the temper of the person they have to do with: if they find a his disposition easy, they proceed to ask things of more consequence, and in such a manner that they cannot be refused without breaking with them, and destroying all hopes of trade. In general, there is no method of checking their avarice, but by obstinately refusing them every thing they ask: this will sometimes have the effect, and at other times so enrage them, that they avoid all communication, and seize every opportunity of doing you an injury. Their princes are so basely impudent in this begging trade, that, if a well-dressed European visits them, they will successively ask for every thing he has about him; for instance, they will beg leave to try on his hat, sword, gloves, &c. till they have got possession of all, and then force only can get them returned. However, the Jaloff princes towards Gambia are more modest, honest, and humane, and indeed of a character altogether the reverse of the former. They are less avaricious, less mean, and at the same time less proud, except where certain ceremonies require a decent dignity. Their estates consist chiefly in droves of camels, dromedaries, cows, goats, millet, and fruits. In the audiences they grant the Europeans, they always appear with a becoming magnificence, and great decorum of behaviour. They are usually seated on a throne, and covered with a long red or blue robe, adorned with the tufts of hair from the tail of an elephant or some other wild animal, little pieces of ivory or coral, and a crown of osiers on their head, decked with little horns of small deer, antelopes, and other animals. They proceed with great solemnity to the place of audience, which, in fine weather, is generally under the shade of a great tree, round which their guards are ranged, and always with a pipe of tobacco in their mouths. In all these audiences the Arabs and Moorish marbuts have liberties allowed them superior to the negroes; but the French have some exclusive privileges, denied to all other nations. Nothing can exceed the dignity with which those princes take the pipe from their mouths, to interrogate an ambassador, concerning his commission, and the particular business for which he demanded an audience: this they do with a kind of gravity and solemnity of countenance, and manner altogether peculiar, and of which an European, who has not seen it, can have no idea. It would be unnecessary to enlarge farther upon these minutiae of character; we shall therefore proceed to their civil policy, government, and religion °.

d ROUND Senegal the Jaloffs, we are told, call the princes of the blood by the name of tenbala, and the nobles by that of sabibobo. Le Maire says, that the damel, or prince of that country nearest the Senegal, has under him two officers of the highest rank; the one, called kondi, presides over all military affairs, and commands his armies; the other, called the great jarafo, sits at the head of civil affairs, and is chief in all courts of justice, the damel himself having no power to reverse his decrees. He makes circuits round all the provinces, to hear complaints and redress grievances; so that no people of so bad a character are more happily governed, or live in a more peaceable manner. Another officer, called the alkair, a word of Moorish extraction, is treasurer to the crown, and exercises much the same function with the jarafo, but in a narrower compass: he too has under him subaltern alkairs, or alkades, who are the chiefs in the villages where they reside, and a kind of justices of the peace; though appeals in all cases of consequence are made to the jarafo, when he performs his circuit. Barbot relates, that all the great officers have their representatives in every large village; and that there are an infinity of *jarafo*s and alkairs in almost every province of the empire. The kondi, who, in virtue of his office, is lieutenant-general of the whole kingdom, and commander in chief of the king's armies, with a power similar to a high-constable of France, frequently makes the tour of the kingdom with the jarafo, to examine into the conduct of the alkairs: whence it seems as if the jarafo alone had no authority to call them to an account. The particular province of an alkade is to levy the rights of the crown, and taxes imposed for the support of government; though his name seems to import the governmentship of some town, village, or district (M).

e f VASCONCELOS affirms, that the negroes of the coast are greatly superior to those of Senegal in the art of government; that they are more exact in all the duties of administration, their policy more extended, and their schemes of security and aggrandizement more refined, more profound and secret: in a word, that they are more equitable in their rewards and punishments, public and private, civil and military administration: an assertion altogether opposite to the testimony of all other writers. Here the prince's privy-council is composed of persons the most venerable for their age and wisdom, and the judges of the most experienced and intelligent men of the nation. Punishment immediately follows conviction, and a thief is sold for a slave, seldom put to death. Le Maire says, that a native of Jaloff, who is accused of any crime, but cannot be convicted by positive evidence, is obliged to lick with his tongue an ignited bar of iron, strokeing it slowly over three different times. If <sup>a</sup> he resists this tryal, he is declared innocent, and the accusers obliged to go through the same tryal; otherwise the accused escapes corporal punishment, but is banished the realm. Moore relates, that the Jaloff natives, upon the river Gambia, purge themselves of crimes, by holding boiling water in the mouth; frequent instances of which he has seen: yet does not the rigour of those punishments deter them from theft and other crimes of an equally heinous nature. The reason perhaps is, that here, as well as in more civilized countries, the course of justice is often changed through corruption, money and interest having power to acquit the most notorious delinquent. Le Maire furnishes us with a very remarkable example of the power of money in preventing justice. Two petty kings, dependents on the damel, the uncle and nephew, disputed about a piece of ground, to which each <sup>b</sup> claimed a right, and at last resolved to leave the affair to the determination of the damel. The day of tryal was appointed, and crowds of people assembled from every corner of the kingdom, to see the event of a litigation so solemn and important. Both the princes prostrated themselves before their superior, and each advanced all the arguments he could in support of his claim. The nephew, who was son to the late king, concluded his harangue by representing, that the domains in dispute had belonged to his father, to whom they were given by the favour of heaven, and that it would be the highest injustice to deprive the son and legitimate heir of what the father possessed. After deliberating for some time, the damel replied, "What heaven gave to the father, I will give to the son:" <sup>c</sup> a sentence that was followed with repeated shouts of applause from the whole assembly. The justice of the damel, the praises of the nephew, and the dishonesty of the uncle, were echoed from mouth to mouth, and every man seemed happy in so equitable a decision. Next day, while the young man was ruminating upon his good fortune, he was amazed to find himself stripped of all he possessed, without any new offence or form of tryal: but he soon found, that the damel, corrupted by a large bribe, had revoked the sentence, re-established his uncle, and, to prevent his disputing this final decision, had divested him of his honours, authority, and property. What surprised him still more, was the sudden alteration in the sentiments of the people, whose love kept pace with his fortune; for they now decried him as much as they before had praised him; and his uncle, who but the day before was the subject of their ribaldry and satire, became now the object of their adoration. <sup>d</sup>

war.

As there are an infinity of petty kings included under the general name of Jaloff princes, so there are perpetual wars in some quarter or other of this large tract of country. When a rupture with some other power is resolved on, the kondi assembles the troops, which never exceed five hundred in number: thus it is that their greatest battles are really but skirmishes, in which hardly any dead are left in the field. Voyagers inform us, that in the whole kingdom of Damel there are scarce horses sufficient to mount two hundred men, and yet the strength of their armies consists in their cavalry. The king of Damel is however a potent prince for that part of the world; his armies are well supplied with provisions, and hundreds of women attend the camp every day with live stock, for the use of the troops, as well as fruits, roots, and all kinds of vegetables. Sometimes five hundred dishes of kuskas are sent into the camp, dressed and seasoned in a variety of different methods. <sup>e</sup> Such of them as suit the king's taste the best he keeps, the rest he distributes among the officers and soldiers, who never want an appetite for so delicate a regale. The arms of the cavalry are long darts, a kind of javelin, rivetted like an arrow, and short swords, which they use when they dismount; a part of discipline they are always taught, and frequently practise in battle; however, so loaded are they with grisgris, that they march but slowly on foot. The infantry are armed with scymitars, javelins, and a quiver, charged with ten or twelve poisoned arrows, a wound from which is attended with infallible death. Their bows are made of a kind of hard reed, resembling the bambou, and the cord of an elastic piece of wood, which they form with great dexterity to yield and recover its tone. All the negroes <sup>f</sup> are such excellent marksmen, that few will miss a shilling at the distance of fifty paces; but they fight in a tumultuous and irregular manner, both sides marching into the middle of the plain, pitched upon for the engagement, without any manner of order or discipline; their guirats, or instruments of war, sounding all the while, with a most horrible din. When they come within a proper distance, the infantry make a general discharge of their arrows, after which they engage sword in hand, but with such precaution, as all the while to have their commercial interest in view, making as many prisoners and as little slaughter as possible; for the prisoners of all ranks and ages are to be sold for slaves. Moore however affirms, that, notwithstanding all their care, their battles are frequently very bloody in their consequences, altho' the carnage in the field be not considerable, as few of those wounded <sup>g</sup> with their poisoned arrows ever recover. He further affirms, that the Jaloffs are particu-

a larly delicate in point of military honour, preferring death to the smallest reproach on their courage: this it is, says he, which animates them no less than the dread of slavery, to more than a natural intrepidity, and hurries them on to feats of prowess above humanity. Should the first shock of battle fail to decide victory, they will frequently renew it for several successive days; and at length, when the obstinacy of both sides begins to faint under the fatigue of action, they enter upon a treaty by means of their marbuts, who meet in the field between the two armies; and, if these holy men agree about the articles of convention, they swear upon the Alkoran and by Mohammed to be faithful to their engagements.

b MOORE and Le Maire give us sketches of the character of some princes that reigned here, The character of some Oualoff princes. when they resided in the country. The king of Howal (N), once a powerful and respected prince, was now, and since the year 1682, become tributary to another petty king, not for want of courage, but by reason of his inferior strength. His dominions stretch about fifty miles along the river, and are eight or ten miles broad, besides certain little domains and lordships about the mouth of the river, and without the boundaries we have mentioned. Although this prince is absolute in his dominions, yet does he often stand in need of a handful of millet to keep him from starving; and hence arose the cause of his subjection, poverty having effected what the sword could not. Necessity often obliged him to make incursions into the neighbouring territories, in search of slaves, cattle, and other plunder, which he immediately sold to the French for brandy. One circumstance in the conduct of c this prince deserves to be mentioned. When he had got possession of a puncheon of brandy, he first got drunk, and then ordered it to be locked up, and the key put into the hands of his favourite minister, who was obliged to ride off thirty or forty miles distance from the king. This he did by way of check on his inclinations, knowing that, if the key was in his power, he could not resist the temptation of drinking till the whole was exhausted: but the minister had often reason to repent obeying his majesty; for when the fit seized him, he immediately dispatched a messenger for his favourite and the key; and if he did not make his appearance within the time allowed by his majesty, his head became the forfeit<sup>a</sup>.

d THE damel or king of Kayor, another Jaloff prince, was no less sottish and drunken. As the French factors seldom appear before him, but to ask some favour, or complain of some of his officers, they never came to court unprovided with a dozen bottles of brandy, and were sure to meet with the most favourable reception, and have every request granted as long as they chose to keep his majesty drunk, which frequently happened for whole weeks together.

e THE Jaloffs who border on the river Gambia occupy the kingdom of Barsalli and the Kingdom of Lower Yau. Moore alleges, that the name of the royal family here is U'jai. This monarch governs with a despotic authority, all the people prostrating themselves on their faces whenever any person of the royal family appears; and from this mark of respect no degree of quality is exempted; yet does he live upon a most familiar footing and perfect equality with his troops and all the officers of his army. Every soldier has his share of the booty made in war, and the king but a certain moderate proportion, considering that he might, if he pleased, seize upon the whole. This custom it is that makes the Barsallans not only pursue a war with vigour, but continue it with obstinacy; for the soldiers, reaping the reward of their toils, refuse no hazard or fatigue to render the remainder of their lives easy. All the court profess the Mohammedan religion; though they seem to pay little regard to that part of the impostor's creed which forbids the use of wine; for the king cannot live without brandy, nor is he ever more devout than when he is drunk.

f THE general dress of the Jaloffs is a kind of loose callicoe surplice, that hangs down below the knee; which they sometimes plait about the waist, in a very agreeable manner; Dress of the Oualoffs. and the natives of Barsalli in particular wear a great number of gold trinkets in their hair, ears, noses, and round their necks, arms, and legs; but the women especially are fond of those ornaments. The king of Barsalli, whom Moore saw in 1732, had a prodigious number of women: but when he went abroad, he was seldom attended by more than two, Farther account of the king of Barsalli. who seemed to be dressed out in the whole finery and jewels of the seraglio. He had likewise a number of brethren; but it was seldom that he deigned to speak to them, and much less to associate with them; but if ever he condescended to do them that honour, they were forced to treat him with the same respect as other subjects, and prostrate themselves on the earth the moment they came into his presence, notwithstanding they were the presumptive heirs to the crown. Here indeed it is usual for the king's children to a dispute the right with the brothers, and the longest sword generally carries away the prize<sup>r</sup>.

THE usual residence of the prince is at Kabone, a town situated near the sea, an hundred miles from Jour, another town belonging to the same king on the river Gambia. When his majesty is in want of brandy, or any other necessary, he sends to beg of the governor of James-fort, that he will dispatch a boat with the merchandize he may have occasion for; to purchase which he plunders the neighbouring towns, and seizes a certain number of his subjects, whom he sells for slaves, and exchanges for European commodities. This is his method of supplying himself, if he happens to be at peace with his neighbours; for which reason the people can never be so happy and secure as when they are at war, their most cruel b enemy being their own king, and their greatest danger arising from the person who ought to protect them in their liberties, lives, and property.

HIS majesty of Barfalli has divided his kingdom into a number of provinces, over which he has set governors, called bumeys, who pay him an annual homage, and send in a certain revenue or tribute to the exchequer. Those bumeys are powerful and absolute within their jurisdictions; but they seldom carry their prerogative so far as to incur the dislike of the people, whose affections are the surest barriers against the tyrannical encroachments of the king. His majesty has notwithstanding an absolute dominion over these governors, his standing forces being at all times sufficient to reduce them to obedience, did they attempt to throw off their subjection; trials of which seldom or never occur, both sides finding it to be their interest to c live in amity, the one to acknowledge the homage that is due, and the other to require no more than is due. Thus the king enjoys a despotick dominion, without having the whole load of government upon his shoulders; the bumeys enjoy all the privileges of crowned heads, only by acknowledging a superior; and the people are in full possession of happiness, by having a kind of mediator between them and the monarch, whose slaves they are.

THE king of Barfalli maintains so strenuously the dignity of despotism, that he admits of no other counsellor besides his prime minister, that is, his prime slave: for nothing can be more servile than the implicit regard this tool of state pays to the nod of his master. The minister is at the same time the general of the king's forces, and the interpreter of his will, from the very letter of which he must never deviate. He is called the great d farbro, or master of the horse; and he likewise enjoys another office, that of bearing the sword of state before the king upon all public occasions.

MOORE describes one of the brothers of this prince as a person equally amiable in mind and body. He was, according to this author, of tall stature and genteel air, regular and handsome in his features, his skin exceeding black, his teeth white and even, his nose high, his lips thin, and eyes lively and black. Nothing could exceed the appearance this prince made, when mounted on a beautiful barb he had, finely caparisoned, with a bridle plated with silver, a handsome saddle, and stirrups of silver well polished. This horse Moore takes great pains in describing; which he believes, in point of beauty, exceeded the Bucephalus of Alexander<sup>s</sup>: but as most of our readers have a sufficiently clear idea of an Arabian steed, we c think it unnecessary to dwell upon the description of an animal that so strongly took the fancy of our author. Such is the account we have of the manners, customs, and government, of the several Jaloff nations: for though we have mentioned but a few, out of the great number of states which go by this name, yet from what is said the reader has a general idea of the people, and more cannot be expected in a work of so vast extent, and where we are describing countries known but to a few writers.

some other interior nations.

BEFORE we enter upon the religion and other particulars common to all the negroes inhabiting the banks of the rivers Gambia and Senegal, and that great tract of country lying between both, from the sea to the lakes Mabeira and Labor, we shall just give the geography of two other states that deserve some notice, as being next in power and extent to those we have f described. The first is the kingdom of Galam, situated eastward, about twenty-four miles from the bar at the mouth of the river Senegal, beginning a league below Fuabo, and extending forty-five miles up the river, to the cataract or high rock Felum. This kingdom is bordered on the north and north-west by those vast tracts of good and bad regions inhabited by the wandering Moors, and by some of the Foulis, who reside constantly in their town, and acknowledge the sovereignty of the Siratick king. On the east and north-east is the kingdom of Coffon, or Casson; whose prince has the title of Segudova, having his residence in an island, about a mile higher than the cataract of Felum. This island is formed by two branches of the river, which, after a course of above sixty miles, lose themselves in the lake Caston, a great body of water, but very imperfectly known to Europeans. They are called the black and g white rivers; probably from the colour of the sand and chanel through which they run. As the French, who have pushed their discoveries the farthest here, have never penetrated beyond

- a Govina, that prodigious cataract that had foiled all the attempts of the adventurers, sent from the island of Senegal by the Sieur De Brue, we know nothing of the extent of the kingdom of Casson, but from the Moorish merchants and negro factors, who pretend to no knowledge of the north side; but affirm, that to the south it extends to the countries of Godova and Giacca; the Mandingoes of Tamboura and Bambous being tributary, though not actually subject to it. The Cassons are said to be descended from the Foulis, to be rich, industrious, numerous, and their king the sovereign of Galam, and of most of the other states under the immediate dominion of the Siratick. The country is said to abound with mines of gold, silver, and copper, so rich that the veins appear almost at the surface of the earth; and this the natives rake off, sift, and sell as gold dust, after it has been first washed and cleaned
- b by a running stream.

LABAT says, that, before the direction of affairs at Senegal came into the hands of the Sieur De Brue, several of his predecessors had formed the design of accurately examining the kingdoms of Galam and Casson, with intention to cultivate assiduously the commerce which those rich countries would necessarily afford; but whether from a deficiency in power, capacity, steadiness, or from the natural difficulties which attend the execution of all new projects, it is certain they could never push their discoveries beyond Leide, Betel, or Gilde, the cataracts of the Niger being insurmountable difficulties. Without venturing to establish factories, and a regular settled commerce, they contented themselves with sending a few small vessels as far up as the river was navigable, to receive slaves, gold, and ivory, which

c the Mandingo merchants did not chuse to carry to the river Gambia: but of this we shall have occasion to speak more particularly, when we come to treat of the navigation and commerce of those two rivers; at present we shall relate those customs, which are peculiar to the inhabitants of that great tract of land lying between the rivers Gambia and Senegal, and common to them all, though distinguished into different nations<sup>1</sup> (O).

Containing a minute description of the dress, diet, marriages, education of children, and burials, of the interior negroes in general; of their language, arts, manufactures, &c. of their religion and superstitions; together with a particular account of their marbuts, or priests.

- d AS all the inhabitants of this division of Africa, except the Foulis, are of a complexion totally black, we might be expected to enter here upon a philosophical inquiry into the causes of this diversity of colours. It is the first object that strikes the imagination of travellers, and perhaps one of the most curious subjects in natural philosophy; but we chuse to refer the reader to the reflections we have already made in some of the former volumes, as nothing more than conjectures can be offered, and we see all the ingenious hypotheses formed by the French academicians overthrown by some obstinate facts, that cannot be reduced to their otherwise plausible system.

e THE common dress all over this part of Africa is a kind of shirt or surplice, and wide drawers, made of blue and white cotton cloth, the sleeves large, which they tuck up over their arms, when they are employed in any business that requires the free use of their hands, and the drawers hanging in a bag that separates their legs, and makes them straddle as they walk. On their feet they wear a kind of leathern sandals, buttoned at the instep and toes, and behind at the heel. Their heads and whole bodies, when full dressed, are covered over with grisgris: for here religious ornaments constitute the material and chief beauties of dress. Some wear a sword slung over the right shoulder, others a long dart, and others a bow and arrows; but all use a long knife by their left side, a weapon they are never seen without. We here speak of persons of better fashion, for as to the poor, they generally go

(O) It may be worth remarking, that altho' the prevailing customs of all nations inhabiting this part of Africa have so strong an analogy, that he who describes one gives a tolerable general idea of the whole, yet the remarks of most writers are confined to some particular people: and, as different authors have treated of different countries, we have thus an idea of those peculiar national manners that characterize them. For instance, Johson's remarks are confined to the Mandingoes; those of Le Maire and Labat to the Jaloffs; of Moore to the

Mandingoes and Jaloffs together; and many of Barbot's to the Foulis only: yet would each of those writers seem to convey a general idea of the whole, from observations they have made on particular kingdoms; though from comparing them, it is obvious that they are each characterized by peculiar manners, which was the reason why we treated of them separately; for we would omit nothing that could contribute to enlighten so obscure a part of history.

naked, and are at least bare-footed. As to the women, their dress consists only of a piece <sup>a</sup> of cotton, tyed round the waist, and falling down to the knee, in form of a petticoat, much in the same manner as the negroes of the Gold, Ivory, and Grain Coasts: all the upper part of the body is naked, which, for ornament, they mark, stain, and paint, with various figures and colours, which at a distance have the resemblance of a painted callicoe, or flowered stuff. Some of them have a loose piece of cotton cloth carelessly flung over their shoulder; but this is a piece of extravagance very unusual: and Moore observes, that both sexes pride themselves on having a large bunch of keys suspended to their girdles, only for the ostentation of passing for persons of wealth <sup>2</sup>,

With regard to the diet of these negroes, it is plain and simple, composed chiefly of rice, roots, and fruits, which they eat with abundance of appetite, as we may imagine <sup>b</sup> from their making but one meal a day, and that in the evening. This temperance however is not so much the result of virtue as of laziness, which prevents their going in search of game, the only animal food they use; for their cattle, sheep, and goats are carefully kept for milk. Jobson indeed acquaints us, that it is an established maxim among many of them, that abstemiousness and temperance in diet, during the hot season, contribute greatly to the preservation of health; a practice which, from their example, he strongly recommends to all Europeans, who reside in the same climate; and his reasoning it must be owned appears consonant to reason and the laws of the animal œconomy. The ordinary drink of all the negroes is water; though the better sort of people in this country use palm wine, diluted with water, and a kind of beer, called ballo, made from the grain most com- <sup>c</sup> mon here; but whether that be rice or millet we are not told. It is true they have all an extreme fondness for brandy and strong spirits; but as these are purchased from the Euro- pcans, only persons of condition are able to indulge in them to any degree of excess: yet, whatever the inclinations of the men to debauchery may be, nothing can exceed the beha- viour of the women as to temperance and simplicity of diet and drink; for they never taste any thing stronger than water, or at most a little wine or ballo, plentifully diluted.

SOME authors tell us, that the negroes make two meals a day, one about the middle of the day, the other in the evening; that they sit down to table without any of that furniture deemed necessary among us; they eat with their fingers, and always use the right hand, esteeming it an indecency to touch their food or lips with the left, which they employ in <sup>d</sup> all the meaner offices. Nor are their kings any better provided with the instruments of refinements and luxury, although they eat in state, and alone, except when they sometimes admit their high marbut to the honour of sitting with them at table. Hence it is that the negroes very unwillingly admit Europeans to their meals, as if themselves were sensible of the misery, the slovenly manner, and the clownishness of their customs, in this particular.

Marriages.

As to their marriages, we find a variety of different relations by voyagers, a particular which we attribute rather to the inconstancy of this ceremony than to the mistake and ignorance of writers. Jobson alleges, that every man has a right to marry the girl he loves, with- out regard to fortune or quality, or indeed to any other circumstance than that of maturity and a proper age; yet he allows, that contracts are seldom made without the participation <sup>e</sup> and consent of the parents, in whose hands he deposits the jointure intended, or at least a proper security for the payment. The king or chief person in the province, town, or vil- lage, holds certain rights, as the general guardian of all the girls within his jurisdiction, more especially of orphans. As soon as the preliminaries are adjusted, the bridegroom, accompanied with a number of young fellows, set out by moon-light, or at least in the night, and surround the house of the bride, in order to carry her off by force; while she and her female attendants pretend to make all possible resistance, and alarm the whole vil- lage with their cries; a coyness that is looked upon as a ceremony of course, so that no opposition is made to the ravisher, the comedy always terminating in a wedding. To such a degree of absurdity is this farce carried, that the lover haunts the house for several weeks <sup>f</sup> before, and is seen concealing himself in woods and groves around the residence of the object of his wishes, covering his face with a veil, to prevent discovery, and giving the courtship all the air of an intrigue, without which the joy is reckoned flat and insipid <sup>g</sup>.

MOORE affirms, that round the Gambia a father often betroths his daughter to some neighbouring infant on the day of her birth; an engagement so firm and binding, that it can never be retracted; nor are the inclinations of the parties themselves sufficient to dis- solve a marriage made without their consent. In general the women marry very young, and leave off bearing children at the time of life when others begin. When a marriage contract is agreed upon, the bridegroom must present the parents of his bride with two cows, a bar of iron, and two hundred kola nuts; without which ceremony the bargain is <sup>g</sup> not binding, even supposing he should have carried her home and consummated. The same a author observes, that the husband must give an entertainment, to which all the neighbours are supposed to come without invitation; and that this ceremony, the neglect of which inevitably incurs the contempt of the village, continues for three or four days. The bride is carried from her father's house upon the shoulders of young fellows, friends to the bridegroom, her face covered with a veil, which she never lays aside till after consummation; her doing this being a testimony to the whole assembly that the nuptial rites are duly performed; for the method is, that the married pair retire, while the company continue singing, dancing, and drinking, till their return.

LABAT's account of this ceremony, in the countries bordering on the Senegal, is different. Here the young lover applies to the parents of his mistress, and endeavours to win her consent through their influence, but without ever desiring or expecting that any constraint should be laid on her inclinations, which he believes must terminate unhappily to both parties. If he has been so fortunate as to gain her affections, he makes some presents to the father and mother, or nearest relations, the bride is conducted to his house, and the marriage is concluded without any other form or ceremony than a collation to the village. When she approaches the house, the bridegroom offers her his hand, to conduct her to the best apartment; where she no sooner enters, than he takes upon him the husband, and employs her immediately in fetching water, or in some other servile occupation, intimating thereby her subordination; and she respectfully retires at the first motion to execute his commands. She sups after him, attends him in quality of a servant during supper, and patiently waits his time to be led to bed; but this is an authority which only brutal husbands assume after the first night, and while it is looked upon as a marriage ceremony. If the bride is secure of her being a virgin, a thing extremely rare in any of the negro countries, she always, from a motive of vanity and compliment to her husband, spreads a white cotton cloth upon the bed, which, in token of her former chastity, and the abilities of the bridegroom, she exposes publicly to the company after consummation; by whom it is received with profound respect, and carried in triumph round the village, attended by crowds of people, with a variety of music, and great rejoicings. Labat assures us, that if the proper marks of virginity do not appear, the parents are obliged to take her back, if the bridegroom requires it: but this is a disgrace seldom put upon them, as the greatest care is taken that the bride be examined by competent judges before marriage; and should the husband chance to be disappointed, he chuses rather to keep his engagement than embroil two families, the inevitable consequence of sending back the bride<sup>c</sup>. It is true, that in many parts of this coast virginity is but little prized, the Africans as well as Europeans being greatly divided about the value of this female jewel, some deeming it above, and others below all estimation. We shall conclude our account of the nuptial ceremony, with a custom which is observed by some nations of this division, according to Janequin, a writer of some credit. By him we are told, that the bride is delivered naked to the bridegroom by her parents; that he immediately carries her before the marbut, who orders them to eat a few grains of fine sand, and to consummate the following night, this being the whole form of marriage. According to the same writer, if the marks of virginity are not evident in the morning, the husband has a right immediately to repudiate his wife; and this in some countries is esteemed so disgraceful, that a woman who cannot bear the test will rather perish than marry.

ALL authors agree, that polygamy is permitted here, with the same latitude as in all other negro countries, the husband being confined to no number, and taking as many women as his circumstances will support; but they differ greatly concerning the privileges of the husband and wife, the power given to the one, and the obedience required of the other. Jobson calls one of the women the handwife, because she always attends the husband, assumes a kind of superiority over the rest, and is in fact the mistress of the family, because she has brought him the first child, or the largest fortune, or, what is of more consequence than all, her virginity. In consequence of her station, she is exempted from many of the servile occupations in which all the rest are employed, and sometimes eats with her husband; an honour denied to the others, who eat in a little cabin apart from the principal hut, never appearing in his presence but when called, or sharing in his embraces but when satiety of the principal woman calls for variety; notwithstanding which, Jobson speaks with admiration of the harmony and perfect understanding that reigns through the whole, where all might expect to be in confusion, from jealousy, lust, and envy<sup>d</sup>.

THE punishment of adultery is, according to Jobson, no other than slavery, with this caution, that both parties be sold to the Europeans; for then they are assured that the criminals will be transported beyond sea: but Barbot observes, that if they are taken in the fact, the adulterer is put to death, and the woman repudiated, the greater guilt being always supposed to lie on the man. As for her, she returns to her parents, who are obliged a to receive her, as if nothing had happened; though in some places she is stigmatized with a mark of infamy, and forbid to associate with the other women of the family. In some cases the woman is put to death, or sold for a slave; while the man escapes unpunished; but this must be on clear evidence, that she had decoyed him into a belief of her being single. An instance of this nature happened to the lali, one of the chief officers of the damel; his wife having given him cause to suspect her fidelity, and that she had deceived her gallant, he was going to put her death, but was advised on account of her high birth, to lay his grievances before the king. The facts being clearly proved, she was sold by his majesty's order to the French factor, and the gallant not only acquitted but rewarded, for the honour he had shewn in refusing her favours, till she had convinced him that she never had been b married.

MOORE affirms, that, in general, the husband has the power of punishing the infidelity of his wife, by selling her to the highest bidder, or driving her forth out of his house with all her children, without any thing to support them. Yet notwithstanding the rigour of these laws, the women look upon an intrigue with a white as a great honour, and their husbands frequently compliment the factors with the use of their wives, their sisters, or daughters; but Barbot thinks, that this complaisance proceeds from motives of interest; as there is no tie so sacred but what they will break, nothing so base but they will commit, to gratify their strongest of passions, the love of money. Although the women are by nature not averse to gallantry, yet among them too interest is the first principle and spring of their c affections, which they always proportion to the wealth and liberality of the lover; and as they are in general tall, handsome, and lascivious, the Europeans seldom dispute with them about the price of their favours.

In this country the women are charged with all the laborious employments, and they not only perform the domestick offices, but the culture of the earth, the sowing, planting, and reaping, devolve upon them; in a word, the women here enter upon the whole province of the other sex, at least what is reckoned so in almost every part of the world besides; but although this subordination be established by custom immemorial, it reflects greatly upon a man's reputation, if he suffer the weaker sex to toil like slaves, while he is indulging in ease and luxury; and nature seems so strongly to dictate this, that, in spite of their d favourable laws and inbred laziness, they usually share the labour with the women.

AMONG the negroes of this country, whether Mohammedans or Pagans, there are certain degrees of consanguinity, which are by law prohibited from marrying; for instance, a man cannot marry his sister, his daughter, his aunt, or niece; and a king who would violate this religious law, would probably be severely censured by the marbuts. All the women are incredibly fruitful, and intrepid in child-bearing, as in the severest pains of labour they never utter a groan, or even a sigh, which would be reckoned cowardly in the most racking pangs. They seldom require the assistance of a midwife, except those who are pregnant very young, and never keep their beds above a day or two, if at all: in general, indeed, the mother and infant are immediately washed, the child wrapt up in a cloth, e tucked round the mother's shoulders, who sets about her work as if nothing extraordinary had happened (A).

FIVE or six days after birth, some writers say a month, the child has a name given it, with the ceremony of having its head shaved and anointed with oil, in the presence of five or six of the nearest relations. Their names, at least among the professors of that religion, are generally Mohammedan, such as Omar, Hali, Dimbi, Maliel, for boys; and Fatema, Alimata, Kamba, &c. for girls; after which, the child is every morning washed in cold water, and then anointed with palm-oil.

THE mothers treat their children with exceeding tenderness, sparing no fatigue or labour in indulging them, till they are able to walk, and then carefully cherishing and assiduously f attending their bodies, but neglecting their minds, till they are in a condition to provide for themselves. As they are bred in a perpetual course of idleness, their laziness becomes habitual, and seldom wears off for their whole lives; and this is all they gain by the ill judged tenderness of the mother. As to the girls, they are bred to labour from their infancy, to a reserved and modest behaviour in company, especially with their superiors and parents; but take them aside, says Barbot, and you will find that an education, not founded on principle, and instilled by example, is but of little efficacy, as there are no favours which a they will not grant for a bunch of coral and ribband, or a glass toy. Here, as well as in some other countries we have described, the woman avoids the caresses of her husband, for three years after child bearing; a custom founded upon their great affection for their children, who they imagine contract distempers from their mother's milk, contaminated by the nuptial embrace; however, their natural desires are in general too strong for their regard to their children, and it is the husband's fault if they do not shorten the period assigned by custom for this penance.

(A) To this method of carrying their children continually on their backs, Le Maire attributes the flatness of their noses, from the perpetual friction against the mother's back; but this solution not only contradicts the facts, which both he and other writers advance, that the natives of these countries have high noses, but is contrary to common sense, as the infant is turned back to back to the mother, a method frequently practised among the beggars of North-Britain, particularly in the Highlands of Scotland.

THE customs observed upon the death of any person are the same we have related in our account of the Gold Coast; the whole village being immediately apprised of the loss, by the cries and distracted lamentations of the family; the marbut, instead of the feticheers, carefully

b washing the body; and then covering it with the same cloaths the person usually wore; the relations coming one after another to propose ridiculous questions to the deceased; such as whether he was unwilling to live with them? what could put it into his head to die? whether he complained of the narrowness of his fortune? whether he had too few handsome women? or whether any of the relations had offended him, that he should take this cruel method of punishing them? On the other hand, the guirots, a species of musicians, play and sing the praises of the deceased, and a folgan, or ball, is given to all the attendants, in memory of the defunct. Slaves are sold to purchase brandy; and, after the entertainment, the cover is removed from the grave in which the body is to be deposited (B). Four of the nearest relations sustain a cloth, by way of pall, which is spread over the corpse, while the marbut c whispers certain inarticulate sounds in its ear. After this it is immediately covered with dust, the tomb-stone laid upon it, and over that a piece of cloth of any colour the relations chuse. At the head stands a jar of water, and some plates of kuskus; and near this a pole, on which are suspended the bows, arrows, darts, and sword of the deceased. In some countries they draw a deep ditch round the grave, to prevent its being dug up by wild beasts, as frequently happens where this precaution is omitted. If the deceased be a boy, the women and girls of the village chant a funeral service, while the boys run about the streets, making a dismal noise with their harsh instruments, and the clattering of arms, with which they are provided for this occasion, committing all possible extravagancies <sup>k</sup>.

WHEN a king dies, a certain time is fixed for the public mourning, which consists of a d full chorus of howling over the grave; and hundreds of negroes, who detested the deceased as a tyrant while living, now tearing their hair, beating their breasts, and pouring forth ceremonious and unfelt lamentations for his death. All the rich subjects, from every quarter of his dominions, send presents of fowls, sheep, rice, and millet, for the maintenance of the mourners, and open table is kept round the grave for several days, where nothing but mirth and riot reigns, except at the hours destined to grief. Some writers tell us, that their complaints begin at sun-rising, and continue till the evening, when the tragic farce is laid aside, and succeeded by dancing, singing, jollity, and debauchery of the most extravagant nature. Moore gives us a full account of the funeral obsequies of a captain of a village; but this was only an epitome of the ceremonies observed at the burial of a great king or damel <sup>l</sup>.

e If the king have no demands upon the estate of a deceased negro, the brothers, sisters, and other relations, enter into possession of his effects, little regard being paid to the claims of the children, unless they happen to be of an age to dispute their rights; but of the laws concerning inheritance, as well as of all other civil and positive laws, almost all the writers upon this subject have been so short, as if they imagined a true idea of a people is to be acquired, not from these, but from the general customs that prevail among them. They enlarge greatly upon their dancing, music, and exercises, while they touch slightly upon whatever characterizes the intellect, chusing rather to amuse than instruct.

(B) The Folgan is conducted in the following manner: all the young people of the village assemble in a large area, in the middle of which they light a great fire. The spectators form an oblong square at both ends, of which the dancers are ranged in opposite lines, the men on one side, and the women on the other. Two tabors regulate the dance, and as soon as they beat, the performers begin a song, which is chorussed by the whole assembly; at the same time a dancer stepping forth from each line, advances towards the opposite person he is fondest of, to the distance of two or three feet, and presently draws back in cadence, till the tabor gives the signal for them to come close, and to strike their thighs against each other; the partners being always of different sexes. This done they draw back again, and advance with different movements, accommodated to the time of music, till at length they return to their places. After every person in each line has done the same, then they all meet, and dance in chorus, with much the same movements as they did singly, if not still more lascivious and immodest. The negroes never foot it, yet is every member and joint of the body in motion, even the head and the muscles of the face playing in the most ridiculous grimace; and in this variety of distortions consists the excellency of the dancer, as it shews activity, but very little grace, or what we call a genteel air (1). Such is the method in which the negroes celebrate the last honours to a departed friend; and such are the whimsical customs of different nations; what produceth grief and melancholy in one, shall be the subject of mirth, joy, and wantonness, in another.

(1) Labat, relat. de l'Afrique occidentale, t. iv. part 4. c. 1.

As to the musical instruments of this country, it would be difficult to convey by words a an exact notion of them; we shall mention, however, some of the most peculiar and curious.
 Every village has its tontong, a kind of large drum, which is beat upon the approach of the enemy, and gives the alarm on all extraordinary occasions; and this it effectually does, as it is distinctly heard at the distance of seven miles. Jobson describes a kind of stringed instrument he had seen near the river Gambia, which we take, from his account, to be a a kind of harp. He says, it is the only instrument upon which the negroes play with their fingers; though we are at a loss to imagine how they could otherways touch the balaso or ballard, as he calls it, which, from the description of all writers, though they differ in certain circumstances, appears to be a kind of spinette, with keys and strings of various lengths and sizes. Barbot and Le Maire are persuaded, that, in the hands of a master, this instru- b ment would be very harmonious, though in the hands of the negroes it is very imperfect, but not disagreeable. Moore speaks of an instrument, to which he gives the name bulaso, which they strike with quills or bits of reed, in the manner of a dulcimer; but he has probably misapplied the name, and confounded two different instruments. As to their musicians, voyagers tell us, that they are, to a man, the worst that are to be met with in any part of the universe, and, imperfect as their instruments are, their execution disgraces them.
 We have frequently mentioned their guirots, a term which is rendered by all our English voyagers by fidler, though Nyandael, in describing the Grain Coast, speaks of those guirots as a species of bards and buffoons, of which the king and nobility retain a great number as domestics: it is possible, that both professions may be united in one, as music and poetry c are sister arts, and wit is always nearly allied to poetry. The European factors are never visited by any of the princes or nobility of the country, but they are regaled by the guirots or juddies, as Jobson calls them, who, like the Irish harpers, seat themselves at some distance from the company, and begin a sort of recitative, which they accompany with their instruments, the subject being generally extempore, and suited to the occasion, by the fertile invention of the performer; but if nothing particular offers, they then turn their songs to a panegyric, upon the antiquity, nobility, courage, generosity, and wealth of their patron, in which they are equally fulsome, flat, and insipid, as the bards of Europe, though they sometimes rise to the sublime in poetry, and a cadence not inharmonious. It is generally observed, that they succeed well in description, rather from a happy imagination than energy of diction; d for their language, if we may judge from the vocabularies we have seen, seems to be rather soft and harmonious, than expressive and strong, which indeed is the case with most of the negro languages, that have any thing in them at all articulate.

Now that we have touched upon this subject, we shall add a few observations before we quit it; and the first that occurs is, that we have not yet acquired a sufficiently clear geographical notion of this division of Africa, and of the several nations who inhabit it, to be able to distinguish their different languages, and ascertain the boundaries where one language ends and another begins; whether they all are not different dialects of the same root, and whether this might not be discovered in travelling through different nations, by which a curious ear might, perhaps, observe the language gradually softening into another form of e speech, till it acquires a totally different sound, is what we cannot determine. It is acknowledged, that only three different languages are spoken in all the variety of nations within this division; and these are, the Falofian, Foulian, and Mandingan; which have likewise a very near analogy in the manner of forming their words, though we cannot say how frequently the very same words may express the same things, with the alteration of a few letters, as no voyagers have given us the same vocabulary of words to each language. Barbot believes the Falofian to be the same as Zanguayan, or more properly the Sangayan, which Leo Africanus affirms is the common language of the interior countries of Guiney, Tombuto, Melli, and Gago; and imagines he proves it, by telling us, that Sangay was the name of the then reigning family of Barfalli; though later writers acquaint us, that it is Il'Jai. Moore says, that f the common language spoken on both sides the Gambia is the Mandingan, with which you may bargain and perform every part of trade, from the mouth of the river, to the country of the Jonkos, or merchants (C), which is a voyage of at least six weeks from James Fort;
 but a kind of corrupt Portuguese, which our author calls Creolian, is what is most commonly spoken by the vulgar natives, who trade with the Europeans; a circumstance which we think extraordinary, as the vulgar almost in all nations preserve longest the primitive language, uncorrupted by refinements, and the introduction of foreign words<sup>m</sup>.

It is this Portuguese, no more understood in Lisbon than Arabic, that is used by all the negro interpreters, when they explain any thing to the Europeans; but in many countries they are unnecessary, as there is hardly a person in the nation but speaks it. Most of the g a Foulis of the Mohammedan religion, inhabiting the river Gambia, speak a pure Arabic; tho' this is rather a learned language, it not being primitive in any one country, in a line from Cape Blanco to the great country of Nubia, bordering on the Red Sea. As there cannot perhaps be a surer method of mounting to the origin of a people, and discovering the relations between several nations, than researches into their language, we shall give in our margin a catalogue of words, in the Mandingan, Foulisan, and Jaloffian tongues, which we believe will not be unacceptable to some of our curious readers (D).

From this specimen, and the number of vowels which frequently follow each other, it is obvious, that these languages cannot be strong, on account of the great number of elisions and interruptions of the voice.

Before we proceed to the Mandingan vocabulary, we shall give a specimen of the numerals of the above languages.

Englisb.		Jaloff.		Fouli.
One	—	Ben	—	Gou

Twenty one	—	Nitte ak ben	—	Sopou gou
Thirty	—	Fomanir	—	Famanir

Thus you proceed to 20, which in both languages stands.

(2) Ak in the Jaloffian is a copulative, corresponding to our and; as thus, ten and one, or eleven.

Arts and manufactures.

AFTER the idea we have given of the general indolence of these negroes, it cannot be a expected that they should have made any great progress in trade, manufacture, or the arts ; in fact, they have no mechanics, but such as are absolutely necessary, and of these, smiths and cutlers are the principal ; for by these, the implements of war, husbandry, and fishing, are made ; indeed they comprehend under the general name of ferraro, all the workers in metals. Next in esteem to the ferraro is another artist, called sepatero, whose employment consists in making grisgris, or cases for those charms which the marbuts communicate to the

Hence we see that directly the same rules prevail in forming the numerals of the Mandingan, Fouliau, and Oualofian or Jalofian languages, each connecting the decimals by a copulative and repetition of the units; and had authors favoured us with vocabularies of the same words, it is probable, that even from a very few words we might be able to trace the mother language from which all the others have sprung as different dialects; but through time so varied as scarce to bear any resemblance to the original root. It is the observation of Moore, that the Mandingans use the word nisa as a generical term to express animals in general, and of all kinds, as cows, sheep, lions, elephants, and deer, to which they add the species and genders, as nisa mopfa, a cow. What deserves notice is, that neither of the three languages we have mentioned use any other particle than the copulative ak and ning, which, we have observed, correspond with our and; the disjunctive is wholly unknown, if we may credit voyagers, who, we fear, are not extremely critical in their remarks; and the gender is determined, not by an article, but the last syllable, or termination.

(3) In the Mandingan, they use the copulative ning, as ten and one.

- a people. This is a very profitable business, the price of labour having no other standard than the superstition of the employer, who would look upon it as the highest impiety to dispute the price of a grisgris, which would imply a contempt of the religion contained in this charm. The third mechanical employment is, that of a mason or potter, for here they are all the same, their plasterers being in truth their masons, as the whole building consists of a kind of loam mixed with lime, and likewise their potters, as all earthen ware is made by them. This artist, Labat places next in rank to the ferraro: and he likewise reckons in this class, all the women and girls employed in spinning and weaving cotton cloths, though we must own we cannot perceive the affinity between the employments. The artists in this last way have made but little progress in the trade, being confined
- b intirely to three colours, and incapable of giving their pieces of cotton above two yards in length, and six inches in breadth; which, however, they have the art of joining neatly together, to form a piece of any size, that appears to be one intire web<sup>a</sup>; but it would be unnecessary to be particular on this head, as we have already described their looms in a former volume.

- As to the articles of trade arising from their manufactures, they are but few, and bought intirely among themselves, except a few mats, pieces of cotton, some earthen ware, and other trifles, which the Europeans purchase for the use of the negroes of the Grain, Ivory, Gold, and Slave Coasts, as well as for those of Congo, Angola, &c. which they sometimes barter with the Portuguese traders of those kingdoms. The mats are manufactured by the women,
- c and as they constitute the most essential household furniture of a negro, who eats, drinks, sleeps, and indeed dwells upon his mat, so it is the principal commodity of the country, at least a manufactured commodity. We may judge of the importance of the trade carried on by the negroes with each other, from what Jobson relates, viz. that he had seen negroes go ten miles to market with a piece of bar iron not a foot long, or a yard or two of cotton cloth, not really worth six-pence; yet some of them deal more deeply, and carry gold dust, gold rings, and other trinkets of value, to market.

- THE negro towns and houses bear evident marks of the laziness, and ignorance of the people; no architecture, no attempts to beauty, order, elegance, or conveniency, are there seen; nor does one generation profit by the faults of a former, but pass on quietly in the
- d beaten tract of their ancestors, as if science, taste, and the arts, had already arrived at their highest pitch of perfection among them. A negro hut is not to be equalled in the poverty and meanness of aspect, nor a town in wretchedness. The former is no more than a little conical cabin, with no other light than what enters by the door, which is so low, that they are forced to crawl in; after which, a man of ordinary stature cannot walk round with any degree of ease, or without hitting his head against the walls. Here they lie, fathers, mothers, sisters, brothers, servants, and slaves, promiscuously, without regard to modesty, decency, or cleanliness, forming as strong a group of misery as can well be contained in so narrow a compass. These huts are formed of a kind of wicker work, plastered over
- e with earth, and joined to each other by colonades, by which means persons of better fashion have distinct and separate apartments for the different parts of their families; and besides a hut to smoke and receive strangers in. We need not describe a town formed by a collection of so magnificent buildings; sufficient it is, that they always build their towns of a circular form, with spiral streets, as if they wanted to perplex their understandings, already abundantly obscure: hence it is, that, in a village not half a mile in diameter, you must frequently walk two or three miles to visit an acquaintance, when, by an intersecting street, the distance might be reduced to an hundred paces. After all, there is something extremely striking in this manner of building, viewed from an eminence, where several miles of a street filled with inhabitants appear all alive, like an ant hill, within so small a circle. This, however, we do not relate as the general method of building, or the most
- f common plan of a town; inconvenient as it is, it were better if it were become more fashionable, and took place instead of that other form of building, without any design at all, and as if the houses had been jumbled together by accident, without genius, without labour, or a vestige of the human intellect<sup>o</sup>.

- THE palace of the damel or king of Kayor is, indeed, an exception to the general rule the negroes seem to have established in building, with as little regard to conveniency, ornament, and the common dictates of reason as possible; for this in comparison is really magnificent. The palace is surrounded by a wall, opposite to the first gate of which is a spacious court, for exercising the king's horses, with stables all round. At the further end is another gate, on each side of which stand the departments of the different officers of the court; and from thence you are led through a fine long arbour of fruit trees, to the royal
- g apartments, on each side of which are the seraglios, or lodgings of his women, with proper offices and apartments for their slaves and servants. His majesty has a private colonade <sup>a</sup> leading to each apartment; so that it is never known with which of his women he spends the night; a method which he imagines equally secures his person against all plots and contrivances, and prevents jealousy and murmuring among the women. Jobson describes the palace of the king of Kassan as little inferior in splendor to the foregoing. It is situated in the midst of the capital, and, with the seraglio and offices, composes at least half the city. You enter it by a court surrounded with guards, and pass to a large open hall, where always stands the chair of state, with a drum slung over the back. This, the author informs us, is the only musical instrument he saw in the country, and it serves equally to inspire joy and grief, at funerals or weddings <sup>p</sup>.

NEGROES of noble extraction, or great wealth, imitate in their buildings the magnificence of the royal palaces, and sometimes surpass them; especially those descended from the Portuguese or Moors, who build intirely in the European taste, but without the least notion of the principles of architecture. A late French author observes, that the Mandingoes, or Sofes, as they call themselves, build in a more commodious manner than the rest. The walls are made of a fat binding clay, that looks smooth and hard as porcelain, thatched with straw, which hangs down to another little wall breast high; and this makes a small gallery round the hut, where they are sheltered from the burning rays of the sun. Mr. Adamson had seen a village, that was burnt down a little before his arrival, where the walls that withstood the violence of the flames, were partly of a beautiful red, and hardly vitrified by the intense heat of the fire: at a distance, the whole seemed to be done over with a bright enamel, and equalled the finest China porcelain <sup>q</sup>.

In some parts of the coast they build in the following manner. A kind of dove or ice house is erected, by means of reeds fastened close together, and supported by stakes driven fast into the ground. These stakes are from five to six feet high, and have a round covering of straw of the same height, terminating in a point: thus each hut has only a ground floor, of ten, twelve, or fifteen feet in diameter, the only entry being a square hole, about four feet high, but part of that space taken up with a high threshold, raised at least a foot above ground; so that in going in they must incline their bodies and raise one leg; an attitude not only disagreeable but ridiculous <sup>r</sup>.

THE furniture is exactly suitable to the magnificence of the house; for it consists wholly <sup>d</sup> of a few earthen pots, called conaris, a few calabashes, or gourd bottles, with wooden bowls, dishes, plates, and such-like utensils; for as to chairs, tables, and beds, their mats supply them all, except one bed for the master of the family. This consists of a kind of hurdle, laid upon cross pieces of wood, and supported by forkillas, or small forks, a foot above the ground; over this they throw a mat, which serves them for a pailasse or mattress, and generally for sheets and cloathing; as to pillows they have none.

THE last mentioned French writer gives the following account of the buildings in the island of Senegal. Here, says he, all the huts belonging to the same person are inclosed with a wall or palisade of reeds six feet high, to which they give the name of tapade. Tho' the negroes observe very little symmetry in the situation of their houses, yet the French of <sup>e</sup> the island of Senegal have taught them to observe a certain uniformity in the dimensions of the tapades, which they have regulated in such a manner, as to form a small town, with several streets drawn in a direct line. These streets are indeed not paved; and luckily there is little occasion for it, since they would be greatly at a loss to find the smallest pebbles, for thirty leagues all round. The inhabitants find a greater conveniency in their sandy soil; for as it is very deep and soft, it is their usual seat; it is also their sofa, their couch, and their bed. Besides they congratulate themselves upon another quality it has, namely, that there is no danger in falling; and it is always clean, even after the heaviest rains, because it imbibes the water with such facility, that there needs only an hour of fine weather to dry it. Adamson subjoins to the above account, that this negro town is by much the <sup>f</sup> handsomest in the whole district, between the rivers Gambia and Senegal, as well as the largest and most regular, containing upwards of 3000 inhabitants; a prodigious number for a negro town in this part of Africa <sup>s</sup>.

Agriculture.

WE shall quit this subject, to make a few observations on the agriculture of the negroes, which is an employment common to all ranks, the king only and the captains of towns excepted. Their only instrument for tilling the ground is a kind of spade, but more resembling a shovel, with a handle three feet long. Round Gambia, rice is almost the only grain that is sown in the lands, overflown in the rainy season. These fields the negroes cut with small causeways, which withhold the water in such a manner, that their rice is always moistened; and after the crop is got in, the rice fields resemble a sort of drained morasses, <sup>g</sup> on which grow a few wild herbs. But the fertility of the soil, and the labour of the hus-

- a. bandmen, are frequently destroyed by locusts, which here appear in clouds so large, as to darken the sky, and obscure the rays of the sun. Our author relates, that, when he lay in the mouth of the Gambia, in February 1750, a thick cloud was seen over the ships, which wrought such a change in the sky, as amazed the whole ship's crew, as it is seldom overcast in that season of the year. It was soon perceived to be owing to a swarm of locusts, raised twenty or thirty fathom above the ground, and covering an extent of several leagues, upon which it poured a shower of these insects, which fell a devouring the herbage, while they rested themselves, and then resumed their flight. These little animals, from their number, spread terror and desolation wherever they appear; after devouring the corn, herbage, leaves, and fruits, they even attack the bark of trees, and the very reeds with which the negro huts are frequently thatched. Our author, who took a great number, describes them of the breadth and length of a man's finger, of a brown colour, their heads armed with two strong jaws, dented like a saw, and their wings longer than those described by other naturalists. It would be little imagined, that so shocking an insect as this should ever be food for man; but the negroes seem to retaliate upon them, and revenge themselves for the loss of their corn and fruit, by eating the destroyers. They have a variety of different methods of dressing locusts; some pound them and boil them with milk; others only broil them; but all think them excellent eating<sup>1</sup>. There is indeed no disputing tastes; nor the truth of the proverb, "What is meat to one man is poison to another." Negroes eat locusts.

- As to the diversions used by the negroes, at seed and reaping time, they differ but little from what we have before described in our account of the agriculture of Whidah, Ardrah, and the Gold Coast; we shall now only observe, that the kings, being absolute proprietors of all the lands in their dominions, every family must address themselves to them or their alkades, to petition that a portion of land may be assigned them for their maintenance; and this the son is obliged to repeat, notwithstanding the estate has been solemnly and formally granted to the father; so that the tenure of all estates is immediately from the crown; a law that exposes the subject to the most grievous extortion and oppression from the alkades, their mediators with the throne, and by whom no subject, under the rank of the captain of a town, or some rich merchant, has access to the king. This oppression contributes not a little to increase the natural indolence of those unhappy negroes; for they are at little pains to cultivate and improve lands, which they hold by so precarious a tenure; nay they hardly till enough to supply their wants, but make up the deficiency by roots, fruits, and herbage; and hence we may perceive the reason, why they are afflicted with such frequent dearths and famine, of which the Europeans beheld a dismal, but to them a profitable instance, in the year 1675, when fathers sold themselves, their wives, children, and connections, only for a little pittance of food, to relieve the immediate cravings of hunger. It merits a pause in our narrative to relate the cause of this dreadful want.

- Two or three years before the famine, the negroes had suffered themselves to be seduced by the specious promises of one of their marbuts, of the tribe of Azougue, who, under the veil of religion, became master of all the dominions of the siratick and damel. This impostor had found means to persuade them into a belief of his having been commissioned by heaven to revenge the tyranny of their princes; and he promised to perform miracles in confirmation of his authority: but what made the deepest impression on the minds of those lazy barbarians, was the assurance he gave, that every season should produce an abundant crop, without the labour and toil of their hands. So flattering an offer was too powerful to be resisted by a people of their indolent disposition; they ranged themselves under the banner of the marbut, threw off their allegiance to the siratick and damel, neglected their fields, and patiently waited for two years the performance of the holy impostor's liberal promises: the consequence was the most calamitous famine that had ever been felt by any people; they not only sold but eat their nearest relations, and the strongest, like wild beasts, preyed upon the weaker. At length their eyes were opened, the marbuts were driven out of the country, but soon after recalled, by the intrigues and machinations of the fraternity, in which they fall nothing short of their brethren in iniquity, the society of Jesuits in Europe<sup>2</sup>. A terrible famine.

- We have already sufficiently described the arms of the negroes; to which we shall add, that, in general, they use a kind of shield or target of an oval form, and covered with the skin of an elephant, tyger, or lion, which they call danfa, extremely burthensome, but useful to ward off their poisoned darts and arrows. Every soldier carries his provision in a bag or knapsack slung behind, the army being incommoded with no convoys of ammunition and provision, as in other parts of the world: indeed, the shortness of their marches and expeditions renders a large stock of these intirely unnecessary, as they are seldom exposed to any great difficulties or hardships. Negro armies, in these countries, are composed of horse and foot, with very little difference in the nature of their arms, or manner <sup>a</sup> of fighting; the cavalry as well as infantry being often forced to fight on foot, and join close in battle; though in general they are used for expedition to surprize the enemy, and make sudden attacks on their wings and rear. Their horses are bought from the Moors, their neighbours; they are small, but full of fire and spirit, greatly resembling the horses of Barbary and Arabia, of which they are probably descended. They frequently sell for ten or twelve slaves, near an hundred pounds sterling; and a Portuguese mulatto lady at Rufisco had a barb, which Labat, on the testimony of De Brue, affirms, was valued at forty slaves, or four hundred pounds. This horse she afterwards presented to the monarch of Kayor. It is incredible, what feats of activity they will perform on horseback; one we shall relate, on the authority of Moore, which may the more readily be believed, as <sup>b</sup> it falls infinitely short of what we are told of the Arabs, by that excellent philosopher and physician Prosper Alpinus, and several other historians. He once saw the kondi, or lieutenant-general of Kayor, gallop at full speed on a swift barb, standing upright in his stirrups, and throwing his lance with an incredible force, at any object that presented itself, which he afterwards took up in his course with the utmost facility. What is most remarkable is, that he could hit an apple, at the distance of fifty paces. He likewise saw him stoop at full speed and take up his lance from the ground, with all the elegance and ease of the most natural motion. It is a common practice among negro cavaliers to ride at a full gallop, standing on the horse's back, to vault into their seat, to raise themselves strait up again, to throw themselves with one hand on the ground, and again to recover the saddle, without <sup>c</sup> the least pain or danger<sup>w</sup>. They are very expert in making saddles, which they finely embroider with various colours: among these, their charmed grisgris and kowris make no small part of the ornaments. Notwithstanding what authors assert, it is probable, that they purchase the saddles with the horses from the Moors, as their ingenuity greatly exceeds every other branch of negro manufacture. Yet after all, with these advantages of fine horses, arms, caparisons, and expert riders, the negroes are but poor warriors, and seem to lose all that address, dexterity, and presence of mind in the field, which is the admiration of all who behold them in the ring, or on the parade.

negroes.

THE religion of those nations on both sides the river Senegal, and stretching east and south into the interior countries, is Mohammedism, brought among them by the Moors, and <sup>d</sup> spreading with that rapidity peculiar to false doctrines. All the other negroes, from the river Gambia to the western extremity of Guinea Proper, or Cape Tagrin, are idolaters; except, says Labat, the Sereres, who may be reckoned a species of savages, without any idea at all of religion, either true or false. Le Maire affirms, that many of the inhabitants of Sierra Leona profess no religion, have no gods or object of worship; while others sacrifice to the devil, to stones, stocks, toads, and serpents; being in this respect similar to the Whidans. A cow is the sacrifice they usually offer to the devil: and though they believe in the transmigration of the animative principle of brutes, yet they eat the flesh*. Many negroes will not suffer the lizards, which crawl in heaps round the house, to be killed; for in them they firmly believe the soul of a father, mother, brother, or sister, may reside, and now <sup>e</sup> comes to keep folgan, or to rejoice with them. The Mohammedism professed by the negroes is imperfect, both from the ignorance of the teachers, as well as the licentiousness of the proselytes, and consists intirely in a belief of the unity of the Godhead, in the observance of the ramadan, biram, circumcision, and a few other ceremonies. Jobson tells us, that the nations on both sides the Gambia adore one god, whose image they will not suffer to be stained, painted, carved, or in any way represented, believing his idea to be incomprehensible, which they signify, according to this writer, by his name Allab. They believe in the mission of Mohammed; but never invoke or pray to him. They reckon the year by the rainy seasons, have names for every particular day of the week, making Friday their Sunday, which they observe with so little superstition, that the ordinary employment of <sup>f</sup> week days is never interrupted, and they go on in the same regular course of business, as if the day was not enjoined to be kept holy<sup>y</sup>.

THESE negroes have some confused notions of Jesus, acknowledging, like the Mohammedans, that he was a great prophet, but denying his divinity, and allowing him to be deservedly famous on account of the miracles he wrought; but holding it blasphemy to call him the son of God, because, say they, it is impossible that God should become visible, nay corporeal to men. They call him Nale, and his mother Mary, affirming, that he was an holy, just, pious, and wise man, which qualities he had in a transcendent degree, as a man; but far, infinitely far short of the divinity. But they are above all shocked at the doctrine of the incarnation, which they deem abominable, and an implication that the Almighty <sup>g</sup> had carnal knowlege of a woman.

a THEY believe in predestination, and place all their misfortunes, crosses, and losses, to the account of Providence. Does one negro assassinate another? God they imagine is the author of the murder; notwithstanding which, they seize the murderer, and sell him as a slave. With regard to the devotions and form of worship of the negroes, Le Maire says, that the common people have no regular course of practice, that can be called religious worship; but persons of rank affect more zeal, and are never without their marbut, who who has great influence over their secret thoughts and practice. They have neither temples, mosques, or churches; but assemble to publish acts of devotion in the open air, under the shade of a large tree, in imitation of a strange marbut, that had once been seen in the country, who prayed with no other canopy than the sky, washed in the river Gambia, and departed (E).

b THE Turks and rigid Mohammedans pray or perform their sala five times every day and night through the week, and seven times on their sabbath; but the negro Mohammedans content themselves with performing that exercise twice in a week-day, and thrice on the sabbath. Every village has its marbut or parson, who assembles them to their devotion, and after he has given absolution from the koran, they range themselves behind him, in order the better to imitate his movements, gestures, and grimaces, with their faces turned to the east; but when they are tired of this posture, they squat down on their hams, and turn to the west. The marbut extending his arms, repeats some words, so slow and loud, as to be distinctly heard and repeated after him by the audience, who fall on their knees, c kisses the earth three times, and exactly copy him in all his actions. The marbut then falls a fourth time on his knees, and prays for a quarter of an hour in silence; after which he rises, and drawing with his finger a circle round him, he marks within it a number of characters, which he kisses with profound reverence, leaning his head upon his hands, and fixing his eyes on the earth, in the attitude of deep meditation. In the end, taking a handful of sand or dust, he throws it about his face and head, and begins to pray aloud, and to touch the earth with his finger, raising it afterwards up to his head; during the performance of all which ceremonies, he repeats three times the words salati malek; then rising off his knees, he is followed by the audience, and they all retire. We have been more minute in describing the ceremonies used in prayer, as they differ considerably from those observed by the two d great sects of Mohammedans; and indeed, are a kind of mixed mode of religion, formed by the fancy of the priest, and no way constant or uniform in the minutiae of external duties. They perform ablution with earth, which they rub over their bodies instead of water. De Brue had the curiosity to interrogate the marbuts concerning the reasons upon which all these ceremonies were founded; and their answer was, that they worshipped one true God, before whom they prostrated themselves; and that this humiliation was a confession of their dependence on the will of the Supreme Being, without whom they were nothing; that their prayers were offered to petition the forgiveness of their sins, and the use of all those conveniences of life of which they stood in need, such as beautiful women, children, plentiful crops, victory over their enemies, a good fish season, health, and security against every kind of e danger<sup>2</sup>.

f THE negro Mohammedans, who inhabit round Senegal, have their ramadan fixed to the month of September; though among the Moors it is a moveable feast; for they salute the first appearance of the harvest moon, as we call it, by lifting their hands and eyes up to heaven, turning their head round with as much velocity as if it were fixed on a pivot, and repeating that motion three times; but this is all the regard they pay to the moon, with which they neither begin nor end their ramadan, though they otherwise observe it with great austerity of devotion. They neither eat or drink till after sun set: devotees will not even swallow their spittle, and cover their mouths, to prevent any thing from entering into them; nay they even deny themselves the use of a pipe, notwithstanding their extreme passion for smoking; but when night comes, they solace themselves with a joy proportioned to the rigour of the day's abstemiousness; and they eat, drink, smoke, dance, and sing, till the return of the sun. The great and the rich pass the whole day in sleep, and the night in pleasure<sup>2</sup>.

JANEQUIN expresses his surprize, how nature can support the abstinence of the day, and the fatigue, debauchery, and want of rest of the night; but habit inures them to it; even the common people, who hardly shut their eyes in the day, are punished for the smallest transgression with the bastinado. Towards the close of the ramadan they proclaim the

(E) De Brue affirms, that the negroes have neither mosques, churches, or appointed days for religious duties; but Le Maire, on the contrary, confirms the relation of Johson, as to their Sunday; and adds, that though the people neglect building mosques, yet the grandees and people of fashion have an apartment in their houses set aside for that purpose.

tabasket, the greatest festival observed by Mohammedan negroes, and the same with that the Turks and Persians call biram; of this, De Brue, who saw it celebrated, gives the following description. A little before sun-set six marbuts, cloathed in loose white robes or surplices, appear, marching in solemn procession, with long darts in their hands, and preceded by five large bullocks, covered over with a cotton cloth, crowned with leaves or garlands, and led each by two negroes. The five chiefs of the villages, that compose the town of Buckson, followed the priests in a line, dressed in their richest apparel, and armed with darts, swords, and bucklers. They were again followed by all the inhabitants of the villages, their subjects drawn up in five lines. As soon as the procession reached the borders of the river, the oxen were tied to stakes, and the oldest marbut pronounced the words sala malek, with a loud distinct voice; upon which laying his dart on the ground, he turned his face to the east, the other priests following his example, and all set up a prayer in concert; after which they rose and resumed their weapons. The negroes are then ordered to throw down the oxen on their backs, and to fix their horns in the ground, which is done in an instant, and then the priests cut their throats, and throw dust in their eyes to prevent their seeing the blood while it flows, which is deemed an inauspicious omen. After the sacrifice is concluded, and the blood all run out, the cattle are cut down, and each village carries off the pieces belonging to its own ox. On their return to the town, the folgan begins, the women and girls first presenting themselves, divided into four bands, each attended by guirots of the same sex, who sing certain verses suited to the occasion, to which the bands eccho a chorus, and then begin dancing round a great fire, lighted in the middle of the area, and the ceremony proceeds in the manner we have lately described. Such is their passion for these diversions, that a negro, who is spent with the labour of the day, comes to refresh himself with five or six hours violent dancing at night, and this festival continues for three days.

CIRCUMCISION is a practice rigorously observed by the negroes, the operation being performed on males of the age of four or five years. The operation is here performed upon a great number of children assembled together, when the children of the king, or any man of quality, have arrived at the proper age. It is necessary that all their subjects and dependents bring their children on this occasion; for the grandeur of the festival consists in the number of operations; and the great rival each other, who shall produce the most brilliant assembly. One good consequence flows from this practice; for, at the circumcision feast, the young people contract such solid alliances, as to continue firm for the remainder of their lives. It would be unnecessary to repeat the ceremonies attending this operation, as the reader will find a full account of it in De Brue, for it differs in little from the ramadan, the same sacrifices, prayers, and folgan, being observed. Janequin affirms, that, for several months after this feast, the young people may take what liberties they please with the girls, and indeed we doubt not but they are permitted to do this at all times during that age, without danger of ravishment, which is the only restriction upon them, according to that writer. If there be any truth in this relation, it is probable, that all children are not circumcised so young as we are made to believe; and this seems to be confirmed by the observation of De Brue, that they affect gaiety and mirth during the operation, and are emulous who shall sustain the pain with the greatest fortitude; and Moore in once place says, that, a little before the rainy season, they circumcise a number of boys about fourteen years old.

Superstitions.

THE Mandingoes believe that eclipses of the moon are occasioned by the interposition of a large cat, who puts her paw between the moon and the earth; and during these occasions, they spend their time in dancing and singing in honour of their prophet Mohammed. In general, the negroes of this country are no less addicted to superstitions than those of the Guiney Coast. They never intend any expedition but they sacrifice a pullet; and the observations made on the entrails determine them either to pursue or drop it. They are rivetted in their notion of lucky and unlucky days, and nothing will prevail upon them to undertake an affair of importance on the latter. Moore relates, that when he was in the country, which happened to be an unhealthy season, the people firmly believed that the air was infected by the black arts of forcerers; no death happening, but what was laid to the charge of those enemies of mankind; except one person, who died so miserably, that they placed his death to the account of the devil, for having falsified his vow, and broken a solemn engagement. The custom of making vows, and of wearing large bracelets to remind them of what they swore, is extremely frequent. One vows he will make a present of such a slave, and that he may not sell him through forgetfulness, he wears a bracelet on his arm, till it is convenient to fulfil his engagement; and to fail in this particular, will, they believe, be followed by some immediate judgment from heaven. But of all their superstitions, the most general and remarkable are their grisgris, which, Le Maire says, are certain Arabic characters, mixed with necromantic figures, drawn by the marbuts on paper. Labat affirms, that they are nothing more than scraps of the Alcoran in Arabic; but this Barbot denies, and confirms his opinion

• Idem ibid. LABAT, ubi supra.

- a by positive proof; for having brought over to Europe one of these grisgris, and shewn it to a number of persons deeply skilled in the oriental learning, none of them could find the least trace of any character they understood; yet after all, this might be owing to the badness of the hand writing, and the words are probably Mandingo, though the characters are an attempt to imitate the Arabic. The poorest negro never goes to war without his grisgris, as a charm against wounds; and if it prove ineffectual, the marbut transfers the blame on the immorality of his conduct. Those cheats invent grisgris against all kinds of dangers, and in favour of all desires and appetites; by virtue of which, the possessors may obtain or avoid whatever they like or dislike. They defend them from storms, enemies, diseases, pains, and misfortunes; and preserve health, long life, wealth, honour, and merit, if we credit the marbuts: certain it is, that those priests find all the benefit of the boasted virtues of their grisgris, no clergy in the globe being more revered, honoured, or wealthy, according to the ideas of wealth they entertain here; and no wonder, as they impoverish the people by the exorbitant price they exact for their knavish charms, a grisgris being frequently valued at three slaves, and four or five oxen<sup>c</sup>.

- SUCH of these pious ornaments as are intended for the head, are made in form of a cross, reaching from the forehead to the neck behind, and from ear to ear; nor are the arms and shoulders neglected. Sometimes they are planted in their bonnets in the form of horns; at other times they are made like serpents, lizards, or some other animal, cut out of a kind of pasteboard: in a word, they are of forms as various as the purposes for which they are intended. There are not wanting Europeans, and otherwise intelligent seamen and merchants, who are in some degree infected with this weakness of the country, and believe that the negro forcerers have an actual communication with the devil, and that they are filled by the malignant influence of the evil spirit, when they see them distort their features and muscles, make horrid grimaces, and at last imitate all the appearance of epileptics: a notion not confined to the negroes of Africa, but thoroughly believed about the beginning of last century, by several of the learned of Europe, and borrowed by them from the ancients, who believed that persons afflicted with this terrible malady were possessed with a τι θειον, a quid divinum, or spirit. Here, indeed, it is counterfeited, but so artfully, that it is next to impossible to detect them, and hence they gain great credit with the natives. To these charms and necromantic arts, they add another bug-bear, which they call mumbo jumbo, and is intended by the Mandingoes to keep their women in obedience and submission. This is no other than a large idol, which the women are simple enough to believe, or cunning enough to pretend, they take for a human savage, who watches all their actions, and can even penetrate into their most secret thoughts. The husband gets behind this statue in the night, and makes a dreadful bellowing, which they suppose issues from the idol; and of this some of them make a very artful use; for, persuading their husbands that they firmly believe in the attributes given to the mumbo jumbo, their conduct is intirely committed to his care, the husband takes his pleasure abroad, and the women enjoy the society of their gallants, free from all alarms and discoveries. Some of them are, however, simple enough to credit what their husbands assert, and then they try to bribe over the idol to favour them. Moore relates, that this part is acted by a negro, and commonly by the favourite slave of his master; hence he acquires an absolute dominion in the family over the women, in consequence of his function, and over the master, from an apprehension that ill usage will make him reveal the secret of so much consequence to the support of the husband's authority, and preservation of the womens honour<sup>d</sup>.

- IN the year 1727, the king of Jagra had a woman, whose curiosity could only be equalled by his weak fondness, in discovering to her the whole mystery of the mumbo jumbo, for which she had long eagerly solicited; but with the indiscretion usual in her sex, says our author, she was scarcely in possession, when she hastened to reveal it to all the other women. The report soon came to the ears of the chief negro lords, who were before but ill affected to the king's person, and now shocked with a weakness of such consequence to them all. They therefore assembled to deliberate upon the necessary measures, in an affair so critical; and not doubting but their women would throw off their allegiance, and live in a perpetual state of rebellion and infidelity, if the terror of the mumbo jumbo was once removed, they determined upon a very bold step, which they executed with equal resolution. They assumed that air of authority, peculiar to persons who take upon them a religious office, or act in a religious cause; and going to the palace, ordered the king to come before the idol or mumbo jumbo. The weak prince, not daring to refuse the summons, obeyed, and after being severely censured by the bug-bear, he was ordered to produce all his women. No sooner had they made their appearance, than they were immediately assassinated by order of the mumbo jumbo; and thus this almost fatal discovery was suppressed, before it made its way out of the king's family. a

SUCH as are initiated in the mystery of the mumbo jumbo, take a solemn oath not to reveal it to the women, or any other negroes who are not of the society<sup>e</sup>. They cannot be admitted before a certain age; the people swear by that idol, and no oath is observed with more solemnity and respect: in a word, every village has its lodge, or mumbo jumbo, which we can compare to nothing so aptly as the respectable fraternity of Free Masons, so well known in Great Britain, France, Germany, and several other parts of Europe.

Account of the marbuts.

WE come now to speak of the marbuts, that numerous ecclesiastical body, once driven out of the Siratick, but now restored, with additional immunities, more than sufficient to wipe off their disgrace. In their habit they differ but little from the laity on common occasions, though altogether another people as to other circumstances. Jobson observes, that in their private œconomy, and the general conduct of life, they have nothing in common with the rest of the world, all being formal, affected, stiff, and designing, and a regular series of the most refined hypocrisy and priestly cunning: a character which we fear may be applied to too great a number of the priests of all nations. Here they are ambitious, in order the better to gratify their avarice and pride; the passion being altogether sordid, and partaking not a particle of that noble elevation of soul that grasps at power, the better to serve the public, and struggles for exaltation, only to shine with the greater splendor and utility. The marbuts have towns, and even whole provinces, sequestered from the state for their maintenance, into which they admit no other negroes but their slaves, employed in tilling the lands, and cultivating their grain, fruits, roots, and all the other necessities of life. They marry intirely among themselves, never making any alliances with the rest of the people, and all their male children are born priests, and bred to the mysteries of the function; particular care being taken in instructing them in the principles of the Levitical law, upon which many of their ceremonies are founded, and to which, next to the Koran, they pay the highest respect. With regard to other regulations of marriage among the marbuts, authors talk but vaguely, observing in general that polygamy is permitted, and every thing else that is customary with the laity; though, if we may credit their oldest and best historian<sup>f</sup>, their usages are kept a profound secret from the vulgar. In many respects, however, their conduct deserves the greatest encomiums: they strictly observe those laws of the Koran relating to abstinence and temperance, carefully avoiding every excess in eating, or at all touching wine and spirituous liquors; they cherish commerce, are honest and fair in their dealings with each other, as if they would by this atone for the frauds they commit on the people. Charity is a virtue which they never violate among each other, though it never extends to that universal benevolence which alone renders it valuable; and they will never permit any of their society to be sent into slavery: if he has offended against the laws, they punish him agreeable to the institutions, or, as we may call them, the canons of their church. c

THESE good qualities, though blended with strong vices, are the cement which firmly binds the fabric of this institution, and procures the respect of kings as well as of the vulgar (G). If a marbut is met on the road by persons of the first distinction, they form a circle round him, fall upon their knees in prayer, and receive his benediction; which custom is observed even in the palaces of kings when a priest enters. Labat says, that the negroes in general, especially those of Senegal, entertain the highest regard and deference to their clergy; believing, that all who offend them cannot live above three days after<sup>g</sup>. The Mandingo marbuts spend a great part of their time in the instruction of their children; and Jobson relates, that he had seen schools and seminaries which contained some hundreds of youth, where they are taught to read, write, to expound the Koran, the principles of the Levitical law, the nature of the marbut society, how it is connected with the body politic, and yet a separate community, with such other knowledge as is fashionable among them. But what they instill with their first milk, is an inviolable regard and attachment to the interests of the society, profound secrecy, gravity, and a reserved conversation and conduct, together with sobriety, temperance, and the principles of morals, at least as far as it regards the good order of the fraternity, and commands the respect of the laity. d

(G). Jobson relates, that he contracted an acquaintance with a marbut, whose excellent qualities soon engaged him in the strictest friendship. He was pious, temperate, sensible, honest, and sincere in his attachments, insomuch that our author regarded him with little less veneration than the most superstitious of the natives (4).

(4) Jobson, p. 74. Leo African. p. 23.

- <sup>a</sup> THEIR children are taught to read and write, upon a little book formed of a smooth hard wood; the latter by drawing the characters themselves, and the former by reading certain characters resembling Arabic, wrote down by their tutors. They use a kind of black ink, formed from the bark of a tree, and a pen resembling a pencil, or rather the Στύλος, Stylus, or pen of the ancients, with which they wrote upon their waxed tables. Some authors allege, that their characters resemble the Hebrew more than the Arabic; which is a plain indication of their being ignorant of both; for it is impossible they could bear any affinity to characters so extremely different: but all agree, that their laws are written in a language totally different from the vulgar, which the lay-negroes of every degree are ignorant of, and is supposed by authors to be a corrupt Hebrew or Arabic. We are told
- <sup>b</sup> from the same authority, that the great volume of the marbut laws or institutions, regarding the society, is a manuscript, of which they take copies for their private use. If we may credit Jobson, it is not in their own schools, and to their own children only, that the marbuts communicate their knowledge, but to whole provinces, and without distinction to every youth they meet. They travel, according to him, with books and families from province to province, teaching wisdom and religion wherever they pass, and enforcing their doctrine equally by precept and example (H). Every town is open to them, and the marbut travels whole kingdoms unmolested in the heat of the bloodiest wars. Writers differ with respect to their manner of travelling, some affirming, that, like Mendicants, they live upon the public, and alms which they receive from every family; while others are no less positive, that they
- <sup>c</sup> support themselves by trade and the sale of grisgris, asking no other alms than scraps of paper, which they convert into solid food and raiment by virtue of those mysterious characters with which they impress them. Certain it is, that they carry on the richest commerce of the country, especially the marbuts of Setiko, who trade deeply in gold, slaves, and grisgris: and this may be one end of their progresses through different kingdoms, as well as the instructing the ignorant, and the performance of their apostolical function. Their chief branch of trade is gold, which they draw from the interior countries of Nigritia, and the extremities of Libya and Barbary, in exchange for their grisgris; and such is their avarice, that they hoard up large treasures, deep hidden in the ground, and to be buried with them, under the pretext of religion, reserving in public only what is sufficient to answer the pur-
- <sup>d</sup> poses of nature, the gratification of their ambition or pride, and the purchasing of the Portuguese a kind of blue stone, which their women wear round their waists, as a preservative against hæmorrhages, to which they are very subject; or from the other Europeans such articles of luxury as may be wanted to keep up the esteem and veneration of the people. To conclude this section, and our account of this extraordinary society, it may be sufficient to observe, that they throw all the obstructions they are able, and cross by every possible means the endeavours of the Europeans to penetrate to the source of the river Gambia; apprehensive, that their success might lessen their trade, and render them less necessary. They represented to Jobson the hazards and difficulties of such an enterprize, with so much zeal and warmth, that, with all his partiality to them, he could not help attributing their excess-
- <sup>e</sup> sive friendship to selfish views<sup>f</sup>,

(H) The reader may observe, that the relation of Jobson is to be received with some allowance for his prejudice in favour of the marbuts; he had contracted an intimacy with one worthy person of the community, and from thence seems to have formed his idea of the whole; but the true character of a society is to be gained not from the manners of an individual, or the partial portraits of historians, but from facts, and the general system of conduct and policy. We have given sufficient instances to justify our opinion of this sect, and the reader, who would inquire more minutely, may consult Marmol, Smith, and Prewett.

Containing a geographical view of the great river Gambia, and the frequent attempts made to discover its source; the trade which the Europeans carry on with the kingdoms situated along its banks; a description of the English and other European forts and settlements established thereon; and an account of their wars, and various changes and revolutions, and the endeavours used by each to maintain or improve their commerce; with a narrative of the settlement on the island of Goree, &c. &c.

Gambia.*

THE vast river Gambia was formerly known by the name of Gambro; an appellation <sup>a</sup> still retained by the French. Cada Mosto, the first writer who speaks of it, always gives it this name. Marmol says, that by the negroes it is called Gambu; but he sometimes writes it Gambra, and at other times Gamboa. Jobson prefers the former; but affirms, that the negroes always call it Gee, or Ji, that is, the river, by way of pre-eminence; for which reason likewise the Portuguese gave it the name of Rio Grande, in common with another river more to the southward<sup>2</sup>. However, as it is commonly known to Englishmen by the name Gambia, which in fact is a corruption of Gambra, this we shall retain, and avoid all disputes concerning the etymon, which, after all our labour, would still remain doubtful.

AUTHORS are no less divided concerning its source than name, some affirming it to be a branch of the Niger, while others, with more probability, assert, that it can possibly have no <sup>b</sup> communication with it, as it certainly runs through the lake Sapor and the kingdom of Yo or Eyo, bordering on Dabomay, a prodigious course of near 2000 miles. Marmol calls it the same river which Ptolemy lays down under the name of Estachiris, in which tract it must be divided from the Niger by a prodigious ridge of hills running north and south; and so indeed it is laid down by that accurate geographer Mr. Bolton, in his correction of D'Anville. Labat has spent several pages upon this subject, which he drops after having thoroughly perplexed and bewildered his readers; and, to avoid falling into the same error, we shall here take our leave of it, as offering conjectures might afford opportunities for displaying our genius, but very little improvement to our readers, all the attempts towards this discovery having hitherto been abortive, and the interior parts of Africa too little known to determine <sup>c</sup> any thing from the situation of the country: we shall proceed therefore to a description of this river, as far as it has been navigated by Europeans; for as to the accounts of the natives they merit little regard<sup>b</sup>.

*Situation,
breadth, depth,
and navigable
length.*

THE river Gambia, or Gamby, discharges itself in the ocean between Cape Verd and Cape Roxo; or, to speak with more precision, between Cape Saint Mary on the south, and Bird or Broken Island on the north; the distance between these being six leagues; but as the river is divided by a great number of islands and sand banks, its broadest chanel does not exceed three leagues; and Barbot reduces it to as many miles. At Jear, fifty leagues up the river, it is a mile broad, and easily accessible to a ship of three or four hundred tons, or to a forty gun ship, as Labat expresses it; and even at Barakkonda, 500 miles, or 250 leagues, accord- <sup>d</sup> ing to Labat, from the sea, it is navigable for ships of 150 tons burden. The season for making this voyage is from December to the month of June, during which time the river flows in a smooth, equal, and not rapid course; but for the rest of the year is difficult, if not impossible, on account of the prodigious swell, occasioned by the rains that fall with such violence in these countries; and this is one great advantage which the river Senegal has over the Gambia.

FREQUENT attempts have been made to penetrate to the source of the Gambia, and by means of these voyages its navigation came to be so well known, and some little acquaintance made with the states more immediately bordering upon its banks, which however are too inconsiderable to merit a place in history. <sup>e</sup>

It is well known that the Gambia forms a number of curvatures and windings between the sea and the kingdom of Kantor, 400 miles above Barakkonda, where it is supposed to pass through a stagnated lake, inaccessible to shipping, on account of the reeds, leaves, and herbage, that float so thick upon its surface as to give it the appearance of dry land. This however is no more than the account of the natives; for no Europeans ever penetrated so far. The English have made frequent attempts to discover its source, all of them unsuccessful, as they never went farther than Barakkonda, at least with any certainty or advantage. It is possible that they were stopt by cataracts, shoals, or other obstructions, as they affirm, and were told by the marbuts; though many of the more intelligent deny that there are any impediments

- a impediments for some hundred miles farther. First captain Thompson, and after him Jobson, in the year 1618, went an hundred leagues in boats beyond the cataract of Barakkonda; but, having neglected to take the soundings and other particulars, their labour was attended with little advantage, serving only to gratify their curiosity (A). Vermayden and some other seamen penetrated as far in the reign of Charles the Second; but to much the same effect. In 1713 the royal African company, desirous of obtaining all possible certainty on this head, employed a number of small vessels on the discovery, under the direction of Mr. Thomas Harrison, their chief agent at James Fort. This gentleman pursued his course to Fatadenda, after which he committed the care of the expedition to John Peach, giving him a small vessel to proceed on the voyage, and returning himself to James Fort, where Moore saw him. His deputy likewise, after having gone within twenty miles of Barakkonda, was forced to return for want of provisions, or perhaps of resolution to prosecute the design<sup>c</sup>.

From James Island, near the mouth of the river, to Barakkonda, the soundings are never less than four fathoms and a half water in the shallowest parts of the true chanel, and generally from five to eleven. The river is enriched with a number of beautiful islands, some of them covered with wood, and filled with animals, which frequently render it extremely narrow, but ballance that inconveniency by adding to the depth, the water being there confined within narrower limits. Yet with all this depth of water, Labat says, that it is necessary to keep always sounding, especially near the entrance, as the river is filled with shoals and sand banks, frequently dangerous without this precaution (B).

- c As the English carry on the chief traffick with the natives of Gambia, we shall begin with describing their settlements upon this river, tho' the time cannot well be determined when they first began to frequent it, nor who the first Europeans were that established this commerce. Labat is positive, that the merchants of Dieppe and Roan were not only acquainted with, but considerable traders on, the Gambia, before the Portuguese began their discoveries in Asia and Africa. However, as the Normans found it less advantageous than the traffick with the coast of Guiney, which made great returns to France in gold and ivory, they always pursued it with less zeal, and at last totally abandoned it for their establishments on the southern coast of Africa. At that time the slave trade was not opened, nor the merchants of Mandingo and the interior countries accustomed to bring their merchandize of gold, ivory, &c. to the very mouth of the river. First establishment of the European trade.

- d In course of time the Portuguese, eager in pursuit of discoveries, and whatever could contribute to the advancement of trade, occupied those places abandoned by the Normans, and established factories, not only along the coasts, but in the interior kingdoms, and along the banks of the Gambia, as high as the English trade at present: an assertion that is proved by the ruins of many forts in different places; which is more than the French can urge in support of their claim, though it might be difficult to prove a negative. Notwithstanding the confusion introduced into their affairs, by a perpetual state of hostilities and wars with the other European nations, and the loss of a number of valuable factories, they still retain a considerable commerce with the interior countries, Bintam, Cacho, and Bissao, where they trade with the French, English, and Dutch, as natives, getting the produce of the country in return for European merchandize; but this progeny of the ancient Portuguese is now so blended as hardly to be distinguished from the original inhabitants.

- e At length the English succeeded the Portuguese in the trade of the river Gambia, seizing upon a number of advantageous posts which they had relinquished; and have, for a series of years, fortified themselves on a small island between Albreda and Gilfrai, situated at the distance of four leagues, according to Labat, or six miles, by Moore's calculation, from the mouth of the river. Here they have built a fort, which might be rendered extremely strong, could they secure their magazines and water against bombs; the want of which precaution occasioned its being taken, pillaged, demolished, and rased to the ground, by the French, and afterwards by pirates, or the Forbars: a loss which the company could never Settlement of the English company.

(A) It may be proper to observe, that all the French translators of this paragraph of Jobson's relation, Prevost, Labat, and Marmol, seem to have copied from each other the mistake of the first translator, who rendered the English preposition above by the French au dessous, instead of au dessus, a blunder which greatly alters the sense of the author.

(B) Labat lays down a number of directions for navigating this river with safety, some of which, as they may prove useful, we shall extract. He observes, that below Fort James both sides of the river are filled with sand banks; and advises mariners to keep near the north, on which side the chanel is smoothest, deepest, and safest: an opinion which he supports by a number of reasons and facts, which we shall omit, as unnecessary. Another precaution is, to keep directly in the middle of the chanel in passing Dog Island, in order to avoid a stony point, covered by the water, that projects a quarter of a league across the river (5).

recover without the aid of parliament, and the public countenance offered them. We shall a speak of this transaction after having described the fort, and enumerated the other settlements on this great river.

THE next establishment of the English company is on the river Kabala, falling into the Gambia almost opposite to James Island, on the north side of the kingdom of Kambo, and south side of the river: but here the trade is inconsiderable, the chief purpose of the factory being to furnish James Fort with provisions. On the north side the river, opposite to James Island, stands the English factory Jilfray, or Gillefree, a little east of the French house at Albreda. This place is pleasantly situated, and supplies James Fort with all kinds of vegetables. Here it is that the monarch of Barra exacts a duty upon all shipping that pass up the river, to which the English, though naturally haughty, says Labat, have been forced to b submit (C). The fourth English factory is at Vintain, or Bintam, upon a river of the same name, falling into the Gambia about six miles above James Fort. The chief commerce of this little factory, within the jurisdiction of the king of Pouia, consists in wax, ivory, and hides. Eight miles farther up the river we meet with the fifth factory, called Jereja, situated in a kingdom of the same name. A place affording little trade besides wax, of which there is great abundance, but indifferent in the quality. In the year 1731, the English company established a factory at Kaleor, on a river of the same name, in the dominions of the king of Barra; but, perceiving the trade to fall short of their expectations, they relinquished it two years afterwards. The same year as the former, a house was settled at Tankeoval, in the kingdom of Caën, on the south side of the river Gambia; the principal object of which c is the wax trade. Something higher up the river we meet with the factory of Joar, situated three miles up the country, in the territory of the king of Barfalli. There is not on the whole river a more flourishing trade than is carried on by this town and factory, as the Mandingo merchants, going and returning to and from Galam and Tombuto, take this place in their way: and on the opposite or north side of the river stands Taui, or Taui Marow, another factory belonging to the African company: but here they have no more than a little house and one negro agent to supply James Fort with corn. Higher up, in the little kingdom of Femarrow, stands the company's factory of Brako, built in 1732, burnt by accident, rebuilt in the same year, and relinquished in 1735. The company's eleventh settlement is at Mattejor, a mile from the river on the north side, in the kingdom of Upper Taui. It d being overturned by a swelling of the river in the year 1725, the company ordered the factory to be removed to Saui, where it now remains, the situation being a little removed since, but the name preserved. Still higher up, in the kingdom of Tomani, south of Gambia, stands the thirteenth factory, called Xamyakonda; destroyed by a flooding of the river in 1733, but since rebuilt by order of the company. Its trade consists in slaves and ivory, of which it sends great quantities to James Fort. The last settlement of the company is Fatadenda; at which place, situated at least 484 miles from the sea, the river is as broad, says Moore, as the Thames at Tilbury Fort, and proportionably deep. Here the Gambia with its beautiful windings, forms a most delightful prospect, to be equalled only by the verdure of the trees and fertility of the adjacent country of Kanter, several provinces of which are e surrounded on three sides by those delightful curvatures of the river<sup>d</sup> (D).

As none of these factories are considerable enough to merit a particular description, we shall return to Fort James, commonly called James Fort, and lay before the reader all we can learn of this head-settlement, either from writers or private intelligence. This fort is situated in a small island of the same name, standing in the middle of the Gambia, the whole breadth of the river being here about seven miles. The island is the property of the company; but subject to a small tribute to the king of Barra. In circuit the island is about three quarters of a mile, the fort regular, and defended by four batteries, each mounting seven pieces of cannon, which commands the river on every side. Under the walls of the fort, facing the water on all hands, are erected two batteries, mounted with four f twenty-four pounders each, and between both are planted smaller guns for salutes: the

(C) The same author adds, that, insensible to all other nations, they have been humbled by negroes, and forced to salute this prince with their cannon as they pass; and yet his dominions do not extend above eighteen leagues along the river. All ships of whatever nation that approach a certain tuft of trees, called The royal standard of Barra, are forced to pay it this compliment, and a small duty to the king, on pain of being prohibited to trade, and subjected to all the injuries the monarch can do them (6).

(D) Authors relate, that the company relinquished this settlement, upon some severe usage their factors had met with from the king of Tomani; but we have it from the best private authority, that before now it is probably re-established.

(6) Labat relat. de l'Afrique occident., part iv. p. 266.

- a whole artillery of the fort amounting to 45 pieces of cannon. Within the walls are contained a number of very commodious apartments for the governor, chief merchants, factor, writers, and military officer; the lower apartments being employed in magazines and store-houses. The garrison ought to be composed of one officer, one serjeant, two corporals, a gunner, his deputy, and thirty soldiers; but the diseases attributed by authors to the pernicious habit of drinking spirits to excess, greatly diminish the complement, and reduce the men to the most deplorable situation. This is a fact asserted by all writers, English, French, and Dutch. The soldiers, artificers, servants, and slaves of the fort, are lodged in barracks without the walls, but built with stone and lime, equally convenient and strong as the fort itself; and the whole surrounded by pallisadoes, the river and canals drawn from it. Underneath the servants apartments are magazines, and the slaves are lodged below the soldiers barracks. Centinels are placed at proper posts, relieved every two hours, and the garrison kept in constant duty and security, a patrol being sent round at certain hours to examine into the situation of the fort, and make report to the governor. In a word, in point of military discipline, no garrison can be more regular and diligent<sup>c</sup>; but the factors, and even the governor, find it their interest to wink at the excess in drinking of the soldiers, by a means too obvious to be pointed out.

lives of the

- It was in 1664 that James Island was fortified by commodore Holmes, for the protection of the English trade in this river, and had its name in honour of the duke of York. At first it had but eight pieces of cannon; but Barbot speaks of it as a regular fortification, completed and mounted in the manner we have described (E) in the year 1690. James Fort was taken for the first time by the French, under M. de Gênes, in 1695, who commanded a small squadron of four ships of war and two bomb ketches; of which enterprize we have a particular account by Froger, who served in the expedition. M. de Gênes, then at Gorée, receiving advice by an English deserter of the miserable condition of the garrison, labouring under diseases, and pinched with want, set sail for Gambia, and immediately surrounded the fort with the boats, to cut off all communication with the continent. Next day an officer, M. de la Rogue was sent to summon the governor to surrender: his barge was met at some distance by the English officer, who conducted him to the fort, where he was handsomely entertained, and sent back attended by three gentlemen of the garrison, who demanded of the admiral a few days to deliberate upon the answer they should make, as the governor was absent, and the command devolved upon a deputy. De Gênes would grant only till six o'clock the following morning, and then the deputy sent him word to begin his operations, for he was resolved to defend the place to the last extremity; a resolution that would probably have been executed with equal spirit, had not Mr. Hambury, the governor, found means to enter the fort, and take upon him the command, of which he was undeserving. Two bombs had only been thrown in by the enemy, and the boats disposed in their proper stations for giving the general assault against the next tide, when he sent a barge to the admiral, with proposals for a capitulation, and to demand the exchange of hostages. The terms were accepted, and the admiral, out of compliment to the bravery of the deputy-governor, as was plainly expressed in the articles, permitted the garrison to march out with all the honours of war, their arms, baggage, and effects, and each officer and gentleman a slave to attend him. Among other articles of less importance was the following. "That all the factors of the company along the banks of the Gambia; all the stores, effects, and merchandize, belonging to the company, should be included under the present capitulation; and, in a word, the French put in full possession of the navigation and trade of this great river." Here the French got, with little trouble, a prize of 500 quintals of ivory, 300 quintals of wax, 300 male and 40 female slaves, besides 50 more at Jilfray, together with European merchandize, to the value of 8000 crowns, all the cannon, stores, and provisions of the fort<sup>f</sup>.

French.*

- A FEW days after, M. de Gênes sent to the king of Barra to demand the English effects in the factory at Jilfray; but that prince returned for answer, that if the factory was surrendered, the effects belonged to him: finding however that the admiral intended to use force, he resolved not to contest the affair, and suffered him quietly to take possession. Afterwards a council was called, to deliberate, whether Fort James should be preserved or demolished; and the latter opinion prevailing, the bastions were blown up, the cannon that could not be carried on board were nailed and rendered useless, and the English garrison embarked for England; upon which De Gênes with the squadron sailed for the Brasils. It would appear that this resolution of the council was not agreeable to the French company; for they soon sent directions to their officers at Fort St. Louis to take possession of Fort James, and seemed seriously to think of rebuilding the fort, when it was delivered up to the English by the treaty of Ryswick.<sup>5</sup> While the English company were employed in executing a plan which would have rendered James Fort a complete fortification, the war in 1702 broke out, and again put the French in possession, by the conduct of the same admiral who had before taken it, and was now killed in the attack; but the fort was ransomed at that time for 10,000*l.* after the French had carried off a booty of 250 slaves, and a considerable quantity of merchandize.<sup>6</sup> A third time it fell into the hands of the same nation in 1709, and was restored at the general peace of Utrecht; after which it was twice pillaged by English pirates, who infested the coast of Guiney, in 1720. The first of these enterprizes was executed by Harvel Davis, with such circumstances as merit a particular relation. Davis, believing he could expect no success from an open attempt, resolved to have recourse to stratagem, which had the desired success, as neither courage, cunning, or the most desperate villainy, were wanting in him or his crew. When he came within sight of the island, he concealed all his men under the hatches, except five or six, employed in working the ship, and in the dress of sailors. With such a force he knew he could raise no suspicion in the garrison, and in consequence came close to the shore, went on board his boat, with the pilot and surgeon, and rowed directly to the fort, where he was received by a file of musqueteers, who conducted him to the governor's apartments. Here he told a plausible story, that he belonged to Liverpool, and was bound for Senegal, to take in a cargo of ivory and gum, but was pursued and forced out of his course by two French men of war. His cargo he told the governor consisted of iron, and some other commodities proper for the African market; upon which that gentleman agreed to purchase it in exchange for slaves; and asked, whether Davis had any liquors on board? To this he replied, that he had none for sale; however, that he could oblige the governor with some bottles of excellent rum: upon which he was invited with his attendants to dinner. During the preparations the governor was making to receive him handsomely, Davis returned alone on board, under pretence of bringing the spirits, having first made all the necessary observations. Presently he returned, attended by six stout fellows, and was admitted without any questions, as the men were loaded with bottles, but at the same time secretly armed with pistols and daggers, and directed to stay in the guard room, till on the discharge of a pistol they were to seize upon the arms of the guard. Every particular of his orders was punctually obeyed, and he became master of the fort, money, stores, and all the merchandize, by a treacherous breach of hospitality, that deserves to be stigmatized with infamy to the latest posterity. The wealth which the factors had accumulated amounted in ingots of gold to upwards of 2000*l.* besides goods of ten times that sum, which he carried on board; and then demolished the fort, putting the governor, factors, and such of the soldiers as would not embark in his desperate fortune, on board a large vessel he found in the river<sup>1</sup>, to steer what course they thought fit (F).

To avoid breaking the chain of narration, we have omitted some important particulars relative to this settlement and the trade of the Gambia; to understand which properly, it is necessary we resume the subject as far back as the treaty of Ryswick. After restitution of the fort, the parliament, desirous of establishing the trade without any expence to the public, set the commerce of the river free, upon the sole condition, that each ship should pay ten per cent. to the company on her arrival in Africa, or twenty on her return to England. It is incredible what a number of adventurers immediately embarked in this trade upon its being

Gambia.

(F) The royal African company, receiving advice of this unhappy affair, determined to guard for the future against such accidents, by keeping so strong a garrison as might defy all the power and stratagems of pirates: but they were extremely unlucky in the officers they made choice of. Major Maffey was sent in one of their ships, as commander of the troops; and he being disgusted at the reception he met with from colonel Whitney, then governor, and the factors, entered into a conspiracy with one Loruther, second mate of the ship, by whose assistance, and the party he had formed among the soldiers and sailors, he found means to seize the ship and rob the fort; after which he set sail and turned pirate. This life, though attended with all possible success, soon however became irksome to Maffey, who would seem to have some sparks of conscience remaining; he determined therefore to break off from the association; and accordingly went to Ja-maica, where he surrendered himself to Sir Nicholas Law, who received him kindly, as a proselyte, and furnished him with money to carry him over to England.

On his arrival in London, he wrote to the directors of the company a full confession of his crime, which he attributed to his resentment of the hard usage he had met with; acknowledging, however, that he deserved death; but requesting, that it might be such a one as was worthy of a soldier. The answer was, that he deserved no better fate than a gibbet; notwithstanding which he not only did not conceal himself, but took lodgings in a public part of the town, and addressed himself to the officers of justice, to issue an order for seizing captain Maffey, a pirate. Upon the officers informing him, that they knew no such person, he told them, that he was the person, and gave them his direction. Accordingly he was arrested a few days after, upon his own information, carried before a justice, and committed to prison, upon no other evidence than his own. At length captain Ruffel and colonel Whitney's sons being summoned as evidence against him, Maffey was tried, condemned, and hanged, for facts which would never have appeared against him, had he not determined to receive the punishment he merited.

a laid open, and what confusion and ruin it had almost produced. Every captain endeavoured to anticipate another; the French took advantage of this rivalry; and the negroes, perceiving the folly of the English, raised the price of slaves higher than had ever been known, or than the trade would bear: in consequence of which our colonies were badly supplied, the expence of planting very great, and the profits of the merchants so small, that, all things included, it might well be deemed a losing trade. At length, the French themselves were involved in the difficulties of the English; for the Mandingo merchants, observing the great price given for slaves by the former, would sell none to the latter, and thus the agents of both companies were soon reduced to a state of idleness, to watch when the rage of adventuring would subside, and commerce once more be put on a solid and rational foundation <sup>k</sup>.

b THIS situation of affairs soon opened the eyes of the company, who became sensible that they had better trade without the aid of parliament, than accept of such a grant as would infallibly destroy the whole trade, and ruin the British colonies in America. They therefore began diligently to apply themselves to the trade, to ruin the French; and cut out the interlopers. Mr. Corker, their chief agent, established factories for this purpose at Javal (G) and Portodali: he sent some of the factors to the king or Damel of Kayor, with suitable merchandize, to be sold him at an under price, and accompanied with rich presents; but all these liberalities had so little effect, through the address of De Brue, the French director, that the Damel, having led the factors a dance after him from town to town, sent them back at last, without paying for the goods, and glad to escape at any rate out of his hands. Corker went farther: he sold the company's goods at the price of interlopers, taking slaves at the same high rate. He employed force to exclude the French from the navigation of the river; burnt their ships, under pretext of their having no passports; and, in a word, says Labat, testified the most malignant enmity to this nation (H).

AT length he perceived his error; and in the chagrin of disappointment, says Labat, wrote to his constituents, that they had better renounce the ten per cent. exacted from the French, repair James Fort at their own expence, and live upon a good understanding with the French company, than expose themselves to the necessity of totally relinquishing the trade. On the other hand, he made some proposals to M. de Brue, by which the price of merchandize should be settled between the two companies, and an unanimous resolution taken to exclude all interlopers, of whatever nation. For this purpose he sent one of the factors to Fort St. Lewis, in the year 1699, with his compliments, and the following article of accommodation, to M. de Brue. “1st. That the French company shall enjoy the same privileges they held before the war; that is, the right of maintaining factories at Albreda and Jereja; and that the agents of both companies shall live in the same friendly footing as before. 2d. That the English company having, previous to the war, settled factories at Jaal and Portodali, they shall continue in the full exertion of the same privilege. 3d. That the vessel of the Sieur Desnos, the only one seized by the English, shall be restored at the pleasure of M. de Brue (I). 4th. That as it would not be possible, on account of the number of English ships, to settle a tariff for the slave-trade, this article shall be deferred till the English government received instructions from the company. 5th. That, as the private traders were licensed by parliament, the company had not power absolutely to restrain them; the French governor therefore would excuse it, if, as countrymen, they sometimes afforded them relief when distressed.” To these proposals De Brue returned the following answer by the same messenger. “1st. That by the treaty of Ryswick it was stipulated, that all conquests should mutually be given up, and things restored, upon the same footing as they had been before the war. That before the war the privileges of the French company extended, by letters patent, from Cape Blanco to the river Sierra Leona, with the same right of navigating the river Gambia as the English, as was apparent from the factories they had always maintained at Albreda and Jereja. That it was assuredly the interest of both companies to join in a free commerce, and establish a tariff, to which the negroes should be compelled to submit; the want of which had given such a handle to interlopers, almost ruined the trade of

(G) This place is likewise called Jaal, Juali, or Joch.

(H) This is the account of Labat, extracted from De Brue's Journal, to which we are forced to accede, as we have no regular detail of this affair from any English writer. It must be acknowledged, that the English have ever been scandalously negligent in preserving the annals of trade, and this is the reason why we are so frequently subjected to national reflections, as we have no facts upon record to oppose to those heavy charges, so frequently brought against our companies and private traders.

(I) To this article Mr. Corker subjoined a kind of apology; affirming, that his reason for seizing this ship was, Desnos carrying on an illicit trade, under pretence of paying some debts at Guikan, and his having threatened to destroy the English fort, upon his having been checked for those practices (7).

 “ it was the highest injustice to give liberty of trade to private merchants, in prejudice of the “ sarily one.” Concluding his answer with an earnest exhortation that governor Corker would use all his influence with his constituents, to prevail on them to take the proper measures for suppressing interlopers; and promising on his own part, that it should be represented to the king and parliament of England by the French ambassador.

So earnest was De Brue in fixing a tariff with the English company, that he determined upon a voyage from Senegal to Gambia, where he arrived on the 10th of February 1700, and was kindly received by Mr. Corker at Fort James. Here a conference ensued, at which were present all the captains of ships in the road; but the instructions of the English being very confined, it ended in nothing but mutual civilities. De Brue perceiving, however, that Mr. Corker was secretly of his opinion, flattered himself that he would use all his interest with the English company to establish the proposed regulations: but Corker was recalled, and the Sieur De Brue proceeded on his intended visit to the French factories on the river Gambia (K).

Soon after the arrival of the new governor, the company reinforced the garrison of James for the reparation of the fort, which still bore the marks of the Sieur Gènes's expedition. De

(K) Although it is no part of our present design, yet we cannot omit some entertaining particulars related by De Brue, in this little excursion. At Bintam he found a great number of Portuguese settled, who carried on a considerable trade. Their chief made De Brue a visit, dressed in his robes, which consisted of a long black cloak, a long sword by his side, a hanger before, a flapped hat, like a Quaker's, long mustachios, and a bead-roll in his left hand, that hung down over the pommel of his sword to the knee, in the manner of a sword knot. His ceremonious and stiff gravity of compliment was no less ridiculous than his garb and figure, at which De Brue, with difficulty, restrained laughing. His visit was however returned by the polite Frenchman; who likewise paid his compliments to a rich mulatto lately married to an English captain. This lady, whose name was Agis, having an intrigue with the alkade during the absence of the captain, was delivered of a black child, soon after his return, which so enraged the husband that he beat the child in a mortar, and gave the cruel hatchis to be devoured by the dogs. He was however reconciled to the lady before De Brue's arrival. At Jereja he visited the king, whom he describes as a little man, of an agreeable figure, lively eyes, cheerful countenance, and white teeth. He was invited by the monarch to dinner, and placed between him and his queen, no other servants than females attending at table. The entertainment was good, the conversation cheerful, in which her majesty supported her part with great spirit and politeness. De Brue made them some presents, particularly a case of pistols to the king, who was the greatest warrior of those parts, and extremely feared and respected by all his neighbours; nor are his subjects less warlike than their prince. What deserves admiration is the prudence of the women; who, to avoid loquacity, which would only divert their attention from necessary employments, fill their mouths with small pebbles, or water.

On quitting Jereja, he passed through a country inhabited by a nation called Flups, or Flops, according to Moore; lying between the river Gambia and Cachao. Those who are subjects of the king of Jereja and the Portuguese are tolerably civilized: but the rest, bordering upon the river Kasamansa, are the most barbarous and savage people upon earth, at perpetual war with the rest of mankind, and conducting it with a cruelty to their prisoners too shocking to be mentioned without horror.

From hence he proceeded along the river to a Portuguese settlement, the name of which he omits. Here they drive a prodigious trade in wax. Leaving this he went to Cachao, a Portuguese town and colony, seated on the Rio San Domingo, on the southern bank. It is the chief establishment the Portuguese have in all this country; though the bulk of the inhabitants, called Papel negroes, bear them a mortal aversion. The Portuguese have omitted nothing to fortify this place on the land side, the river being its security on the other. It has a rampart well pallisaded, a great number of cannon, and a garrison of thirty white men, generally composed of criminals banished from Portugal, and were commanded by a captain major, who assumes the title of governor, a lieutenant, an ensign, and an adjutant-major. The garrison is relieved every two years; a period they ardently long for, as the soldiers are so badly paid as to subsist chiefly on what they steal by night. These particulars we had no opportunity of weaving with the texture of the work; yet we thought it might merit the reader's perusal (8).

(8) Vide Labat, t. v. p. 57, & seq.

- a Brue was not wanting in the necessary respect to the new governor, to whom he sent compliments of congratulation on his promotion, and to Mr. Corker, on his felicity in being recalled from so unhealthy a climate, to enjoy those riches in his native country which he had with so much honour acquired in Africa. In return, the new governor sent the chief factor, chaplain, and the captain of a ship, to acknowledge and thank the politeness of De Brue, to request his friendship, and take every possible measure for an accommodation of all differences, the establishing a perfect harmony between the companies, and every other measure that could contribute to their mutual felicity. In a word, they drew up a plan to this purpose, which they were to use all their influence to have ratified at the courts of London and Versailles; and at the same time the English governor communicated to De Brue a memorial, presented to
- b the parliament by the royal African company, from which, and the influence of the English and French ambassadors, he doubted not but every thing would be settled upon a proper footing. After many efforts, all their negotiations terminated in nothing; the influence of private traders, whose interests were directly opposite to those of the companies, throwing insurmountable difficulties in the way. They even obtained, by their credit or liberality to the government, the escort of a man of war for the protection of their trade. Thus new causes of complaint daily arising, the differences became so high, that, in 1702, De Gènes attacked and destroyed James Fort, as we have mentioned; after which the affairs of the English company were fallen so low as to oblige them to propose a treaty of neutrality, which we have reason to believe was accepted, though we can find no other authority for our opinion than the reasonableness
- c of the propositions, the success of the allies, the low estate to which France had been reduced during the war, the cessions made at the treaty of Utrecht, and the silence of all the French writers on this head<sup>1</sup>.

neutrality.

- THE royal African company, trying every means to establish their trade, came to a resolution, in 1732, not farther to molest private traders; but to give all possible encouragement to their own agents to serve them with fidelity. With this view they cheapened provisions at James Fort, and, giving a great extent to their trade, they thought it proper to deal in those commodities which hitherto they had deemed useless, such as gums, bark, skins, and dying woods, chiefly with intention to make the employments of the factors the more profitable. They moreover offered a premium of twenty per cent. to any one who should discover a new article of trade; and the prices of the staple commodities were adjusted. The factors had always been appointed by the court of directors; or, if they ever employed in that function the writers of James Fort, it was with the precaution, that two responsible persons should be bound in a bond of two thousand pounds for their good behaviour, and likewise the individual employed for the same sum: yet, in spite of these ties, the company had frequently sustained considerable losses from the infidelity of their agents; and whenever they were prosecuted, such was the indulgence of the court of chancery, the company could never recover damages, the evidence being such as would not be admitted, that is, the oath of a negro infidel.

the English
company to revive the trade.

- PRIVATE traders pay the king of Barca a duty, which greatly enhances the price of merchandise, particularly of slaves, a prime article of commerce here: and those who sail higher up the river are forced to pay another duty for the liberty of taking in wood and water. Moore is persuaded, that it would be equally advantageous to the company and to private traders, if the great mart of exchange was settled at James Fort; that is, if the company would keep a sufficient stock of slaves at the fort, to furnish ships with a whole cargo, and to be supplied, as often as it is bought off, from the out-factories. This would make it a repository both for European and African commodities, bring the company in a considerable revenue, arising from warehouse-duties, and yet supply the trader at an easier rate and less danger than he can complete a cargo at present. The private merchants could afford to give a higher price at James Fort than up the river, and yet be gainers by coming to this emporium;
- f since it cuts off the delay, accidents, intemperance of the climate, and the exactions of petty negro princes, who are ever rapacious, ever poor, fleecing the fair trader and laborious subject, in proportion as they are squeezed by their superiors. All this would be avoided by purchasing a cargo at once: and the company would have this farther convenience from such an establishment, that they might then buy goods as they pleased: whereas now they cannot, without loss, buy dry goods, unless by taking a quantity of slaves with them. If therefore they sold the slaves to private traders, they might assort their warehouses with the European goods from them, and hence monopolize all the dry goods in the river, in spite of all the efforts of the French and Portuguese. In a word, with due care, they might procure a sufficient quantity of dry goods to load the company's ships homeward bound, without the necessity of making trading voyages along the coast; none of which ever turn out to any considerable advantage<sup>m</sup>.

pany on the river Gambia.

THE English African company maintain a commerce with several of the neighbouring a places to Gambia. To St. Jago and other of the Cape de Verd islands they send all sorts of grain, in return for which they take salt; a commodity quickly bought up in the river Gambia. With Cachao, or Cutcheo, a Portuguese settlement, they deal in bees-wax; but with little profit, it being sometimes so impure and foul, that there will be twenty or thirty per cent. loss upon it. The chief articles of trade on this river are gold, slaves, ivory, and wax; for as to the gum trade, it is not hitherto brought to any degree of perfection. Some years the factors buy up above 2000 slaves; the greater part of which are prisoners of war, persons kidnapped from neighbouring countries, or criminals; though some are the children of those who are born slaves, and bred by the Portuguese, who make a kind of commodity or article of trade. As the number of those stolen is considerable, the factors have directions not to b purchase any slaves without informing the alkade, or chief of the place, that he may enquire into the circumstances of their servitude. Since the slave-trade became so profitable to the negroe princes, the course of justice has taken a more rigorous turn, and every crime, even misdemeanors of a venial nature, are punished with slavery. Thus murder, theft, robbery, and adultery, are confounded with the slightest faults, and all punished in the same barbarous manner. Moore relates, that a native of Mayer, shooting his arrows at a tiger, who had killed his goat, unfortunately slew a man. The king, though he was apprized of the circumstances, inhumanly sold the offender, his wife, children, and effects, among the other slaves, for whom he had bargained with the English.

IVORY, which makes the third article of commerce, is brought sometimes to the factories c in large quantities from Mandingo. The negroes procure it either by hunting the elephant, and slaying it with swords, arrows, and darts; or in the woods, from such of these animals as have died a natural death: for Moore doubts their notion of their shedding their teeth. He has seen a tooth weigh 300 lb. and the price proportionably raised, without any great regard to the colour. The third commodity is bees-wax, of which prodigious heaps are produced in all the kingdoms along the river Gambia; their method of cultivating bees being but little different from that practised in Europe. Besides the gum-trade, which as yet is brought to no height, there are several other articles of some consequence, though greatly inferior to this, were it diligently improved, considering the number of silk manufactures established in this kingdom<sup>n</sup>. At present the French in a manner monopolize this traffick d at Senegal (L).

French and Portuguese
trade on the Gambia, &c.

BEFORE we quit this subject, it is necessary we give the reader an idea of the trade carried on here by the French and Portuguese. The factory at Albreda, belonging to the former, enjoys a considerable traffick; but, according to Moore, might be greatly improved, if their factors had not entered into an agreement with the English, to keep down the price of slaves. In 1735 the great demand for slaves for Mississippi occasioned an infraction of this convention, and raised the price as much too high as before it was too low; the private traders taking an advantage on the one hand, and the American colonies being oppressed on the other. By a convention between the governors of James Fort and Goree, the French were permitted in 1724 to establish a factory a little higher up the river than James Island; e and as an equivalent the English were allowed to trade to Foally and Portodalli, two places of considerable importance in commerce near Goree. Although the factory at Albreda be scarce within reach of the cannon of James Fort, yet the French factors are forced to have permission from the English governor to wood and water, and lay in provisions, and even to cross the river. This liberty is seldom denied; but a soldier from the fort is always sent in the French boat, to watch their actions, and prevent an irregular trade, which is not allowed to extend above Elephant Island, thirty miles (leagues, says Labat), higher than James Fort<sup>o</sup>. As to the Portuguese, they have established themselves in almost all the considerable towns along the Gambia, and carry on a very profitable trade, particularly at Vintain, or Bintam, Jerejab (M), and Tankroval. At the latter Signior Antonio Voss, a black Portuguese, famed f for his wealth and ostentation, has taken up his residence. This gentleman trades largely with the private merchants, retains a great number of domestic slaves, makes a trade of breeding them, carries on by their means, and a number of canoes, a traffick with all the ports up the river, and is by much the most respectable subject round Gambia, or perhaps in any part of Africa; such at least he was in the year 1737. As we have elsewhere delineated these Portuguese mulattoes, we shall proceed to a description of the island and fort of Goree, the only European settlement between the rivers Senegal and Gambia. But the great emporium

(L) We have no account what alterations the capture of that settlement by the English may have in this branch; though we may venture to pronounce, that, if it be kept, the gum will ever be a chief article of trade in Africa.

(M) Moore calls this place Garegia; but we meet with the other orthography in almost all other writers.

a of the trade of this country is at Goree; which, next to Fort Lewis, is the most important settlement the French maintain in Africa, and perhaps more so than Fort Lewis itself, as the situation is stronger, and yet access to it much easier for shipping, at the same time that it enjoys almost all the other advantages of situation. This island, fort, and settlement we shall endeavour to describe with all possible minuteness, that the reader may have a clear idea of the importance of our late successes on that part of the coast of Africa.

b THE name by which the natives call this island is Barfaguicke, if we may credit Barbot; the Dutch who were the first European possessors, giving it the appellation of Goree, from a town of that name in Holland; and Reynold, in his Voyage, speaks of it as a place of considerable trade, under the name of Barfaguicke<sup>p</sup>. In length it is about 420 toises, and in breadth
c not exceeding 124 toises, the whole circumference, according to a late mensuration, being about two English miles, if one includes a point that projects into the sea on the eastern end of the island. Goree stands south-south-west of Cape Verd, within a cannon-shot of the shore, extending itself north-north-east and south-south-west, and consists of a low narrow piece of land, and a small but steep mountain. Notwithstanding its confined dimensions, the situation renders it a very agreeable place: towards the south you enjoy a prospect, terminated only by the sea; northward you discover Cape Verd, and all the other neighbouring capes and promontories. Though it stands in the third torrid zone, as Adamson expresses it, yet the inhabitants breathe a cool and temperate air all the year round, owing to the equality of days and nights, and its banks continually refreshed by alternate breezes from the d land and sea. Besides the multitude of surrounding rocks, that render it almost inaccessible, except at two particular bays, the late director M. de St Jean has embellished the fort with several new buildings, as well as fortified it by works, which render it a place of great strength, though not impregnable, as experience has shewn; though French writers have boasted of it as such. By the diligence of this gentleman, several fresh springs, so much wanted, have been discovered in the island; the gardens have been planted with excellent fruit-trees; legumes and all kinds of vegetables have been made to grow in great abundance, and from a small, barren, and despicable island, he has made it one of the safest, pleasantest, and most important settlements in all Africa<sup>q</sup>. How different was it in Barbot's time, who speaks of it in terms of contempt; the soil a red sand, which produces neither grass, trees, water, or any other thing d besides reeds or rushes, the residence of a great number of wild pigeons<sup>r</sup>.

GOREE was ceded to the Dutch, in the year 1617, by Biram king of Cape Verd, and they immediately secured it by a fort, built on a rock to the north-west, to which they gave the name of Nassau Fort; but finding that this situation did not command the harbour, they erected another fortification called Orange Fort, somewhat nearer the shore. This establishment they kept till they were driven out by admiral Holmes in 1663, who placed an English garrison in it. Two years after it was retaken by De Ruyter, and Mr. Abercromy the governor, and garrison, forced to surrender prisoners of war (N). Upon this the Dutch augmented the fortifications, and the island enjoyed a perfect tranquility till the year 1677, when a e French squadron, commanded by the count d'Estrees, arrived off the harbour on the 30th of October, to disturb their happy repose and flourishing commerce. Next day Hapsar, the Dutch governor, was summoned to surrender, and, on his refusal, the count made preparations to bombard Orange Fort, which obliged the garrison to evacuate it and retire to Fort Nassau, where they expected to capitulate upon honourable terms, though they were soon forced to surrender at discretion. D'Estrees found the island in good condition, the lower fort mounting forty pieces of heavy cannon, and the works kept in excellent repair: but, having no instructions to garrison them, he dismantled this and intirely demolished Nassau Fort. Soon after M. du Casse arrived at Goree, with a forty gun ship, and solemnly took possession of the island, in the name of the Senegal company, and concluded a treaty with the king and negroes of Rufisco, Joal, and Portodalli, on the same conditions the Dutch enjoyed while they possessed f the island. As this measure, which he had taken voluntarily, was approved on his return by the court, he was sent back the following year, in quality of governor, with presents to the negroe kings; and the same year this conquest was secured to the company by the treaty of Nimeguen.

No sooner were the French in full possession, than they set to work, in repairing and adding new works to both the forts, calling the lower fort Vermandois, and the higher St. Michael. Before the year 1681 several unsuccessful attempts were made by the Dutch to recover a place of such importance to trade; but all of them abortive, through the diligence of

Du Casse, who, after gentle remonstrances to the Dutch commodore, at last seized two of his ships, and sent them to Elmina. In 1667 the Sieur De Brue, one of the most diligent and sensible officers ever employed by the company, was sent in quality of director-general, and he put the island in the state of defence in which it remained till the arrival of M. St. Jean, about the year 1750, who improved it in the manner we have related.

THE department or division of the trade belonging to Goree comprehends the commerce of the kingdoms of Kayor, Sin, and Salem, which is indeed extensive. The first of these, called the kingdom of Damel, or Kayor, stands at a great distance from the lake of that name, which is situated in the desert of Zaarab, or Sarab, north of the river Senegal. This trade produces annually upwards of 300 slaves, 20,000 undressed skins or hides, sometimes 80,000, and 250 quintals of ivory; but the oppression of the Damel has diminished the trade, particularly the skin-trade, and almost ruined the inhabitants. The company's trade with Sin is confined to two ports, Joal and Fakika, both within the department of Goree: of these the principal is Joal, because the anchorage is more safe, and the landing or shipping of goods easier. The town is large and populous: and, though the inhabitants are of a brutish and insolent disposition, yet they love commerce, which may be carried on to great advantage with them, after their customs and peculiarities are studied and known. Two reasons contributed to the establishment of a factory at Joal; and the first was, the assurance the French company had of procuring about 200 slaves, above 3000 skins, 1200 or 1500 quintals of ivory, 500 quintals of yellow bees-wax, with some other commodities, upon the same tariff they had settled with the Damel of Kayor. Hence they would have their magazines always well stored, would monopolize the trade, and cut off interlopers from any communication with the kingdom of Sin. The next was, the necessity there was for keeping the Damel in awe, by shewing him that the whole trade did not depend upon his caprice: a measure dictated by experience, and the insolence of that monarch, who would not fail to oppress them, in proportion to the dependence he imagined they had on him. The Bur or king of Sin was at perpetual war with the Damel and Tin, his two most potent neighbours: a contention and rivalry which it was not difficult for the company to turn to their own advantage, by holding the scale in an equal poise, and making their terms with one or other of the parties, as circumstances required. But, besides the merchandize we have mentioned, Joal is capable of supplying Goree, and all the shipping that frequents it, with every kind of provisions they can possibly stand in need of. Cattle, fowls, rice, maize, and all vegetables, are the natural product of the kingdom of Sin, equally cheap and excellent; and salt, with the necessaries of preserving beef for sea, are obtained in abundance from the Cape de Verd islands and Fakika, where it is sold at three livres per barrel (O).

FROM Joal to the river Palmeria is about seven leagues, which is the whole length of the maritime coast of Sin. On which side it seems to terminate in a point, the rest of the kingdom being some hundreds of miles in dimension, and extremely fruitful, except on the frontiers, where it is exposed to the incursions of the enemy, and the robberies and desolations committed by the Tin and Damel. To guard themselves against the tumults which frequently happen among the inhabitants of Joal, and to keep this fierce people in subjection, the company found it necessary to build a strong stone factory, well supplied with small arms and ammunition, together with a considerable number of European servants, not however in quality of soldiers, though defence and security be the principal objects of maintaining them at so great an expence.

THE chief commerce with the kingdom of Salem is carried on by means of Kabone, a village where the river Salem rises from the river Gambia, according to French writers; though Moore and other English voyagers assert, that these two rivers have no sort of connection. It is surprising that the company have not established a more considerable factory in a place so well calculated for commerce as Kabone; for here all the Mandingo merchants stop in their way to Tilipay and Albreda, with the gold, ivory, and slaves they bring from the kingdoms of Tombuto, Bambara, Kona, and other countries of the east. Certain it is, they would be happy to find a good market here, in order to save six days journey farther west, and could afford to sell

(O) We cannot omit in this place a piece of artifice used by the inhabitants of a town near Joal, to prevent a royal visitation, which is always attended with great expence to the people. They pretend, that no horse can live within the town; and so deep root has this political superstition taken, that even many of the more intelligent French and English gave credit to it, till the fraud was detected by De Brue, who rode several times through the streets without any accident befalling his horse. To keep up the belief of this notion, the inhabitants are extremely expert in poisoning those animals, and so secret in it, that they have hardly ever been detected; nor had De Brue's escape any other effect, than persuading the king and majority of the people, that the Frenchman was protected by some very powerful grisgris and enchantment, which it would not be possible for them to obtain (9).

- a their merchandize cheaper in proportion as the journey is shorter, especially as they would then be freed from the exorbitant duties which they pay to the king of Barra. To render the trade of Goree flourishing in the kingdom of Salem, De Brue lays down the following maxims as infallible means of procuring that end. 1st. To keep the forts and garrisons within the department of Goree in such a condition, as to have nothing to fear from the enemies of the state in time of war, or from pirates and the natives in peace. 2d. To have their warehouses constantly stored with European merchandize. 3d. Never to be without some armed vessels, to keep off interlopers. And, 4thly, to be always in a condition to keep the negroes in awe, and within the limits of their treaties, the full execution of which should always be exacted. To these maxims might be added another, of no less consequence; that is, to foment the differences between the Damel, Bur, and Tin, and carefully to guard against the union of any two off these crowns upon the same head: for, in keeping these powers in a just poise, the company have it always in their power to give the law to them all; or, at least, to prevent their laying new restrictions and clogs upon trade, by increasing the duties, already too high. Hence they will likewise be able to prevent their raising the price of provisions, or retrenching the privilege of wooding and watering in their dominions, as they have frequently done, out of caprice, to the great detriment and inconvenience of the factories<sup>1</sup>.

- WITH these kingdoms, or rather according to some authorities, with the kingdom of Kayor alone, the company have settled three tariffs, for the better regulation of trade, one with the king, another with the nobles, and a third with the people; all three proposed and carried into execution by De Brue. The chief, which regards the king, is confined to slaves, and requires, that all the prisoners of war, or their slaves, delivered by his majesty to the company, shall not be over or under a certain age; that is, from forty to ten years; and that they be found in all their limbs and organs, without which they may be returned after due examination. This precaution was the more necessary, as numberless frauds have been committed in the slave-trade with the king, and all of them supported with force, and maintained with an insolent authority, under the pretext of justice. By the royal tariff it was agreed, that two children shall pass in bargains for one man; whereas before this the company had often been compelled to take one infant in the room of a full grown man. In the management of these articles it is that the address of the factors appears.

- d As to the chief articles of trade and exchange, they are distinguished by names seemingly of the negroe extraction, such as the makaton, mortand, bujis, and rata-ton, all of them signifying certain assortments and classes of merchandize, which it would be tedious and unnecessary to enumerate. Sufficient it is that the commerce of Goree is so considerable, that the loss of it will be one of the most sensible strokes the trade of France can receive; as from thence and fort Lewis their West India colonies were supplied with slaves, great exports being made by their means from France, while gums, mohair, skins, sal armoniac, ambergrise, gold, ivory, and ostriches feathers, together with dying woods, and several other valuable articles, were imported<sup>1</sup>.

- c THE island of Arguim, which we have enumerated among the French settlements, though we are told it is now totally abandoned, stands at the bottom of a gulph of the same name, formed by Cape Blanco; from which it is distant about sixteen miles, under 20 degrees 30 minutes north latitude, and about 360 degrees of longitude. Although it is scarce two miles in length, yet has it been for centuries past a bone of contention among the European powers, the Portuguese, Dutch, English, and French, into whose hands it has passed successively, by a vicissitude of fortune; a short account of which will probably not be unpleasing to the reader, as it naturally falls in with our design of giving a complete modern history. Island of Arguim, an account of the wars concerning it among the Europeans.

- f THE Portuguese were the discoverers of Arguim, in the reign of Alphonso, that great prince, who first led the way to distant countries, and exerted the true spirit of trade and navigation. This happened in the year 1444, when a fleet, bound for the east, touched on Arguim, and from some little trade carried on with the natives, gave the Portuguese room to imagine that it might one day turn out to considerable advantage. In consequence of this opinion, they began the following year to fortify the place, but the works were not finished till the reign of John the second, Alphonso's successor. From this time, till the year 1638, the Portuguese enjoyed the peaceable and exclusive commerce of Arguim, when three Dutch ships received a minute account of the condition of the island, from a Moorish vessel they had taken off Cape Blanco; upon which they resolved to attack the Portuguese fort, and accordingly landed without molestation from the garrison, which was too weak to oppose them, and had besides disobliged the Moors by the insolence of their carriage, who were by no means inclinable to take up arms in their defence. They however defended the fort with great intrepidity, obliging the Dutch to make regular approaches, and even large breaches in the walls, before they surrendered, which they at length did upon honourable terms, in February 1638.

No sooner were the Dutch masters of Arguim, than they went to work in erecting fortifications on a regular plan, omitting nothing that could insure them in the property of a place where they intended to found their African commerce. They were making vast strides towards this end, and augmenting greatly the trade established by the Portuguese, when the fort was attacked in 1665, by an English squadron, with such vigour as reduced it in less than ten days to an heap of rubbish; upon which it was surrendered the 28th of June the same year. As the works were almost totally destroyed by bombs, and a slender garrison only left in it, a Dutch squadron found no difficulty in retaking it the year following, and reducing it again under the power of the States General. They now redoubled their diligence in strengthening the island, and extending their trade, by entering into treaties with the Moorish chiefs; procuring a number of families to settle under protection of the cannon of the fort, and giving extravagant prices for gums, in order to monopolize that trade, and more firmly to engage the interest and affections of the natives. This practice it was, that set the Senegal company of France upon fitting out a squadron to reduce Arguim, which had nearly ruined their gum trade. In consequence of this equipment, the island fell into the hands of the French, and was fully ceded to them by a secret article in the treaty of Nimeguen, between Lewis and the States General. Things remained in this situation till the year 1685, at which time the Hollanders finding a cessation of this commerce extremely prejudicial to their trade, endeavoured to resume it by indirect methods. As they could not effect an establishment in their own name, without an infraction of the treaty of Nimeguen, they endeavoured, under the colours of Brandenburgh, to settle themselves, with the consent of the neighbouring Moorish princes; but the vessel sent with this intention was seized by order of the French governor, and the intention frustrated for that time; but, after the peace of Ryswick, resumed again with more success; for now they rebuilt one of the forts which had lain long in ruins. As they were sensible they were taking possession of the property of another nation, whom they were persuaded would sooner or later attempt to recover it, they spared no expence to put themselves in such a condition, as they believed would secure their usurpation, and baffle all the force that France could send out to expel them. A circumstance extremely favourable to the Dutch was, that they had begun to enter upon their design before the treaty of Ryswick was ratified; and tho' the Senegal company had entered protests, and drawn up remonstrances against their conduct, yet they were presented too late to prevent the final resolutions of all the courts to confirm the treaty. Thus the pretended subjects of the elector of Brandenburgh remained in possession of a strong fort at Arguim, in spite of the endeavours of the French company, who did all in their power to prevail on the elector, at that time king of Prussia, to withdraw his protection. Numberless were the memorials, protests, rescripts, and other writings, passed before the year 1701, when a fresh war put a stop to them: the Dutch indeed found it no difficult matter to support a literary war, and thought several reams of written paper a cheap equivalent for so valuable a settlement as that at Arguim.

AFTER the peace of Utrecht, the Senegal company, which had suffered so much by a long war, believed it would be more for their interest to repair their losses by diligence in trade than by entering upon fresh disputes with the Dutch about their possessions. They therefore dropt the affair of Arguim, giving only general instructions to their ships, to seize on all vessels carrying on an illicit trade, without respect to nations. But the new company, erected upon a more extensive plan in 1717, did not bear so patiently with those infractions of treaties; for, perceiving that all their remonstrances to the elector of Brandenburgh had produced no effect, they determined to expel the Dutch by force of arms, and for this purpose fitted out a squadron at Havre de Grace, with a considerable body of land forces on board, under the conduct of Sieur Perier. It was the 26th of February 1721 before this armament arrived at Arguim, and begun their operations; and near the middle of April before the Sieur Perier could complete the reduction of the Dutch, who maintained their post with an obstinacy proportioned to the importance of the object, and with an intrepidity and conduct that had almost baffled all the attempts of the French admiral, and would have certainly obliged him to raise the siege, had he not found means to draw off a Moorish chief from his allegiance to the Dutch. In consequence of this advantage, the Dutch were forced to evacuate Arguim, and retire to Portendic, where they fortified themselves, determining to watch the favourable moment for re-establishing the settlement. Nor was this long wanting, by means of the weakness and pride of the French director, Duval, who imprudently quarrelled with the Moors, and the feebleness of the garrison left for its defence by the Sieur Perier. On the 16th of October the same year, Duval, with a party of men, were surprised, defeated, and put to the sword by a body of Moors, who attacked them as they were viewing the Dutch works at Portendic; and this misfortune paved the way for still greater, and the intire loss of Arguim, which was surprised and taken by the Dutch general and Moors on the 11th of January following.

NEXT year the French company, still persisting in their project to regain the possession of Arguim, equipped another squadron, to drive out by fire and sword the Dutch, whose obstinacy

- a and perseverance were only to be overcome by force. This armament failed from port L'Orient on the 8th of December 1722, and landed the troops on the island of Arguim, on the 17th of February 1723, when they immediately summoned the governor to surrender, and on his refusal began to batter the fort by sea, to cover their approaches by land. After a variety of operations, and a vigorous fire from several batteries they had erected, the French at last gained possession of the cisterns which contained the water of the besieged; but such were the efforts of the garrison to recover them, that the troops were forced to raise the siege with precipitation, and return to their ships, to the utter disgrace of the Sieur Rigaudiere, who conducted the siege, and boasted that the fort could not hold out one day. The Sieur De Brue, who acted in the capacity of commissary, made several strong remonstrances against this measure;
- b but they were ineffectual; the despair of the besieged having inspired them with such courage, as it was supposed terrified Rigaudiere, and made him glad of quitting the island upon any terms.

AFTER this the squadron gave up all thoughts of the recovery of Arguim, and the French, changing situations with the Dutch, established themselves at Portendic, where they rebuilt the fort; nor have we any farther account of their transactions on the island of Arguim, than that, after some abortive attempts of the Sieur De Brue to recover it, Du Casse at length demolished the fort, which has never since been rebuilt by any European nation. This transaction happened in the year 1725, but is so variously related, that we cannot pretend to give the particulars.

- c WE shall conclude this section with a short account of the situation of the island and fort, and the time the latter was destroyed. As to the former it is accessible only to small boats, except at the bay, at the bottom of which stood the fort, upon a rugged point of a rock, about four toises in extent on this side. The walls were of strong brick, about 30 feet high, and proportionably thick. That side facing the island was divided into two strong towns, united by a curtain, all of them well mounted with cannon; and the gate in the middle of the curtain defended by a battery, ditch, and draw bridge. With regard to the strength of the garrison, there can be no certain judgment given, though the French believed from the brisk fire they made, that it must have been considerable <sup>u</sup>.

Containing an account of the navigation of the river Senegal; its trade; the different factories established upon it; a description of the island of Senegal, and fort St. Lewis; of the privileges of the French company; with a particular account of the gum trade, &c.

- d WE come now to the great river Senegal, the source of which is no less disputed, and no better known, than that of Gambia. Some geographers are of opinion, that it rises out of the great lake Mabeira, and passes through a course of 1500 miles, before it discharges itself into the ocean <sup>a</sup>, while others no less obstinately assert it to be a continuation of the Niger, though neither opinions can be otherwise supported than by conjecture <sup>b</sup>. As this is a point of but little consequence to the reader, till the voyagers have pushed their discoveries farther, we shall decline entering upon the merits of the dispute, which cannot possibly be decided by what we have to offer; though it may be proper to observe, that one insurmountable difficulty attends the latter opinion: it is that prodigious ridge of mountains that separates the lakes Mabeira and Nigris, the Senegal running through or from the former, and the Niger emptying itself in the latter, or passing along westward through it (A).

- e NOR is the etymology of the name given this river a point less warmly disputed than its source. By all the Europeans it is called the Senegal, Senega, Zanega, or Zenega; but whence this name is derived, is a question frequently agitated by writers, who have left it just as obscure as they found it. If we may credit Sanutus, it was known to the ancients under the name of Asana, or Asanaga, a sound not very remote from Zanega. Labat however offers another

(A) In this manner that excellent geographer, Mr. Bolton, has corrected D'Auvillé's map of Africa; and yet the concurring opinions of Leo Africanus, Marmol, Labat, Prevost, and many other moderns, seem to make no dispute, that the Senegal and Niger are undoubtedly the same; or at least, that the former is a branch of the latter. However, if Mr. Bolton has rightly laid down the situation of the above mountains, the opinion of those authors must be absurd.

solution of the difficulty, from what he relates as a fact. When the Europeans first arrived <sup>a</sup> at the mouth of this river, they met with some fishermen, of whom they asked its name; one of the natives imagining they enquired after his own name, replied Zenega, which appellation, though by mistake, the Europeans have ever since applied to the river, with only a very small alteration of sound. Without waiting to examine into the credibility of this report, or how the native should have so nearly understood the meaning of an European language he had never heard, we shall pass to a description of this river as far as known, that being a subject of more utility and certainty <sup>c</sup>.

THE river Senegal is doubtless one of the largest rivers of Africa; for, without ascending higher than the lake Benin, (the farthest that Europeans have penetrated, at least upon unquestionable authority) it is 800 leagues to the island of Senegal, near the mouth of the river. <sup>b</sup> So cruel, so savage, and so barbarous are the inhabitants, that few people's curiosity is sufficient to carry them through the dangers and fatigues which would necessarily attend such a pursuit; and perhaps the farther discovery is left to those zealous and indefatigable missionaries, to whom the learned already owe so many obligations for the patience, perseverance, and obstinate courage, with which they have prosecuted the interests of science, in different parts of the world. Within two leagues of the sea, the river in its course takes a sudden turn to the south, and for the remainder of its passage is divided from the sea only by a natural ridge of sand, sometimes not an hundred toises over from the sea. By this curve which it forms, it prolongs its course for twenty-five leagues farther from north to south, till at length it discharges itself in the ocean, in fifteen degrees fifty minutes north latitude. <sup>c</sup> This great river it is that separates the country of the negroes from the Moors of Zara, or the desert, stretching by a number of windings to a prodigious length, from east to west; that is, from the cataracts of Galam, beyond which the French have made no discoveries, to its entrance at Biyurt, or Rieurt, a short way below the island Senegal.

THIS vast river is extremely rapid, which is attributed to the space passed through by so large a body of water, confined within so narrow a chanel; the mouth of the river being no more than half a league over, and that choaked up with sand, called a bar, which makes the passage extremely difficult and dangerous; it requiring, as we have lately seen, the address of the most experienced pilots to surmount it, even with small ships. Labat affirms, indeed, that it is not practicable to cross the bar with a vessel drawing above six feet water; but this <sup>d</sup> opinion, if we are not mistaken, has been contradicted by late experience. This bar is doubly dangerous, on account not only of the shallowness of the water at all times, but of the shifting of the bar, and the change of its situation after floods and heavy rains, by which the chanel is lost, and new soundings requisite to discover them; indeed, the Senegal would be quite shut up, but for one chanel of 200 toises in breadth, and two fathoms depth, which has long kept its situation immovable, amidst the floods and overflowings of the river. Labat indeed says, that the bar is sometimes four, sometimes only two, miles below Fort St. Lewis on the island of Senegal; if so, it is difficult to conceive how this chanel should retain constantly the same depth and breadth, amidst the frequent shiftings of the bank. It is this alone <sup>e</sup> that prevents ships of five or six hundred tons from entering the river, and mooring under the fort; an inconvenience that obliged the French company to keep a vessel constantly at anchor in the chanel, for no other purpose than to keep an account of the soundings. This vessel is manned by free negroes, called laptots, employed in the service of the company chiefly for their address in swimming. Yet, in spite of their skill and courage, both the vessel and them are frequently lost.

BUT although the bar be attended with this inconvenience, it is not without nearly equivalent advantages, since to it the fort owes its chief strength and security. It is this, says Labat, that renders Fort St. Lewis impregnable to shipping, and indeed to enemies of every kind, by sea or land; for as this bar changes its situation yearly, sometimes oftner, without being <sup>f</sup> possibly perceived from the sea, it requires constant practice to discover the chanel, the soundings, and the proper occasions and seasons for passing, nothing of which can be expected from strangers. Yet after all, however true these facts may be, certain it is, that Fort St. Lewis is now in the hands of the English. The most commodious time of the year for crossing the bar is, from the month of January till August, the winds being then variable, the river smooth, and the bar fixed till the ensuing rainy season; when the prodigious swell of the river, and south-west winds, opposed to its rapid course, raise waves of so prodigious a height at the bar, that their clashing resembles the shock of mountains, and so furious, as to dash in pieces the stoutest ship. Labat says, that the worst season is in November and September, the winds then blowing northerly, and absolutely excluding all navigation, even of the smallest boats.

AFTER crossing the bar, you find yourself in a beautiful smooth and gently gliding river, <sup>g</sup> at four fathoms depth, equal to what any part of the world affords. In advancing a league

- a higher, you see the country on the south side, clothed with a beautiful verdure, the trees in perpetual bloom, the flocks skipping round you every where, with all that wantonness inspired by plenty, and a certain cheerfulness in every countenance, the result of the felicity and security they enjoy, than which nothing can form a more agreeable contrast to the dry, sandy, and barren points of land, that first present themselves to shipping. All around lie a great number of islands, all of them pleasantly stocked with trees, fruits, herbage, and birds, but appropriated to no use by the French company (B), except the island of Senegal, on which stands Fort St. Lewis, in the latitude of 16 degrees 5 minutes north, according to Labat, though we take it to be somewhat less. It is situated in the very middle of the river, two, three, or four miles from its entrance, according as the bar happens to shift. Froger, who measured it in 1705, reckons it about 1150 toises in length, from north to south. An engineer who took its dimensions in 1714, agrees with the former mensuration as to the length, and says, that its breadth at that end towards the bar is no more than 90 toises, at the opposite extremity 180 toises, and 130 in that part where the fort stands. The eastern branch of the river is 380 toises broad, and the western 210, the island itself being only a dry, sandy desert, and barren spot of ground, of no value, but for the very purpose used by the French, who were led to prefer it to the other islands on account of its size. One half of the year it is destitute of water, having neither springs or wells, and the water of the river being too salt for use. At present there remain of the ancient Fort of St. Lewis but four round towers, which do not stand in a line, but form a kind of obtuse angle, of which the two middle towers are not distant more than four toises and a half. They are exceedingly well built, in the old taste, and covered with tiles. Formerly they were joined by a curtain, strengthened by pallisadoes, and a covered way and ravelin, beneath which were magazines, and behind some ill-judged bastions; but the greatest security of the fort is its natural situation. The cannon of the fort consisted of thirty pieces of artillery, distributed on different batteries; and the arsenal was well supplied with stores and small arms, but as the company employ no more than 200 men in the six settlements they have on this coast, the garrison cannot be very numerous, and yet no men are more inconveniently lodged. The sieur De Brue, on his taking possession of his office, was astonished to find all the company's servants lodged without the fort; he immediately made some remonstrances on this head, obtained some satisfaction, but not the execution of a plan he drew out, that would have made the fort equally strong and commodious at a small expence. Besides this, the French have no other fort upon the river but Fort St. Joseph, about ten leagues below the cataract at Govina, though there are a few factories dispersed up and down in different parts. At Podor, indeed, there is a kind of fort.

Senegal and
Fort St. Lewis.*

- To conclude our account of the Coast of Guiney (for so it is called from Cape Blanco, to the Rio Formosa or Benin), the privileges of the French company extend from Cape Blanco, and the island of Arguim, to the Sierra Leona; that is, from 20 degrees 30 minutes, to 9 degrees 30 minutes north latitude, comprehending within this district six forts, besides a few little unfortified factories. These are, Arguim, on an island of that name, situated in a bay formed by Cape Blanco; to which may be subjoined the harbour and factory of Portendic, in the territory of Alichandora, the son of Addi, chief of the Moors of the tribe of Eterarza, three miles farther south than Portendic. The next is Fort St. Lewis, in the island of Senegal. The third is Fort St. Joseph, above 300 miles up the river Senegal, upon which depends another little fort, called St. Peter's Fort, standing a few miles farther east, and both in the kingdom of Galam. The fourth is Goree, in the island of that name, a few leagues nearer the continent than the Cape de Verds; which, for the excellency of its harbour, the strength of the fort, and the extent of its commerce, may well be reputed the head settlement of the French company in Africa, although the residence of the director general was usually at Fort St. Lewis. Joual is the fifth, and stands on the coast between Goree and the river Gambia. Labat thinks, that this factory well deserves the expence of fortifying it, as its advantageous situation and extensive traffick would well support the charges of a garrison. The sixth settlement is that at Albreda, in the vicinage of James Fort in the river Gambia<sup>a</sup>. To these we may add the little factories of Jereja and Bissao, the first standing on a river of the same name, that falls into the Gambia near Albreda, and the other on the island of Bissao, both of them capable of great improvement, but at present unfortified and of little consequence.

VARIOUS have been the revolutions of the fort of Portendic and Arguim, which have been alternately in the hands of the French, English, Dutch, and Moors, and at length abandoned and destroyed, notwithstanding the great trade carried on by them in gum, ambergris,

(B) It is so short a time since the command of this river fell into the hands of the English, that we speak of it as it stood while the French possessed it; for it is probable, the only change it has yet undergone is of its masters.

An account of the gum trade. ostriches feathers, and other commodities. As the gum trade now carried on by the river Senegal is, perhaps, the most considerable branch of the French commerce in Africa, it will not be disagreeable to the reader to have a particular account of this commodity. Although no country could be less inviting than all that tract, from Cape Blanco to the kingdom of Morocco, no coast more inhospitable, desert, sandy, and poor, than that round Arguim and Portendic; yet was it the occasion of infinite contentions among the European nations, who all endeavoured to establish themselves here as the only mart, besides Senegal, of the gum trade, to which the Moors and other Africans all resorted with that commodity. This in itself would appear but a trifling branch of trade, though two reasons have contributed to raise its value, and render it very considerable. It is sold by the Moors at a very reasonable price, in proportion to the value it bears in Europe, which circumstance alone would make the trade beneficial, were it not greatly augmented by the extravagant demand for it on account of the silk and other manufactures. This it is, that has excited the emulation of European states, and made the French nation, whose manufactures in this way are perhaps the most considerable, so extremely jealous of the gum trade, and vigilant to monopolize it. Hence it was, that all commercial nations struggled for the possession of such a treasure; that the Dutch expended so large sums in the support of their fort at Arguim; and that after they were chased from thence, they endeavoured to establish themselves to as much advantage at Portendic, and drive this commerce with the three Moorish nations, of which we shall give a short account at the conclusion of this section.

THE gum imported to Europe by the French company, or the interlopers, is called Gum Senega, Senegal, Zanega, or Arabic. The latter name it has, because, before the institution of the company, all the gum used in Europe was imported under the name of Gum Arabic; but after they had opened this commerce, the price of the commodity sunk in proportion to the quantity imported, and the gum came to be universally known by the appellation of Gum Senegal (C). Voyagers attribute a number of medicinal virtues to this substance, founding their opinion upon the extraordinary cures the negroes perform with it; but as these have not been consonant to the experience of the best European practitioners, we shall beg leave to omit them. As to its utility in arts and manufactures, every one, who knows how necessary it is to the limner, silk weaver, dyer, and many other artificers, may judge of the importance of the gum trade, and of the policy of our neighbours in monopolizing it.

LABAT describes the tree producing this gum, as a species of acacia, small, prickly, full of branches, and clothed with leaves moderately long, extremely narrow, and of a perpetual verdure. It bears a white flower, composed of five leaves forming a kind of cup, but according to other naturalists, of one infundibuliform leaf, and the flowers collected in clusters or little heads. The pistil rises from the bottom of the flower, and at length becomes a pod of three or four inches long, filled with small, round, hard, and black grains, which serve to propagate the species (D). Of this species of gum tree there are three forests, between the north side of the Niger or Senegal, and Arguim or Cape Blanco (E). The first the natives call Sabel, the second, which is the most considerable, is called Lebian, and the third, Afatack; all of them situated in the desert north of the river, and at nearly equal distances from it; that is, about thirty miles from Fort St. Lewis; being separated from each other by a barren space of about ten leagues. Every year produces two crops, if we may so express ourselves, of gum; the first, which is the best, in the month of December, and the other in March. The first tears, drops, or exsudations, are the largest, purest, and driest, with every other advantage required in this drug; the other more soft, glutinous, and impure, for reasons extremely obvious.

(C) The bodies which go under the general name of gums, are extremely numerous, and many of them improperly classed under that head, as they appear, upon examination, to be true resinous substances. Most writers still make a difference between the Senegal and Arabic gums, the latter being by them supposed of higher value, but scarce ever found in the shops. It is a concrete substance, exsuding from the Egyptian acacia tree, and imported from Turkey in small irregular masses or strings, of a pale yellowish colour. The truth however is, that both gums issue from the same tree, and are of directly similar virtues, notwithstanding the Senegal is in larger and less pure masses. The single drops are frequently of the bigness of an egg; the surface rough or wrinkled, and less bright than the interior parts. The negroes dissolve it in milk, and in that state make it a principal ingredient in many of their most delicious dishes, and often indeed, feed on it alone. As for us, we are neither perfectly acquainted with the tree that produces it, nor with its medicinal virtues, if it has any, for it is rarely used in the shops; and even the gum Arabic but little prescribed by the best practitioners, the chief consumption being among dyers and other artificers.

(D) If we mistake not, this species of acacia ought to be classed with the polyandria of Linnaeus, so highly prized for their flowers by the Chinese, which they use in dying that beautiful yellow, that we find bears washing in their silks and stuffs; but this we submit to more experienced naturalists.

(E) It is remarkable, that Barbot describes the gum tree as extremely large, and greatly resembling that American tree which the natives call Malput, and to which our naturalists have given no name (1).

(1) Barbot's description de la Guinée, p. 46.

- a The December crop is gathered after the rains have ceased, and the moisture of the earth has rendered the sap more abundant in the trees, which the sun has perfectly concreted and digested, without exhaling the virtues; whereas that in March is procured by making incisions in the trees, they having too little vigour of themselves to produce a crop.

GATHERING the gum in these large forests, is the employment of three different tribes of Moors, the principal of which is called in the Arabic, the tribe of Eterarza, whose chief is Alichandora, who superintends his people at work, and confines them to the forest of Sabel. Chem is the head of the next tribe, called the tribe of Anlad-El-Hagi, who confine their rights of gathering gum to the forest of Lebian or Hebian; and the chief of the third tribe, or that of Abraguena, is called Baccar, his privileges extending all over the forest of Alfatack, and no farther. We shall speak of these different tribes more particularly in the margin. The first of these princes exacted a high duty from the Dutch, while they were in possession of a fort at Arguim; and the French still pay customs for the liberty of trading, though it will be difficult to ascertain their amounts, from the long list of articles mentioned in the tariff settled by De Brue in the year 1715 (F). What chiefly regards the reader, is an account of the inhabitants of that vast space lying between the river Senegal and the empire of Morocco, concerning whom we shall endeavour to give him some satisfaction<sup>f</sup>.

(F) Labat gives us a striking picture of the chiefs of these tribes, all of which, he says, are marbuts, or preachers and teachers of the law of Mohammed. To judge by their modest and sedate exterior, by their discourse, which always begins and ends with an invocation to the Supreme Being and his prophets, and by their public conduct, one would set them down for rigid believers and observers of the doctrine they teach, as they are austere and scrupulous in the self denial of even the most trivial enjoyments of life. But, says he, when we remove the veil, and penetrate into their private conduct and real sentiments, all is found to be outside and mere hypocrisy, dissimulation, avarice, cruelty, ingratitude, superstition, and ignorance. In vain do you look for any of the moral virtues among them; faith, honour, and a regard to their engagements, they have no idea of. They are a set of Mohammedan pharisees, who look upon external virtue as the means and necessary instrument of secret fraud, drunkenness, and every other vice that can fill the human heart. They have taken infinite pains in making converts to their faith, and their success has been answerable to their diligence, which is not exceeded by the catholic missionaries themselves; and perhaps with similar views, as appears from the new erected monarchy of the jesuits in Paraguay. One thing however, is extraordinary, that few of the negroes who have once embraced the Mohammedan religion, ever again depart from it, notwithstanding the slavish dependence in which they are held by the marbuts.

They all acknowledge the supremacy of the emperor of Morocco, in temporals, and many of them acknowledge him as their Khalif, and head in spirituals; tho' they never go so far as to pay him tribute. But of this we shall have occasion to speak more minutely in the following sections (2).

S E C T. XIV.

Containing an account of the desert of Zaara or Sarah, and the country of Biledulgerid; of the Moorish nations that inhabit those countries, and of their manners and trade; with a description of the island of Bissao, its government, religion, and manners of the natives of the people called Balontes; and of the Bassagoe islands.

- c THE country north of Senegal, called Zaara, Sarah, or the Desert (A), is inhabited, according to Leo Africanus, by six different Moorish nations or tribes, the Sanagas, Sonensigas, Fuergas, Lamptions, Bardoas, and Levatas, situated along the ocean on the east, in the order in which we have enumerated them. Sarah or the Desert, and Biledulgerid, extend from the Atlantic ocean to the east, as far as Ethiopia superior; are supposed to run along parallel to Nigritia, and to lie between the 20th and 28th degrees of north latitude, being bounded by the territories of the empire of Morocco and Barbary on the north, by Ethiopia on the east, on the south by Nigritia or Negroland, and by the Atlantic ocean on the west. The northern part of this tract, called Biledulgerid in our best maps, is denominated in the charts of voyagers by the name of Gualata; and the southern part, called Zaara or Sarah by most geographers, is by mariners called the country of Arguim, and frequently the country of Zanaga or Senegal: 'tis by this variety of names, that such confusion is introduced into the works of the greater number of modern writers and geographers<sup>a</sup>.

(A) According to most geographers, this country is laid down under the general name of the Desert of Barbary; D'Anville and Bolton call it the country of Zanaga (1).

THESE nations, though sprung from the same origin as the Moors of Barbary, are however distinguished by these as different, and they again consider the merchants of Barbary, that come among them to trade, as quite another people. Notwithstanding this, all European writers confound them, and Labat in particular is guilty of this error, as often as he speaks of them. Spain was conquered by the Arabians, and in progress of time was wrested from them by the Moors of Fez and Morocco; yet do few of the Spanish writers distinguish these two conquests, implying indifferently the terms of Moor and Arab to denominate either people; while others, with still more confusion, call all the followers of Mohammed in Africa by the general name of Moors. The more ancient moderns, however, as well as the Arabic authors, make use of both names to express the different nations, and hardly ever confound them; as may fully be seen in the history of the Saracens, translated by Erpenius, from the Arabic of Elmacines, son of Abuljassers Elamid<sup>b</sup>; and in Gramaye's history of Africa<sup>c</sup>, as well as in Leo Africanus<sup>d</sup>; which is a remark we thought worthy of the attention of the reader, as we believe it may have escaped us in our history of the Arabians. In a word, the Arabs of Barbary, who are numerous and distinct from the rest of the inhabitants, have likewise been confounded with them, under the general appellation of Moors, by the greater number of modern writers, who seem to think that there are no Arab nations out of the boundaries of Arabia Proper. But not to dwell on this circumstance, perhaps not very important, we shall observe, that the religion of the Moors of Sarah and Biledulgerid is Mohammedism, tho' they have neither mosques or any other fixed place of worship. They pray in their tents, and perform their devotions wherever they happen to be, at stated times, after washing themselves with water, or, if that is wanting, rubbing over their bodies with sand, which they look upon as a kind of ablution. Their passion for gain is still however stronger than their devotion; they refuse no fatigue or danger in quest of wealth, but all the fervor of religion cannot oblige the Arabs of the district of Arguim to undertake the long pilgrimage to Mecca, although they often go to Tombuto, Gago, and Galam, on the business of commerce, from whence they bring prodigious returns of gold. This expedition they undertake in large caravans, loaded in going with salt, cloths, and iron instruments, which they exchange for gold, ivory, musk, bezoar, and slaves; making prize of whatever falls in their way, and slaves of friends or foes, who encounter them on the road, provided it be not to trade; like those vessels which exercise at the same time trade and piracy. Sometimes indeed, when they can do it secretly, they seize on the negroes, who come to trade with them, and sell them afterwards to the Europeans, or the Moors of Fez and Morocco<sup>e</sup>.

Three Moorish nations that inhabit these countries, an account of their manners and trade.

BETWEEN Cape Blanco and the river Senegal there are chiefly three Moorish nations, who acknowledge the sovereignty of no princes, each canton being governed by a kind of chief chosen out of their own number, but generally the most wealthy and considerable person of the tribe. Thus the government is a kind of mixed constitution, but favouring more of republican principles, nothing being done without the advice and approbation of a council, and indeed of the whole tribe; while the whole body is governed by the joint councils of the three nations, in the same manner as Holland, where each province has its peculiar laws, independent of the will of the States General. These chiefs are commonly marbuts, who are entertained with great respect and veneration by the people, rather from an apprehension of the power of their enchantments and grisgris, than from any sentiments of religion.

AMONG the Arabs, are some of the most beautiful horses on earth; the true breed of Barbary, greatly improved by a mixture of blood with the Arabian kind, which are bought at an extravagant price. They likewise rear a great number of camels, cows, oxen, sheep and goats; yet, except on festivals and particular occasions, they seldom kill these animals for the use of their tables, eating in their stead ostriches, antelopes, deer, apes, and sometimes lions, which they kill in the chase. Their oxen and camels are used in transporting their baggage, when the want of forage obliges them to remove their quarters, or they go trading journeys to the kingdoms of Galam, Fez, or Morocco.

THE arms employed by them in their wars, which frequently happen among themselves, and in their hunting parties, are the sabre and dart, which last they throw with great dexterity, seldom missing the object aimed at. They have also a kind of musquets, and holsters or case-pistols, which they buy from the Dutch and French, soon rendered useless by rust, contracted from the nitrous quality of the atmosphere<sup>f</sup>. As their workmen are incapable of cleaning and repairing them, their fire arms are but little valued, except as curiosities, and generally neglected for their ancient arms; a circumstance of great advantage to the Europeans, who might find it difficult otherwise to defend themselves against so warlike, roving, and predatory a people (B).

(B) Labat, in speaking of the people that inhabit the country between Cape Blanco and Senegal, calls them indifferently Moors and Arabians, not knowing which of these names to fix upon, as they are descended from the

- a BOTH Moors and Arabs round Arguim and Senegal are inviolably attached to the customs and manners of their ancestors, if we except a few, who pitch their tents and cabins under the walls of Portendic, either nearer or farther from the sea, as the season and their affairs require. These in many particulars have fallen into the European manners, and are for that reason heartily despised by the rest of their countrymen. The tents and cabins of this people are all of a conical form, the former being made of the hides of animals, so exactly seamed, as to admit no water in the most rainy season. Labat tells us, their tents are made of a kind of manufactured wool and hair, which is the proper and almost sole employment of their women. But other authors inform us, that all domestic cares are left to them, even that of looking after the camels, laying in wood and water, making bread, and providing victuals for the family; yet notwithstanding this subjection in which they are held, they are beloved, and in other respects tenderly treated, by their husbands (C). However, if the woman be deficient in any essential duty to her husband, she is driven forth out of the house, and her father, brothers, and other relations, all take part in her quarrel, and resent the indignity done their family, tho' at the same time they receive her but coldly, for having by her imprudence occasioned such a breach among friends. In general, the men look upon it as doing honour to themselves, to cloath their wives genteelly, sparing no expence in making them appear with a lustre becoming their rank; and the profits of trade are usually applied to this purpose; the gold that remains unfold being converted into female ornaments and trinkets.

- c THEIR women never appear without a long veil, which covers their face and arms; nor are the Europeans ever upon so familiar a footing as to see them uncovered, except by accident. Both men and women are in general well proportioned, of a middling stature, extreme fine features, with a beautiful symmetry of face. As the men are much exposed to the sun, their complexion is tawny, but delicate, and it is probable that the women are more fair and beautiful. However this may be, Labat assures us, that they amply compensate any deficiency in complexion by their prudence, oeconomy, and strict fidelity to their nuptial engagements; gallantry being an enjoyment they are intire strangers to; perhaps because the occasions for practising it rarely offer. They not only live alone, but a man turns away his head when he chances to meet a woman, even his own wife, except at the time appointed for the marriage freedoms. They mutually assist each other in watching the conduct of their wives and daughters, and preventing every man besides the husband from entering their tents. One who is too poor to have separate tents for the women, transacts all business, and receives visits at the door in the open air; nor are his nearest friends permitted to sit or converse with his wives in the tent. This is a privilege reserved for their horses, or rather mares, which are preferred on account of their beauty, the advantages of breeding, their tameness, and docility. They lie down in their tents mixed promiscuously with the women and children, their little foals being the playfellows of infants, without ever any accidents ensuing.

- e THE dress both of the Moors and Arabs in this country is extremely simple; consisting chiefly of a robe or castan of serge, some woollen stuffs, or blue and white cotton; and sometimes of silk, but rarely. This is no other than a large cassock, without buttons, tied round the neck, so wide as to fold two or three times about the body, and bound round the waist by a kind of sash, in a manner of the Turks, to which is suspended a long knife like a bayonet, and sometimes two. Mr. Adamson says, that the dress both of men and women consists in a large shirt, commonly of black linnen, and a paan, with which the women cover their heads and shoulders; the men sometimes rolling it about their heads in imitation of a turban, and sometimes round their middle like a waist-band. Some of the women wear their hair long and flowing, others again tie it up in a knot, but the men in general are negligent of it, suffering it to hang about their ears, strait or curled as nature intended<sup>a</sup>. All of them wear purses or pouches of cotton, silk, or fine leather, neatly bordered and ornamented by the women. They wear sandals or rather socks of Morocco leather, which mount to the small of the leg, f and their heads are covered with a red bonnet or cap, bordered with white cotton. Above all their cloaths they frequently wear a kind of long loose robe, of white or striped cotton, or rather woollen stuff, which they call baik, and is extremely becoming and genteel. This robe is adorned with a long pointed hood, that hangs down behind, to the extremity of which hangs a tuft or tossel, by a long string. Many of the poorer sort are however cloathed after the the latter, and by residence mixed with the former. One general characteristic is however sufficient, since they may be called Moors from their religion, which is the Mohammedan.

(C) A late French traveller describes the Moorish tents, of a conical form, covered with a thick stuff, made of goats and camels hair, impenetrable to the rain. They were ranged in a circular form, each supported by a pole in the middle, and fixed all round with thongs of ox skins, fastened to stakes, about a foot from the ground, something in the manner of our military tents in Europe (2).

(2) Adamson, p. 66.

manner of the negroes, that is, with a bit of cloth wrapped round the waist for decency, the rest of their bodies, arms, and legs, being naked. a

As to the women, they dress differently; a long cotton shift, with long and wide sleeves, large drawers, and a piece of linnen or callico, that covers them from head to foot, flowing in an easy manner behind, forms their principal dress. They all wear pendants and ear-rings, rich in proportion to their station and ability; besides which their fingers are loaded with rings, their arms with bracelets, and their legs with chains of brass or copper.

WHEN a number of tents or cabins stand together, so as to form a town or village, in which whole tribes dwell, they call it Adouar, which is generally of a circular form, the tents standing exceeding thick, and in the center an empty space, by way of fold for their cattle. Every side of this encampment is watched by centinels, to guard against surprizes from robbers or wild beasts. On the smallest danger, the centinels give the alarm, which is soon spread over the camp by the barking of dogs and the noise of different animals, upon which every man able to bear arms stands on his defence, each before his own tent. These Adouars are easily transported from place to place, as neither the Moors or Arabs incumber themselves with a variety of household furniture; nay, indeed, so little, that all the domestic implements of a family are contained in one leathern bag or sack, which is hardly the burthen of an ox, or small horse, and easily transported, tent and all, to any distance, on the back of a camel. b

THEIR common drink is water or milk and whey, and their only bread is cakes made of millet; not that nature has denied them the use wheat and barley, which grow to great perfection in several parts of the country, but their continual motion from one country to another, and their dislike to a fixed residence, destroys all taste for agriculture. Were they to sow wheat, other nations might reap it; for no inducement could engage these fickle rovers to continue a whole season in one place, which they would look upon as a highly culpable inactivity, however useless and unnecessary their rambling excursions may be. c

WHEN they chance to have a stock of grain, either barley or wheat, they lay it up in deep pits cut out of a rock, so dry that no granary can exceed them for preserving the corn. They call them matamors, and contrive them with abundance of art, the form being such as to cause a constant suction and draught of fresh air through the whole cavern, narrow at the entrance, and gradually enlarging itself as you enter, in proportion to its length, which sometimes is upwards of thirty feet. Certain it is, that the grain will keep sound for several years in these subterraneous storehouses, the mouths of which they stop up with wood and sand, after the corn is sufficiently dry. d

THE Moors have a kind of portable mills, with which they grind their corn in such quantities as they have occasion for; and these they always carry about with them wherever they go. Authors do not particularly describe the form of these mills, but from circumstances we have reason to believe they are no other than two rough flat stones, which by a circular motion of the uppermost grinds the corn lodged between them; a kind of mill stones, extremely common in the Hebrides, and many of the western parts of Scotland; and, indeed, among all nations ignorant of the arts. They eat always with their right hand, the left being wholly appropriated to less honourable offices; and instead of knives, spoons, and forks, they use their fingers, with which they form their food in balls, chucking these with great address into their mouths. If a fowl is dressed with rice, they cut it in quarters before it comes to table, to save the necessity of using knives. At their meals they squat themselves down on their hams, sitting cross legged round a covering of Morocco leather, or mat of palm leaves spread upon the ground, upon which their dishes and plates of copper or ivory are laid; and it is a rule with them never to drink till they are just quitting the table to go and wash, a ceremony that cannot be omitted without the greatest indecency. Two meals a day are the most they ever allow themselves, one in the morning, and another at night; but the women are never permitted to eat with them. Their repasts are short and silent, not a syllable passing till they have washed and returned to the pipe and bottle, or rather coffee, when conversation begins. Although their religion forbids the use of wine and spirits, yet in private they freely quaff brandy, which they have from the Europeans, and the juice of the grape, or wines made from palms and other trees, so abundant in many parts of Africa; nay, their very marbuts dispense with the rigour of the law in this respect, when they can do it secretly, and without a breach of decorum; for they regard little more than appearances. e

THIS temperance in meals it probably is that renders the Moors and Arabs of Sarab and Biledulgerid absolute strangers to physic and medicine, so much cultivated by their predecessors. The only distempers to which they are subject are pleurisies and dysenteries, both which they are said to cure by the application of simples internally and externally. As for the gout, gravel, stone, and a number of other diseases acute and chronical, the effects of luxury and idleness, they are utter strangers to them. Barbot indeed says, that such is the wholesomeness of the climate of Sarab and Biledulgerid, that the inhabitants live to a great age, without knowing what sickness is, seldom dying before the course of life is consumed with years, and the vital heat g a heat extinguished from a rigidity of the solids, and diminution of the circulating fluids. With them a man at sixty is in the prime of life, marries and begets children, with all the vigour of an European at thirty; and experience has shewn, that the less they are connected with foreigners, and the more strictly they adhere to their primitive manners, the fewer are the maladies and diseases with which they are afflicted. In a word, while they maintain the simplicity of their original frugality and rigid oeconomy, no people on earth are blessed with so uninterrupted a flow of health and spirits<sup>1</sup>.

b THE passionate fondness which mothers express for their children, would be extremely commendable, were it not carried to a degree of weakness, superstition, and absurdity. They diligently watch to prevent every thing that can possibly injure them, and are so ridiculous in their tenderness, as to imagine, that envious, malignant, or what they call an evil eye, can bring diseases and misfortunes upon them: a notion not peculiar to Moors and Arabs, for we find it prevalent among the vulgar in Spain, Portugal, and even the northern kingdoms, where they use amulets and other preservatives against the effects of a malicious glance. As for the Moors, they know no other charm against an evil eye than their grisgris, or certain mysterious passage transcribed by their marbut from the Alcoran. Boys are circumcised at the age of fourteen years, after which they are at liberty to marry as soon as they can maintain a wife, and, indeed, to purchase her; for here fathers make an estate of a large family of daughters, every one who addresses them making presents to the parents of horses, camels, and horned cattle. The affection of the husband is estimated by his liberality, and the young lady is never delivered over c to him, till he has satisfied the parents of his merit, by the extravagance of his presents. If, upon her coming home, he should find his expectations of her beauty and chastity disappointed, he is at liberty to send her back; but then he must forfeit the presents he has made.

d WITH regard to their funerals, they greatly resemble the ceremonies observed by the negroes on these occasions. No sooner a Moor has breathed his last, than one of his women, or some relation, puts their head in at the door of the tent, and bursts out in a horrible cry; upon which signal, all the women of the Adouar set up a lamentable shriek and dismal yelling, which they utter with all their might, so as to alarm the whole village or camp, upon which all the people assembled round the tent of the deceased, some deploring his loss in moans, and others e singing his praises in melancholy strains suited to the occasion. From the lively and natural representation of grief they counterfeit, from their assumed melancholy, feigned tears, and unfelt sighs, one would imagine they were all the friends and kindred of the dead corpse that bewailed their loss, and did honour to his memory; yet here it is all mere form, that touches not the heart, and is bestowed on all men without distinction of merit. Afterwards the body is washed, properly dressed, and placed on a rising ground to be viewed by all till the grave is dug, after which it is interred with the head elevated a little, the face turned to the east, and the grave covered with large stones, to prevent the corpse from being dug up by wild beasts.

e AS to the knowlege of the Moors and Arabs of the deserts, it is extremely limited, and indeed so scanty, that the marbuts alone are able to read Arabic or any other language, and their learning confined wholly to the Koran and law of Mohammed: the people are, indeed, plunged into the most deplorable and gross ignorance; the more to be pitied, as they seem possessed of a quickness of apprehension, and those talents which rendered their ancestors famous in science. Some of them, however, have a tolerable notion of astronomy, and talk reasonably, nay with the precision of an European scholar, upon the stars, their number, situation, and division into constellations. The clear serene sky in which they live has greatly assisted their observations; an advantage they have improved by a warm imagination and happy memory: however, it must be acknowledged that their system of astronomy is so replete with fable and absurdity, that it is difficult in general to comprehend their meaning. But the knowlege they excel in is, f that of their interest, in which particular they are out-done by no people in the universe; for this they will lie, swear, cheat, steal, rob, and sacrifice every human virtue. Yet with all their ignorance and vices, they seem by nature to be formed with liberal sentiments, and a taste for the more polite arts, as their essays in poetry and music, which are by no means contemptible, seem to indicate. Those who are acquainted with the genius of the oriental tongues, from which theirs is derived, or rather a dialect of the Arabic, have been highly delighted with their songs, accompanied in recitative by a kind of guittar, the instrument in which they take the greatest pleasure. From the description of travellers, it would appear rather to be a true lute, an instrument the best calculated of any, perhaps, to touch the heart, and move the softer passions, by a delicacy of strain and melody not to be imitated, or indeed equalled, in many of its movements.

g ONE would imagine, from the softness and effeminacy of their musick, that this people cannot be extremely warlike, or at least that the general observation on the analogy between the military virtues and the turn for harmony in most people must here fail; and indeed, the Europeans remark, that they have neither made any proficiency in the art of war, or shew any great eagerness to put their skill and courage to the test. However, if we may judge from some of their maxims, they are by no means pusillanimous or cowardly. Can any thing, say they, be more dastardly, than to kill a man before you approach him near enough to be distinguished? In consequence of this opinion, they never attack till they come within the length of their lances, after which they retire to a proper distance, and throw their darts, their lances, or shoot their arrows, with an amazing dexterity. This, however, we mean of their single combats with each other. That they should be ignorant of the military maxims, founded on the use of fire arms, is by no means extraordinary; since they despise them, and look upon them as the weapons of thieves and robbers. Hence possibly it is, that the Europeans have concluded them ignorant in the art of war, because they fight upon different principles from themselves: a way of judging too common among all men, who estimate every thing by a comparison with themselves, in which manner both the merit of actions and ideas are examined. Labat observes, that they fight chiefly on horseback, with short stirrups, by which they are enabled to raise themselves high in the saddle, and strike with the greater force at a considerable distance. They never draw up their cavalry in long lines and extended wings, but in small detached squadrons, by which means they are less liable to be broke or put into confusion, and more easily rallied when such an accident occurs. The agility of their horses, and their own skill in riding, give them great advantages by attacking in all quarters, wheeling off, and returning to the charge, with a dexterity that is really amazing<sup>k</sup>.

We may judge from this, whether the inhabitants of Zaara and Biledulgerid be so ignorant of military discipline as some European travellers affirm, or whether their not taking part in the wars between European nations, does not rather proceed from policy than cowardice. The truth, is, they are too wise to embark themselves needlessly into expensive and hazardous contentions, their interest being to ballance nicely between both parties, that no obstructions may arise in their commerce with either. They know well how prejudicial to trade it would be, were there only one European nation established among them, in which case they would be forced to sell their goods at any price that was offered; whereas the jealousy and rivalry between the different traders now raises the price of markets, each trying to gain the preference of the natives, and to push the commerce so briskly, as to ruin all his competitors. This it was, that made the natives side with the Dutch against the French, when the latter became possessed of the fortrefs of Arguin, and the former reduced so low, that it was apprehended they would be obliged to abandon the trade. In a word, they seem to have a just idea of the ballance of power, a political maxim, by some esteemed ideal, although confirmed by reason, and the practice of every sensible people on the globe, but not spun to the degree of refinement known among the southern kingdoms of Europe.

THE Moors and Arabs of this country are in general fond of long journies, and excursions into remote countries on the business of trade and commerce, in which respect they are indefatigable and undaunted, no hazard being too great where profit is the motive; as these expeditions are undertaken in large bodies or caravans; they make up the deficiencies in trade by stealth, robbery, and plunder; seldom returning without rich ladings of gold, ivory, gum, ostriches feathers, camels hair, slaves, and other commodities, which they sell to the Europeans, or to the merchants of Fez and Morocco. Such is their hardiness and avarice, that, besides a journey of four or five hundred leagues, they traverse a desert of two hundred miles in length, that affords not a drop of water, except in two places, frequently choaked up with sand, and yielding but a small quantity of putrid brackish water, after infinite pains have been taken to clear away the rubbish. As we have given a full account of these commercial expeditions, performed by means of that useful animal the camel, in a former volume, we shall here spare the reader the trouble of a repetition; only adding, that the caravans take their course from the flight of certain birds, who are observed to go and return at stated periods, and by a certain invariable rout, to the inland countries frequented by the Moors and Arabs, the kingdoms of Tombuto, Gago, and Galam. The devout and zealous Mohammedans look upon these birds as guides sent by the prophet to direct them in their journey, and point out the true road they are to pursue, without which they never presume to undertake an expedition of any considerable length and hazard. One would imagine, that, in crossing vast oceans of deserts (for they are subject to storms and tempests like the sea) so sensible a people would rely only upon the experience of more rational pilots; but they find their birds infallible, and prefer them to all other guides (D).

(D) Some authors are of opinion, that these birds are flocks of ostriches; though we do not find, in the best accounts of naturalists, that the ostrich is a bird of passage, that changes his habitation and country at certain seasons of the year. Mr. Adamson describes some of those he had seen among the burning sands, on the north

- a THERE have not however been wanting instances, where whole caravans have been buried under mountains of sand, raised by the terrible whirlwinds peculiar to this country, at particular seasons of the year. For this reason, it is, that the birds never attempt a passage cross the sandy deserts but about the solstices, instinct or observation shewing them that tempests are less to be apprehended at these times than at the equinoxes. Labat assures us, that the rout the caravans take, and the countries they traverse, are wholly unknown to the Europeans, and concealed with the same care, that the negroes shew in hiding their mines, and probably for the same reasons: a kind of presumption, that the dangers of the journey are considerably aggravated by the policy of the Moors and Arabs, who endeavour to monopolize the whole interior trade. The truth is, curiosity alone can make the Europeans desirous of acquiring a perfect knowledge of the roads to those distant inland countries, as it could never turn out to the advantage of trade; all the commodities being purchased at less expence from the caravans, than they could be brought to the coasts by the most frugal and rigid oeconomy of the Dutch, French, or English merchants<sup>1</sup>.

- b WE shall close this section with a short view of some islands, too minute to be reckoned among the number of African islands, in a general history, and yet well deserving the notice of the reader, by reason of the peculiar manners of the inhabitants. Before, we could not describe them, without interrupting the regular geographical course which we proposed. The islands we mean, are Bissao, and a cluster of small islands called the Bissagoes, standing close to the continent, a few leagues south-east of the river Gambia, and in the latitude of 11 degrees north. With the former of these, the Portuguese and French began to trade very early, and the latter have still a factory, and the former a fort on the island, both of them very considerable in trade. The Dutch likewise made several attempts to settle here, as they have done in every other part of the world where gain could invite them, but never met with success. It would be unnecessary to enlarge upon the nature of the trade carried on by the Europeans, which differs but little from what we have had frequent occasions to mention, being chiefly with Biafara and the other kingdoms of the continent, south-east of the river Gambia; we shall therefore proceed to a description of the island and its inhabitants. Bissao is about 35 or 40 miles in circumference, having an agreeable prospect to the sea, from which it rises by a gentle ascent on every side, to an eminence in the center of the island; there are, however, a number of hills, inferior in height to that in the middle, and separated by beautiful and fertile vallies, divided by little rivulets, which at the same time augment the richness and elegance of the scene. Except little groves of palms, every inch of the ground is cultivated, and produces a harvest equal to the most sanguine wishes of the husbandman. They have besides, oranges, mangoes, bananas, and every kind of fruit to be found in the warm climates, and perhaps in greater perfection than in any other place. So rich is the soil, that wheat and maize spring up to the size of Indian corn, or rather to resemble a field covered over with reeds or bamboos, to which the islanders add another sort of grain, a species of maize which they make into cakes, and call fonde. Here they do not bake their maize into bread, as in other parts of Africa, but toast or boil it like rice, which Labat affirms eats pleasantly with beer. The cattle of Bissao are of an extraordinary size, and seem to bear pace with the extravagant growth of the corn; milk and wine are in the greatest abundance; but it affords no swine or horses, the natives forbidding the former to be imported, and something in the soil or climate rendering it unfit for the increase of the latter, which never thrive here<sup>m</sup>.

BISSAO is no less populous than fertile, and would be still more so, but for the perpetual state of war the natives are in with the neighbouring islands and kingdoms on the continent; yet notwithstanding their number, they live in cottages, dispersed up and down the country, without the least vestige of a town, except where the French and Portuguese have established themselves; nor does the emperor's palace consist of more than a number of irregular huts, north side of the Senegal, as incredibly large, swift, and strong. Two boys were mounted upon the back of one of these gigantic fowls, not full grown, with which weight it run several miles, with a velocity exceeding belief, and the swiftness of the fleetest courser. To try the strength of an exceeding large ostrich, Mr. Adamson had two stout negroes mounted upon his back, and observed, that the weight appeared by no means disproportioned to his ability, as it did not in the least retard his progress. At first the bird went a pretty high trot; but when he was heated, he extended his wings as if it were to catch the wind, to which his swiftness seemed indeed equal. "Every body," says our author, "must have seen a partridge run; consequently must know there is no man whatever able to keep up with it; and it is easy to imagine, that if its step were longer, its speed would be greatly augmented. The ostrich moves like the partridge, but with the advantages of a long step, and great assistance from its wings, and I am satisfied, that those I am speaking of would have distanced the fleetest race horses in England:" whence we may judge of their utility, could they be tamed and broke in the same manner as a horse (3).

(3) Vid. voyage au Senegal, p. 87.

which have a communication with each other, so as to form one intire whole. In the Portuguese town are about 600 persons, all of whom speak Portuguese, and pretend that they are natives of Portugal, at least descendants, though their complexion is jet black, and their dislike to that nation fixed and inveterate. The dress of the women consists of a cotton girdle, which falls down so as not to shock decency, and bracelets of glais, coral, and copper; but virgins go intirely naked; and if they happen to be of high quality, their bodies are marked or painted with a variety of hideous pictures of snakes and other reptiles, that gives their skin some resemblance to a flowered sattin. Even the prince's royal herself, the eldest daughter of the emperor of Bissao, is only distinguished from the other ladies by the elegance of those paintings, and the richness of her bracelets. As for the men of all ranks, their only covering is a skin fixed behind and before to the girdle, and coming between their legs, so to as preserve some shew of modesty. One very extraordinary ornament they wear; it is a large iron ring, with a flat round surface on the out-side, instead of a stone, upon which they ring changes with a bit of iron, in such a manner as to converse with the same facility with their castanets, as by means of the most polished language. Labat says, that they wear two rings, one on each hand, which they strike against each other, so as to produce those intelligible sounds; a circumstance that shews the clearness of their ideas, and the strength of memory with which they are endowed. Besides this artificial language, which may properly be called instrumental, they have another vocal language, used upon all common occasions; the former being only spoken by the polite and great.

ALL the Bissaons are idolaters, nor has commerce made the smallest alteration in their manners, to which they are rigidly attached; but their ideas of religion are so confused, that it would be difficult to enter perfectly into their system. Their chief idol is a little image they call China, of which it would be a hard matter to explain the nature and origin, as its votaries are altogether inconsistent and absurd in their different tenets. Besides this, every man creates a divinity according to his own fancy; trees are held sacred, and, if not adored as gods, they are worshipped as the residence of some divinity".

As to their government, it is despotic, the will of the emperor being the law to his people; of which writers furnish us with an instance commonly practised in the country, to the great emolument of his imperial majesty. This is no other than a present which one subject makes to the emperor, of the house and estate of his neighbour, upon which the royal officers take immediate possession. The proprietor dares make no resistance, and is forced to set about building another, but not before he has obtained leave, tho' himself and family must live in the open air till that is done (E).

In truth, the means the emperor has in revenging himself, and of keeping his people in a slavish subjection, are easier here than in any other country in the world; he has nothing to lose, and yet every thing within his dominions may be said to be his, as his power extends over all men, and all their effects. One day the emperor committed to the Portuguese to guard the body of a slave he had ordered to be hanged for some misdemeanour; an employment which properly belonged to his officers: but nothing could prevail on him to release the Portuguese from this disagreeable office, till they had sent him a living slave in the room of the dead, upon which they were suffered to bury the corpse. On another occasion, two slaves, who had been sold to the European merchants, made their escape, and were taken by the king's troops. Equity seemed to require they should be restored to their masters; but his imperial majesty gave a different verdict; saying, they had obtained their freedom by having once escaped; that they were retaken by his troops, and again reduced to slavery; consequently were the right of the conqueror; a refinement in casuistry, equal to what the most artful European counsellor could have shewn on the same occasion. One more instance we shall quote of the despotism of this tyrant. The Sieur La Fond, agent to the French company, had purchased a negro, remarkable for his skill in playing on the ballo, a musical instrument common to many parts of Africa. The fame of this slave reaching the emperor's ears, he expressed so strong a desire to have him in the palace, that La Fond could not refuse the price offered him, as he knew the emperor would otherwise take him by force without an equivalent. But the musician soon made his escape from the palace, and returned on board the French ship, to the great surprize of La Fond, who immediately asked the reason why he had run away from his royal master; to which the musician replied, that it was customary at court to sacrifice persons of his profession on the death of the prince, that they might accompany him in the other world; but as he had no

(E) The monarch of Bissao is stiled emperor by the majority of writers, and the reason they give is, that the island being divided into seven different provinces, each has its governor, with an authority, power, and splendor, equal to kings. However, to confirm this remark, it were necessary to know what titles these governors bear in the language of the country, and what titles correspond with them in the European languages; nay it even were necessary that precisely the same ideas should be annexed to the titles emperor and king, in Europe and Bissao.

a inclination to leave this life, he chose the service of the white men, who had no such cruel usage among them. However, he was demanded by the emperor, who was not ashamed to falsify the verdict he had so lately given in the case of another slave, and moreover to make the Frenchman pay his full price for having received him.

At the emperor's death, all his women and slaves, for whom he shewed the tenderest regard, are sacrificed and buried near their master, in order to attend him in the next world : formerly it was customary to bury them alive with him ; the late king had but one slave buried with him, and his present majesty seems, says De Brue, inclinable wholly to abolish the barbarous custom (F). When the monarch dies his body is placed on a bier of reeds, finely decorated, and supported by four of the chief officers of the court to the grave. When they arrive here, b the four noblemen prostrate themselves on their faces upon the ground, and the bier is tossed up several times in the air, till it falls upon one of them ; this accident being the signal for electing him king, should the royal blood be undeserving or extinct.

It does not appear, either from history or the tradition of the people, that this empire has ever been troubled with civil wars or discord, notwithstanding this extraordinary manner of electing their prince, and the disputes that might naturally arise from it : a circumstance much in honour of the humanity, good sense, and submission of the people to their sovereign : however, they are almost at perpetual war with some of their neighbours, who are ever making descents upon Biffao, or, in their turn, are insulted by the Biffaons. The natives of Biffago, Biafara, and all the other neighbouring states, are warlike, and fight with extreme bitterness and fury, though with little discipline. As treaties of peace are not so much as known among these nations, c they have no kind of intercourse, except in war ; so that no sort of public scheme of politics is carried on among them ; and, far from offering their mediation, the Europeans find it their interest to foment their quarrels, as war is their harvest, by augmenting the number of slaves. In general, however, their incursions seldom exceed the space of a week, when the hostile army retires, with as many prisoners as they can make ; and after doing all possible damage to the enemy, by burning, plundering, and laying all waste, in their retreat. When the Biffaon emperor resolves to carry war into the neighbouring territories, he orders the bonbalon to be sounded, which is the general signal to arms, on which all persons in the pay of the government assemble themselves at certain head quarters, always fixed and appointed. There they find d the royal fleet at anchor, which usually consists of thirty canoes, each carrying thirty men, with all their arms and provisions, under the command of a high admiral ; for it is seldom that his imperial majesty puts himself at the head of his fleets or armies. Before the fleet sets sail, sacrifices are made, and heaps of victims offered to the gods, the flesh of which is divided between the court, the priests, and the soldiers. In this consultation of the gods the emperor never fails of having a favourable answer, as, the deities being of wood, it is easy for the priests to direct their answers : and hence it is that the army never enters upon a campaign but with the fullest assurances of success, which makes them support hazard and fatigue with the utmost cheerfulness and alacrity. They then make a descent with all possible privacy, surround the enemy's towns and villages, carry off the inhabitants and every thing of value, and then e embark before their troops have time to assemble to oppose them. Of this booty a moiety appertains to the emperor, and the remainder is divided among those who have been on the attack. The slaves are sold to the Europeans, except where any of them happens to be of quality or fortune, in which case he is restored to his friends, on condition that they send a certain number of slaves in his room.

Upon their return, the heroes of the expedition assume great importance, in consequence of their services ; they boast of the feats of prowess which they performed, and go round the country, shewing their wounds, and relating the wonders they had done and seen, with a long train of prisoners behind. Here they do not beat them, as in some other parts ; but they oblige them to sing the praises of the conquerors ; for which they make them presents of f pieces of cloth and other things, which those unhappy persons immediately sell in exchange for palm-wine, their only comfort in their distress. On the other hand, when the expedition has fallen short of expectation in point of honour and profit, then the prisoners stand the risque of being sacrificed, especially if the Biffaons have lost an officer of distinction. Those who fall upon such occasions receive public honours, by dances performed to the music of tabors, by order of the emperor or commander in chief. The women, who are the principal performers in these funeral rites, express their grief in a manner extremely doleful and affecting, pulling their hair, beating their breasts with such violence as to mark their skin all over, and groaning in such pathetic strains as cannot be expressed by words ; after which, by way of fired that his three sons, of whom he was fond, might accompany him to eternity (3).

supporting their spirits, plentiful libations of palm-wine are poured down ; when thus recruited a they begin their mourning with redoubled vigour, and continue to shed their tears most plentifully, till the corpse is laid in the grave ; after which their countenances brighten, and they seem to forget in an instant how deeply they were affected.

To the above remarks of De Brue's we shall adjoin a few observations from an anonymous writer, whose journal we find in the judicious Prevost's collection of voyages. The inhabitants of Bissao, whom this author calls Papels, or perhaps Papas, from the duskiness of their complexion, are all idolaters and heathens, without any knowledge of the true God. As to the false, their number is infinite ; and the consequences of being a devotee fatal to a man's family, and ruinous to the public, if frequent : for all religion consists in the number and expence of their sacrifices, by which the priests alone are gainers. From what this writer remarks in another b place, he gives room to judge that the people called Papels are certain strangers, who have fixed their residence in the country : for his words are, that the Papel men are not fond of intermarrying with the negro women. With regard to the government of the island, he observes, that the power is lodged in the hands of nine governors, who preside over as many provinces ; but eight of them being subordinate to the ninth ; which seems to make the emperor less despotic than the relation of De Brue. At the death of the prince, above thirty of his slaves, male and female, are buried with him. together with all his gold, ambergrise, silks, and whatever he has else of value. The only competitors for the throne are the jeapes, whom our author compares to the peers and nobility of France ; but we have reason to believe, that the governors of provinces most commonly succeed to this honour, as the king's pall is supported c by four of the principal of these, who are indeed generally, but not always, chosen out of the nobility.

THE emperor's palace is about a league distant from the point of Bissao, all the road between being constantly filled with the imperial guards, which are very numerous. The emperor never stirs out but he is surrounded by some thousands of his nobility, women, and guards, all of them richly dressed and armed, as far as the skins of beasts, and finely furnished scymitars and lances, can make them so. Formerly the Portuguese had built a fort in Bissao, which they mounted with eight pieces of cannon, to awe the natives, and prohibit their trading with strangers, or any other foreigners but themselves : however, the Bissaons soon threw off this servitude, and now maintain the full liberty of receiving all strangers into their ports, who d come upon business of commerce, where they enjoy a perfect security, under protection of the emperor. But before they are permitted to land, his imperial majesty consults the gods by sacrifices, whether admitting those strangers be for the good of the island, and the interest of himself and people ?

WHEN De Brue visited the French factory in Bissao, he was received by the Portuguese governor with the utmost politeness and hospitality ; who, on taking leave, put a sealed writing into De Brue's hands, which he desired he would peruse when he got on board ship. This was no other than a remonstrance against the French establishment, which he looked upon as an infringement of the exclusive rights of the Portuguese ; but politely avoided all disputes and altercations while the French director had been his guest. De Brue answered this remonstrance e by a counter instrument, written and dated in the road of Bissao, which he took care should not be delivered till he had his audience of leave of the emperor, and was under sail for Senegal. The first founded the rights of the Portuguese upon the exclusive privileges granted them when they first erected their fort ; and the latter, upon the revocation of those rights, the privileges now granted to all strangers of trading hither, and, lastly, upon the prior claim of the French, from their having resided at Bissao some hundred years before ; an argument which Mr. De Brue deduced from the French arms painted in the chapel, which had all the appearance of being as antient as the walls of that building. However, both sides offered their arguments with the utmost politeness and respect for each other's character, and resolved to prevent personal wrangling, by leaving the decision of the dispute to the courts of Verisailies and f Lisbon.

IT is true, that the emperor's kind reception, and the promises he had made to De Brue, considerably strengthened his claim, while they proportionably diminished the weight of what had been advanced by the Portuguese governor ; for when the former took his leave at court he was asked, whether he was fully satisfied with the privileges the French factory enjoyed ? if not, they should be extended, the emperor said, to the utmost of his wish. Upon which De Brue made the warmest acknowledgements, and a present to the emperor, who seemed highly satisfied. In the factory he left a surgeon, two interpreters, a sufficient number of negro servants, a bark, a brigantine, and a large shallop, with pilots and seamen, arms, provisions, and merchantable goods ; and particularly charged the Sieur Cartaing, the superior, to g cultivate the friendship of the Portuguese governor, and endeavour to extend their trade ; and, lastly, if the Portuguese quitted the island, as was then surmised, immediately to take possession a possession of the fort, in the name of the Senegal company (P). This was an event which the penetrating De Brue foresaw, from the low condition of the trade, could not be very remote; and indeed so it fell out, in spite of all the endeavours of Don Roderigo, the governor, who omitted nothing to support the trade that became a diligent and faithful agent.

After the departure of De Brue, Roderigo had taken every measure to engage him to pay the ten per cent. upon all goods sold in the island, which he said was the undoubted right of the Portuguese; but he never could prevail with all his artifice; and a little while after he was recalled, and the fort abandoned: the Portuguese governor of Cachao representing to the court of Lisbon, that the fort was a charge which the trade of Bissao was unable to support. De Brue lost no time in acquainting his constituents with this transaction, which was transmitted by them to the president Rouillé, ambassador in Portugal. After this De Brue went himself to Lisbon, to join his influence with the ambassador's, that the fort might be sold to the Senegal company: but the negociation terminated unsuccessfully, and the Portuguese court took a final resolution to demolish it; which was accordingly done in October 1703°. This is all that history relates of the manners, laws, government, arts, and commerce of the island of Bissao.

WE shall conclude this section with a brief account of the people called Balontes, on the continent opposite to Bissao and of the island of Bulam, properly one, and the only one that merits a description of the Bissagoe islands. The Balontes inhabit the banks of the river Geves, the channel of which separates Bissao from the main land. Their territory is about twelve leagues in length, and about as much in breadth, being, according to some writers, of a square, and, if we credit others, of a circular form. They maintain no correspondence with the other negroes their neighbours, either on the continent or islands; but live intirely wrapt up abstracted in themselves. They refuse to intermarry in the most advantageous manner with the adjacent nations; and tho' they sometimes travel beyond their own limits, yet will they permit no foreign negroes to pass their frontiers. The religion of the country is idolatry, and the form of government republican, a kind of aristocracy, the state being governed by a few persons chosen out of the elders. No slaves are permitted here; at least, no Balontan can be enslaved by his countrymen; such is their love of freedom; and indeed their disposition seems in every respect correspondent; for they are bold, intrepid, and warlike, as the Portuguese barks passing the channel and their neighbours often experience, whom they often attack and defeat: but then they are treacherous, crafty, and thievish (Q). In the action they had with a French ship, mentioned in the margin, these negroes behaved with a courage, next in degree to fury, maintaining the action for six hours, till almost their whole fleet was sunk by the cannon, and then retiring with terrible cries and howlings, more terrifying than their arrows, which they shoot with so much dexterity. Their arms are assagayes, arrows, and sabres.

It is the general opinion, that the Balontans have gold mines in their country, on account of which they prohibit strangers from coming among them; for they are sensible they would run the hazard of being driven out of their country, or at least reduced to a miserable servitude, if once any other nation got footing among them. This conjecture is founded upon the following reasons; and the first is, that the Portuguese settled at Bissao found grains of gold in the stomachs of some fowls they purchased of the Balontans: the next, that they pay their tribute to the monarch of Kazamansa in gold: and the third, that their gold is different from that of Galam and Tomba Aura, although they maintain no correspondence with any other countries. As to the first of these reasons, though the French could never discover gold in the gizzards of any of the fowls bought of this people (because perhaps they plundered them from their neighbours) yet so firmly did the Portuguese believe the fact, that they assembled a large body of troops at Bissao, in the year 1695, which they landed without opposition in the country of

(P) An article which we find in the Paris Gazette, November 1694, may help to throw some light upon this controversy between the French and Portuguese. An extract from a letter from Lisbon, inserted there, mentions the arrival at court of Batonto, son to Bacompoloco, emperor of Bissao, sent to Portugal to receive baptism at the hands of some dignified prelate; and, in return, to assure the Portuguese of the emperor's leave to build a fort in his dominions, and his future protection. Another article, in December following, relates the ceremonies upon the baptism of the young prince: from which it appears, there had been a strict amity between the courts of Lisbon and Bissao, at the very time that the French and Portuguese agents were disputing the emperor's favour in his own dominions.

What circumstances they were that brought about a revolution in the affairs of the latter, so favourable to the former, we are intirely unacquainted with. This fact we only mention, to shew, that the Portuguese had once been the chief favourites.

(Q) In the year 1700, they had the boldness to attack a French brigantine of four guns, and six swivels, surrounding her with canoes to the number of thirty, and each filled with near forty men. Happily the French observed them time enough to fill their netting with hides, which repelled the first shower of the enemies arrows, who frequently attempted to board them, but were as often repulsed by the artillery and small arms (4).

(4) Labat, t. v. p. 350.

Balonta, for the conquest of the province. It was then the rainy season, and their arms and ammunition were soon rendered useless by the moisture of the air; after which the Balontes attacked them so vigorously with their assagayes and sabres, like men fighting for freedom, property, and all that was dear to them, that they soon routed the Portuguese, and forced them to retire, with a considerable loss of men, and of all their ammunition and stores <sup>p</sup>.

Not far from hence is the island of Bassu, or Baiffi, as Labat calls it, about thirty-five leagues in circumference, all covered with trees, and finely watered with brooks and rivulets. The natives are Papels; with whom it is dangerous trafficking, as nothing can be more treacherous, cruel, and thievish.

Of the Bissagoe islands.

SOUTH-WEST of Bassu stand the Bissagoe isles, of which we call Bulam one, though father Labat reckons only under this general name the islands of Casuabac, La Gallina, Cazegut, Calacha, Oranguana, and some others of less consideration. From the mouth of the Rio Grande, south-west of the river Gambia to the island of Bulam, is about two leagues. It is about ten leagues in length from east to west, and five in breadth from north to south, the whole coast bordered with woods, beyond which the country is fertile, rich and beautiful. It is every-where covered with rice, maize, millet, fruits, and roots, tho' the island is said to be uninhabited, and cultivated by the natives of the other islands, who come hither in seed and harvest time, returning home for the rest of the year. The ground rises imperceptibly from the shore for the space of two leagues, which presents mariners with a most agreeable prospect, at the same time that it excites their admiration, and even resentment, to see so fine a spot uninhabited. This ascent serves as a base to higher mountains, which stand in the center of the island, covered with fine wood, and divided by beautiful vallies, with so much regularity, that nature would seem to have been improved by art. M. de Brue laid a scheme for fixing a French settlement here; but his attention was diverted from the purpose, by the necessity he was under of taking possession of the fort which the Portuguese had abandoned in Bissao. One commodity it produces, which might certainly be improved greatly to the advantage of navigation: this is a tree called mechery, which grows to a great height, is easily worked, at the same time that it is hard and solid, and particularly adapted to ship building, as it is proof against worms; and the reason given is, that all its pores are filled with a bitter oil, that probably deters the worms from harbouring in it <sup>q</sup>.

EACH of the Bissagoe islands is governed by a chief who takes the state and title of king. All those monarchs are perfectly independent, and frequently at war with each other; yet do they always unite against the Biafarans, the common enemy. They have canoes that carry from twenty-five to forty men, with their provisions and arms, which are sabres, and bows and arrows. The negroes of these islands are tall, strong, and healthy, though they live only on fish, nuts, and palm oil, chusing rather to sell the rice, millet, and other produce of the earth, to the Europeans, than not to gratify their passion for trinkets and ornaments. In general they are idolaters, cruel and savage in their disposition, not only to strangers but to one another, when they happen to quarrel, as they frequently do about trifles; and, if disappointed of their revenge, will drown or courageously stab themselves <sup>r</sup>. As none of the Bissagoe islands are inhabited by the Europeans, it would not be worth while to dwell upon a minute description of them; and indeed we are too little acquainted with their government and natural history to render such an account either entertaining or instructive.

Containing a more minute geographical description of the different kingdoms and provinces of the great countries of Zanaga and Biledulgerid, with the origin and source of the rivers Niger and Senegal; an account of the manners and customs of the inhabitants of these nations; their wars, trade, language, and the produce of their respective countries; with some account of their traffick with the nations on the Barbary Coasts in the Mediterranean, by means of their caravans, &c.

Deserts of Zaarah and Sarah, and that division of Africa called the Lower Ethiopia. Geography of the country.

MODERN geographers have divided almost the whole interior continent of Africa into two great divisions, namely, Upper and Lower Ethiopia; the former of which we have already described in a preceding volume, and as to the latter, its precise limits cannot be determined, on account of the disagreement of authors. The greater number of geographers, however, include within this division all those kingdoms and states from the 9th to the 25th degrees of north latitude, and the 10th and 11th degrees of east and west longitude, from the meridian of London; an immense tract, comprehending an infinity of kingdoms, mountains, rivers, a rivers, lakes, some of which we have been describing, as well as our imperfect accounts will admit of. Perhaps the most distant boundaries of the Upper and Lower Ethiopia may be marked by the course of the two great rivers, that intersect it at right angles; the Nile running from south to north, and the Niger from east to west, the Lower Ethiopia being contained in the angle made by these two rivers of which the coast is the arc, measuring about fifteen or sixteen degrees (A). The Arabian division of Lower Ethiopia.

As we have given an account of the kingdoms south of the Niger, which most writers call the Senegal, we shall now begin with a description of those to the northward, and first with a description of the desert of Saraa, Zaara, or Zahara, of which we have already spoken in general terms. This vast inhospitable region, properly called Zahara, or the desert, stretches itself from the Atlantic ocean on the west, to the kingdoms and deserts of Barca and Nubia on the east, and from Biledulgerid on the north, to Nigritia or the river Senegal on the south (B), comprehending a space of about 500 miles in breadth from north to south, and at least 1500 miles in length from west to east<sup>a</sup>.

THE Arabians divide this immense tract of land into three general divisions or classes; viz. Cabel, Zahara, and Afgar; that is, the sandy, stony, and marshy deserts, according to the nature of the soil, but the most common division is into provinces, which, according to Marmol and Leo, amount to ten; viz. the two territories of Nun, the deserts of Zanaga, or Senegal, Zaaza, Zuenziga, Hayr or Targa, Lempta, Berdoa, Sate, and Abguechet (C). Other later geographers, with more accuracy, distinguish the deserts into seven provinces only, under which are comprehended all the inferior divisions; and these are Zanaga, Zuenziga, Targa or Hayr, Lempta, or Iguidi, Berdoa, Bornou, and Gaoga. The modern division.

THESE provinces are supposed to have been formerly inhabited by the Getuli and Garamasites, the former of which were likewise in possession of Biledulgerid, or Numidia; and at present, besides those nations we have described under the names of Moors and Arabs, it contains other inhabitants, called Berebers, or Barbaries, more civilized, sociable, and refined in their manners, than either the Moors or Arabs, whose chief characteristic is brutality, insolence, fickleness, and a certain savage ferocity, almost peculiar to them. The Barbaries live in fixed habitations, are of a tractable disposition, carrying on a commerce with strangers, are civil and hospitable, and generally speaking, honest and faithful to them. Their religion, as well as that of the Arabs their oppressors, is Mohammedism; but so corrupted, that little of the fundamental doctrine can be discovered among them. In different provinces they speak different dialects of the Arabesk or African language, of which we have no distinct idea; though we are informed by learned travellers, that the analogy between all of them is so great, as easily to be reduced to the primitive root, though they are scarce able by them to converse with each other. The chief commodities of these countries are camels, horned cattle, horses, dates, the fat and feathers of ostriches, and the gum Senegal, of which we have spoken at large. On the coast of Angra, half way between Cape Blanco and Cape Bajadore, in the latitude of 26 degrees north, the Hidil Arabs deal largely in gold dust. Marmol relates, that this likewise is the chief branch of commerce in which Dulcim Arabs engage: a people equally powerful for their wealth and numbers, and at perpetual war with the Hidils, their northern neighbours. In a country so hot and sandy, lying under the third and fourth northern climate, it cannot be expected the soil should be fertile, or the produce of the earth valuable. The best are the countries situated on the northern banks of the Senegal; these being better watered, peopled, and cultivated, on account of the commerce carried on by means of this river, particularly the kingdoms or provinces of Gualata, Guber, Zanfara, Agzade, Cano, Bornou, and Gaoga, which produce corn, rice, millet, and a variety of fruits; though, except dates, perhaps little more than is sufficient for the purposes of the inhabitants. Manners of the inhabitants

BESIDES the camels and common cattle, this country is remarkable for a species of domestic animal, called Adimnaim, bred here in great plenty. It is a kind of sheep, about the size of an afs, with long hanging ears. The females have horns, but not the males, and the wool of Produce of the country.

(A) Within this division Marmol, Leo Africanus, Sannutus, Dapper, and others, include half of Nigritia; the Niger dividing it into north and south Nigritia, or Negroland: the latter comprehending the kingdoms of Mandingo, Melli, Kasson, Guialon, Inta, Gaga, and a variety of others, of which we scarcely know the names: and the former those kingdoms bordering on the north of the Niger, and those still farther north till we come to Marocco, Fez, Algiers, Tripoli, Barca, and Egypt.

(B) We declined enlarging minutely upon the geography and different divisions of this country, in order that we might describe the sea-coasts, the European trade, and the manners and trade of the Moors and Arabs of this prodigious tract (1).

both is soft and fine, but short. So strong is this animal, that it is capable easily of carrying a man for several miles; and so gentle that it never refuses a burden. It is indeed probably the same kind of sheep so frequent in some parts of America, and especially in Peru, which we shall have occasion to describe minutely when we come to that part of our history. One would imagine, from what we have said in this and the last section; that nothing could be superadded to the misery of the inhabitants, whose lot has thrown them upon this barren, sandy, parched, and sultry spot of the globe; yet we find these evils aggravated by the incredible droves of the fiercest animals, lions, tigers, wolves, and other savage devourers of mankind, as well as by those bloody and cruel wars which are perpetually carried on against the unhappy negroes, whom the Moors and Arabs deprive of their liberty, to support a trade with the kingdoms of Morocco, Fez, and other barbarous and maritime states; extended along the southern coast of the Mediterranean, whilst the negroes content themselves with butchering, in revenge, all the Zabarians that fall into their hands <sup>b</sup>.

AMONG the natural curiosities of this tract of land, it would be unpardonable to omit that stupendous bank of sand near Cape Bajadore, on the west of Sarah, which stretches itself along that coast, and against which the sea forms so strong a current, that both water and sand are in a continual agitation, mingled together, and throwing up such prodigious waves, that it resembles, as our author expresses it, a boiling salt-pan of a monstrous size, which spouts up the dirty water to an astonishing and dreadful height, when the wind happens to set against the current. Travellers also make mention of two tombs in the province Azavad, with inscriptions, importing, that the unhappy persons interred there were a wealthy merchant and a poor carrier, both perishing with excessive thirst, after the former had given the latter ten thousand ducats for one cruse of water, which he drank and immediately expired <sup>c</sup>; while the other did not long survive him, to enjoy the fruits of his avarice (D).

To give the reader the most distinct account of this great tract of country that our materials will admit of, we shall describe the different provinces and deserts into which it is divided, beginning our account with the most western. And first, the province of Zanaga, or Senegal, extends itself from the river of that name, on the south, to the province of Suz, on the north, bounded on the west by the Atlantic ocean, and on the east by the territories of Seram, Sunda, and Zuenziga. It contains two deserts, Azvo and Taguzza, or Taggoft, the last of which produces a prodigious quantity of rock salt, which is conveyed hence into all the neighbouring countries, to Nigritia on the south, and the maritime kingdoms on the north: the chief use of it in the desert being to moisten the mouth, parched with the sultry heat, and preserve the gums against a scorbutic disorder, to which the natives are subject. The country is incredibly fatiguing and dangerous to travellers, especially if the summer proves dry, as there is scarce a drop of water to be found for thirty leagues together, and that so brackish that it is equally unwholesome and unpalatable. Nor do the cattle fare better, as the earth does not yield a blade of grass, or any thing for their sustenance; which obliges passengers to carry provisions for themselves, and forage for their beasts of burden. Besides, the country is so flat and sandy, without mountains, woods, rivers, lakes, or any mark to take a direction by, that it were next to impossible for the most experienced persons to find their way, but for those droves of birds which we mentioned in the last section, which serve for guides. Yet after all, it is inhabited by a great number of different nations, the Berviches, Ludayers, Duleyns, and Zenequi, some of which are so numerous as to raise 10, 15, and 20,000 men; besides a variety of Arab tribes, no less numerous, potent, and warlike: nay, more so, as by force and artifice they live chiefly upon the former, and carry off whole droves of cattle, which they exchange at Dara, and other countries, for dates and provisions, the former and milk being their chief food. The Zenequi boast of their nobility and antiquity, like most other poor and obscure nations, priding themselves upon those things which are not worth disputing with them: they even pretend that the kings of Tombuto are descended from them <sup>d</sup>.

THE Portuguese first discovered this coast, in the year 1433, when they ventured to double Cape Nun, beyond which they had never gone before that time. Thirty miles beyond, or south of Cape Nun, is Cape Bajadore, where they were forced to stop for some time, because the coast, which here projects about forty leagues, reverberated the sea with so strong a reflux, that it drove them back, the banks of sand, which rose to a great height, terrifying the seamen from keeping close to the shore; and it was unusual in those days to launch far into the ocean. Thirty leagues farther, on the same western coast, is the flat shore called Los Raviros, on account of the great quantity of fish the Portuguese found there: and about twelve leagues

(D) This story we find in Dapper and some other writers; but how it came to be known, that such a bargain was made between the unfortunate sufferers, is difficult to conjecture, as we are not told that they had any companions. What we mentioned it for was on account of the inscription.

- a still farther south, the coast to which they gave the name De los Cavalieros, because there they had landed some horses. Twelve leagues farther south, the sea forms a kind of chanel, which they called the Golden River, or Rio del Or, having received a great quantity of that precious metal here, in exchange for some Moorish prisoners they set at liberty. This was the first gold from this country that had ever been seen in Portugal. About the same distance farther south, is the bay of Sintia, which leads to the port of Cavaliero; and about thirty leagues farther stands Cape Blanco, discovered Anno 1441, lying, as we have said, in nearly the 21st degree of north latitude, the sea falling in more eastward, so as to form a kind of curve to the mouth of the river Senegal. About thirty-five miles farther stands Arguin, formerly called in the aggregate the seven rocks, but each distinguished by a particular name; these we have already described, and shall therefore proceed to the next province south of Zanaga <sup>c</sup>.

- b LEO and Marmol give this territory the name of Gualata, and the same has been preserved by modern geographers, though they all disagree about its right situation and boundaries. Gualata has Zanaga on the north, the river Senegal on the south, the provinces of Sunda and Zuenziga on the east, and the Atlantic ocean on the west. The country is poor, sandy, and barren; hath only some inconsiderable villages and mean hamlets scattered up and down: corn and flesh are intolerably scarce and dear; the inhabitants, called Benais, rude and unpolished, though civil and courteous enough to those who trade with them; in a word, they are a miserable and despicable people, doomed to a poor, a barbarous, and savage life, in one of the worst soils and climates under heaven. They have neither learning nor laws, though they live by consent under the direction and authority of cheyks, or chiefs, and in their commerce make use of the Arabic notation. In general, both men and women have a natural shyness and modesty, if we may attribute to bashfulness that universal custom of covering their faces with veils. This at least is the reason assigned by Marmol for this practice, which we had rather explain by conveniency: experience having taught them to defend their eyes and faces against the sun-beams, reflected with great force by the white sand that covers the face of the whole country. We are told, that formerly they lived under a monarchical government, and had their own elective kings; but how they came to be reduced to their present state of anarchy, history is silent; and indeed there is little more than the assertions of Leo Africanus <sup>e</sup>, in proof that their situation has ever been different. Though they live, according to Dapper, a life perfectly free from the restraint of all government, yet the Portuguese writers affirm, that all these provinces were first subject to the kings of Zanaga, and now the monarch of Tombuto, who however does not pretend to govern them by a viceroy, or to assume any other dominion over them than the exaction of a small tribute. During their monarchical state, they had a capital of the same name with the province; at present their chief village, for towns they have none, is called Hoden, which stands, if we may credit Sanutus, about six days journey from Cape Blanco, on a different spot from where the old capital Gualata stood, the precise situation of which is not known. Hoden consists of a few cottages, assembled or rather huddled together, without form, method, walls, gates, or any thing that can give it the air of a capital, or indeed of a place inhabited by rational beings. The people are fond of the Zangay or Sangay language; they worship fire; and once a considerable trade had been carried on with the neighbouring provinces, and even with the kingdoms of Morocco and Fez on the north, and all the countries along the Niger on the south and east. The inhabitants of Hoden live better than those of the other parts of the province, having goats, camels, and ostriches in abundance, the eggs of the latter being esteemed the most delicious food; but they are rather more exposed to the devastation of lions, tigers, and other fierce animals, bred in greater numbers here than in almost any other places in Africa <sup>f</sup>.

- c As to the province or desert of Zuenziga, it is still, if possible, more dry and barren than either Gualata or Zanaga, and nature would seem to have exerted herself in rendering it the most inhospitable of all countries, and the inhabitants the most wretched of the human kind. It is bounded by the two former provinces on the west, by Twarges and Zanzara on the east, by the river Senegal, or the desert of Ghir on the south, and on the north by Sunda and the desert of Cogden; these limits, however, not being intirely agreed upon by geographers, neither African or European, ancient or modern. All merchants going from Tremecen to the kingdoms of Tombuto, Agades, or Uzza, and other southern or south-east countries, are obliged to pass through this province in their route, by which we may nearly fix its situation, and the hardships those travellers must undergo in such a journey. We are told indeed, that of large caravans, seldom half the number either of men or beasts ever return, most of them dying of thirst, hunger, fatigue, or under the whirlwinds of sand, with which they are overwhelmed and smothered. This happens more particularly in the deserts of Cogden, where, for nine days journey, hardly the smallest brook, fountain, or pool, is to be met with, except it has lately rained ; and even then in so scanty a quantity, as scarce to moisten the lips of a parched travellers. The inhabitants of this district are partly native Africans, and partly Arabs, between whom Lea and Marmol constantly make a difference ; the latter exact a kind of tribute of the Seguelmessans, a people of Biledulgerid, for some land of theirs, which they cultivate, and there breed an incredible number of cattle, with which they wander for fresh pasture as far as the kingdom of Yguid. They likewise breed a great variety of beautiful horses, and are so expert horsemen and warriors, that they are become formidable to the princes of Barbary, who chiefly study to keep on good terms with those wild Arabs ; nor are they less dreaded by the negroes, whose inveterate enemies they are ; making them prisoners on all occasions, and selling them, as any other commodity, to the people of Fez, Morocco, and other kingdoms of Barbary, in return for which they are treated by the negroes with no more humanity, who mangle their bodies, and, if we may credit Dapper, broil and eat their prisoners. Both Arabs and Moors, and indeed all the inhabitants of this country, have little other food than milk and dates, which they import in great quantities from Biledulgerid<sup>b</sup>.

Cogden.

NORTH of Zuenziga is the territory of Sunda, and the desert of Cogden, just now described, and Azured, together with Seram, differing from it in nothing, with respect to the savage disposition of the inhabitants and poverty of the country. In the desert of Azured, which De Lisle places in 21 degrees 19 minutes north latitude, and 19 longitude, there is, however, a large lake of brackish water, formed by the rains which fall during the three wet months. This alone it is, that renders these deserts more supportable than the preceding<sup>i</sup>.

Targa or Hayr.

WE next come to the province or desert of Twarges, Targa, or Hayr ; the first of these names being given it from the people, the second from the desert itself, and the last from its capital ; though Africanus denies, that there is a city in the province, or indeed a village of that name. It must be owned, that nothing can be more dark, perplexed, and defective, than the accounts which writers give of all this interior part of Africa, where they seem to speak more upon conjecture than authority, and to be obliged rather to a fertile invention than to travel, or the study of the best historians, or rather of the globe and charts. This in general we are assured of, that the province of Targa is less barren, dry, desert, and sultry, than any of the preceding ; that it has a variety of good wells for fresh water, dug deep in the ground ; that the sand produces several kinds of culinary vegetables, and some grass ; that the climate is wholesome ; and that great heaps of manna are gathered here, particularly on the frontiers towards Agades, which the negroes collect in calabashes, and export for sale to the neighbouring kingdoms. They also dissolve it in the water where they boil their food, and esteem it cooling and wholesome, insomuch that to this they attribute their being more healthy than the inhabitants of Tombuto, although the air and climate are deemed inferior in quality. The Arabs and Barbars, as they are called by Marmol, drive a great slave-trade with the northern kingdoms, and in this consists their principal wealth<sup>k</sup>.

Agades.

SOUTH of Targa is the desert of Agades, taking its name from a neighbouring kingdom, of which we shall speak below ; and a little farther south stands the kingdom of Janfara, which begins to assume the face of a fertile country, producing corn, rice, Turkey wheat, coffee in abundance, and even gold, according to some writers. The inhabitants are of a jet black complexion, a hideous aspect, their faces large, flat, and frightful ; but tall, strait, and well-shaped in their persons. It hath a metropolis of its own name, situated under the twelfth degree of east longitude, and seventeen and a half north latitude. Of late years it hath been subdued by the king of Tombuto, who caused the natural princes to be inhumanly poisoned, and many of his subjects barbarously cut to pieces, after their surrendering at discretion ; a custom commonly practised where-ever any of the Arabs or Moors fall into the hands of the negroes. Farther south, and lying a great way eastward, stand the kingdoms of Guber and Cano, towards the northern banks of the river Senegal, or rather the Niger ; for they lie east of the lake Mabeira, for some hundred miles (E). Some writers affirm, that the river passes through the middle of these kingdoms, splitting them into southern and northern divisions ; which is a little improbable, as every part of each is governed by the same laws, the same monarch, and the same customs ; a thing unusual among negroes, who, for the most part, make such a barrier the extreme frontiers of their dominions. The northern division of Guber runs, we are told, almost 300 miles east of Gago, and is parted from it by a vast desert, totally destitute of water, and forty leagues distant from the Niger. It is surrounded by high mountains, and its villages, which are numerous, are inhabited by shepherds and other herdsmen. It abounds with rice, millet, barley, and pulse, is well stocked with cattle of various kinds and sizes ;

(E) We have retracted an opinion we advanced concerning the Senegal and Niger being the same river, as we have since carefully perused Mr. Bolton's accurate maps, and the best French and Dutch charts. However, that the reader may have the arguments advanced by those of a contrary opinion, we shall subjoin to this section Labat's account of the origin of the Niger.

- a hath several ingenious artificers, particularly linnen and cotton weavers; and in some parts of their drefs resemble the old Romans, especially in the tunics and sandals, which are directly of the same form. Whence they derived this we are at a loss to conjecture, unless from the Gallas, a nation of the Upper Ethiopia, of which we have spoken in the sixth volume, supposed to be a branch of the ancient Gauls, who might have borrowed it from their conquerors, the Romans. All the fields of the southern Guber are overflown at the inundation of the Niger, which rises annually like the Nile; and the natives have the satisfaction of seeing an early and plentiful crop without farther trouble. Leo Africanus<sup>1</sup> says, that here is a capital, inhabited by six thousand families, among whom are many rich merchants, who trade to all the kingdoms on the south and north; nay, even as far as the Mediterranean, and the banks of the Red Sea. In this writer's time Izchia, king of Tombuto, slew the monarch of Guber, in a pitched battle, made eunuchs of his sons, kept his court some time in the conquered kingdom, and afterwards governed it by lieutenants or viceroys, who tyrannized over the people, oppressed and impoverished the merchants, nobility, and wealthy part of the nation; which, with the prodigious number of prisoners who were sold for slaves, reduced the kingdom to its present abject condition.

- b CANO, through which the Niger is supposed likewise to pass<sup>m</sup>, dividing it into southern and northern divisions, or rather, by the deflection the river makes, into two kingdoms, standing east and west, is of prodigious extent, stretching eastward for the space of 500 miles. In the very center of the kingdom stands a city of the same name, in latitude 15° 30', and longitude 12° 10' east of London, which precisely ascertains the situation of the kingdom. The walls and houses of this capital are built with loam and clay, in a neat and commodious manner: the inhabitants are merchants chiefly; rich, industrious, and hospitable; but, in general, the people are herdsmen and husbandmen, dwelling in villages thickly strewed over the face of the country. However, like all the other kingdoms of Lower Ethiopia, it hath its deserts and sandy barren spots, though frequently a mountain, beautifully clothed with wood, refreshes the eye, fatigued with so desolate a prospect, and furnishes the weary traveller with a cool draught of pure and wholesome water; a thing more precious than gold in those ill-fated countries. In these woods are likewise great store of citrons, oranges, and wild lemons, most delicious and welcome to the parched peasant; which circumstances set Cano far before all the other kingdoms of Ethiopia that we have yet described, and indeed upon a footing with most of the provinces of Abissinia and the Higher Ethiopia. The monarch of Cano had formerly been potent and formidable to his neighbours, on account of the large standing armies of horse which he always kept: but he has since been tributary to the kings of Zegzeg and Casena, who were afterwards treacherously slain by Izchia, king of Tombuto, a prince the most artful and insidious of his time. He had here insinuated himself under the most specious pretences, by a deep policy, into their most intimate confidence, which terminated in their ruin. He then waged war with the king of Cano, whom, after a long siege, he took, and obliging him to marry one of his daughters, reinstated him in the throne, on condition that he should pay into the treasury of Tombuto a third of all his tributes, says Leo Africanus; for the receipt of which their ambassadors constantly resided at both courts. From this expression we are at a loss to determine, whether it be meant that a third part of the tribute received from other states, or only a third of that paid to the kings of Zegzeg and Casena, be meant<sup>n</sup>. The kingdoms of Cano and Guber properly belong to Nigritia, or the southern side of the Niger; but as geographers place some part of them on the north, it was thought convenient, for the more complete view of the whole country, to give an account of them here.

- c ON the north side of Senegal, and east of Targa, are the province of Lempta, and desert of Yguida; the former, according to geographers, being the name of the inhabitants, and the latter of the province. In proportion as we go eastward from the sea-coast, the kingdoms of Africa are less known to Europeans; and all that is related of Yguida is, that it is more barren, miserable, and desert, than any of the preceding; that it is dangerous to travellers, not only by the excessive heat of the climate, the scarcity of water, and the sand tornados, which frequently bury them alive, but from the savage and brutish ferocity of the people. They are a race of native Africans, who rob, plunder, and destroy all that come in their way; but their rage is more especially levelled against the Guergelans, a nation to the northward, and separating Yguida from Barbary. To this country, which they affirm to have been a province of Yguida, they lay claim, never omitting an opportunity of destroying the inhabitants with the most barbarous fury, as if they would terrify them into a submission; though in fact they take the most effectual measure to steel and harden them against the yoke of such merciless tyrants. Through this inhospitable region the caravans from Constantina, and other towns of Algiers and Tunis, to Nigritia, are forced to pass, equally in danger of perishing by thirst, hunger, and the sword ; yet such is their attachment to commerce and love of money, that they intrepidly encounter all those hazards and difficulties.

Kingdom of Agades distinct from the deserts of that name.

THE kingdom of Agades is placed by Leo Africanus and Marmol directly east of this of Yguida, though most modern geographers, and particularly Baudrand and De Lisle, describe it south and south east of it, separating the deserts of Lempta, that is, the southern division of Yguida, from the kingdom of Cano. On the east it has the kingdom of Bornou, on the north-north-east the desert of Lempta and kingdom or province Yguida, on the south Cano, and is surrounded on the west by the provinces Zapara, Guber, and a large nameless lake, north of the Niger, and joined to it by a river. This province is divided into two districts, the northern, called, on account of its barrenness, the Desert, and the southern, prolific in grass, corn, and cattle. Indeed, nothing can be more opposite than the face of those two districts, the one clothed with a perpetual verdure, well watered, and moderately cool and temperate ; the other sandy, sultry, and the few shrubs and blades of grass it puts forth, scorched up and burnt by the sun, whose beams are reflected with such heat, as to be intolerable to the eyes of travellers. Mr. De Lisle mentions three considerable towns in the fertile division, viz. Agad, the capital of the whole province, Deybir, and Secmana, little inferior in wealth and populousness to the metropolis. He also observes, that sena is produced here in great abundance ; in which article and manna consists the principal trade of the natives <sup>o</sup>. The southern inhabitants feed vast droves of cattle of all sizes and denominations : they live in the open country, and, for the conveniency of pasture, wander about like the Arabs, from place to place, where they build slight huts for the occasion, without regard to order or conveniency. Agad, the metropolis, or Andegast, as the Arabs call it, stands in a valley between two high mountains, and at the spring head of a nameless river, that waters the whole southern country by innumerable little streams and rivulets, that either flow from it, or discharge themselves into it, at last emptying itself in the lake De Garda, and after that in the Senegal <sup>p</sup>. La Croix says, that the inhabitants are chiefly merchants, and strangers settled there, who have inclosed the town with walls, and built their houses in the Moreasco fashion. There are besides a great number of artificers and soldiers, with the prince's guards ; for though this monarch is said to be tributary to the king of Tombuto, yet he preserves the state and splendor of a despotic, powerful, and independent prince. He is even said to be dependent on Zuenziga ; though we think this improbable, considering the vast deserts which part them, and that a tribe of Arabs in this province assume to themselves the prerogative of deposing him, whenever they are dissatisfied with his conduct and government. In this we fear La Croix has either indulged his imagination, or mistakes the geography, since we are able to find no authority on which to ground his assertion, though he would seem to be right in his topography, placing it, with Marmol, Africanus, and the French charts, in the latitude of 18 degrees 50 minutes north, and longitude of 12 degrees 36 minutes east.

Berdoa.

BERDOA, situated exactly north-east of Agades, is the next province, having Faison and Barca on the north, Cano and Agades on the south-west, Nubia on the east, and Bornou on the south. This province stretches from the 16th to the 22d degree of east longitude, and comprehends a space of three parallels, that is, from the 20th to the 23d degree of north latitude, and beyond, if we reckon a dreadful desert, which extends to the 24th degree. The province has taken its name from the capital, which lies directly under the tropic of Cancer, though De Lisle says, that the original name of the inhabitants was Bardoaitis ; and so far from having a fixed metropolis, they have no towns at all, but live in tents, on the plunder of merchants and passengers. He acknowledges indeed, that on the western frontier, almost under the tropic, there is a town or city called Arcan, near the borders of Lempta, and another farther north, named Rou dan Mahalat. Under 24° 36' the same geographer places a third town, which he calls Medheran Isa : on the north of which are the wells which supply both it and the surrounding country with water. Near the mountains which form the northern barriers between this province and Tripoli, or rather Faison, stands the town of Kala, where are kept some considerable fairs, whither resort the merchants from every part of Zaara, or Sarab, the kingdoms on the north and south of the Niger, and the nations bordering upon the Mediterranean sea, with all the wealth of their several countries <sup>q</sup>. This whole northern district is occupied by a people called Levata or Lebetai, who live mostly in tents, although they have three small towns, called Aial, Ain, and Cais, belonging to them. However, what M. De Lisle intends more properly for the province of Berdoa is confined within narrower limits, north of the tropic, containing only five or six villages and three castles. In general the country is dry, barren, and productive of no one commodity that merits a particular description.

WITH the river Niger on the south, Berdoa on the north, Agades on the west, and Gauga on the east, stands the province or kingdom of Bornou, extending from 12 to 22 degrees of east longitude, and from 17 to 21 degrees of north latitude. The northern part is poor,

- a and of a piece with the other povinces of Zaara; but all the rest, which is the greater part, is well watered by springs and rivers, that tumble down with a dreadful noise from the mountains, render the country prolific in corn, grafs, and fruits, and give a pleasing aspect; the very reverse of any thing we have lately beheld<sup>1</sup>. Both extremes, the eastern and western frontiers, are inhabited by a people of a roving disposition, who live in tents, have their women, children, and every thing besides in common, the word property, or any idea equivalent to it, being utterly unknown; without religion, laws, government, or any degree of subordination; and from hence they have been supposed by a famous geographer to be the lineal descendents of the Garomantes, and this to have been the residence of that people<sup>2</sup>. The eastern and western frontiers are divided into mountains and vallies, which to the eye of a traveller has a very agreeable effect, all of them covered with flocks of cattle, fields of rice and millet, and many of the mountains with wood, fruit trees, and cotton. In hot weather the natives, who are almost to a man shepherds and husbandmen, go naked, except a short apron before; which they wear out of regard to modesty; but in the winter they are warmly cloathed with the softest sheep-skins, of which they also form their bed-cloaths; and indeed this is scarce a sufficient defence against the inclemency of the weather at certain seasons of the year, when a cold piercing wind blows from the northern mountains, that chills the blood in proportion as the pores of the body have been opened by the late scorching heats. Baudrand and Dapper<sup>3</sup> affirm, that the natives are but a degree superior to brutes in their understanding and manners, having no names or appellations whereby to distinguish each other, except what they derive from some personal defect or peculiarity, such as lean, fat, squinting, hump-backed, lank, lame, scabby, or some such epithet. They do not acquaint us whether to this adjective they add a noun, as it is highly probable they do: in which case we see not how such a practice should merit the severe censure passed upon their understanding, as it is not peculiar, but has been common, in all ages and in all countries of the world. In the towns, it is acknowledged, that the people are somewhat more polished and refined; and towards the south, it is allowed on all hands, they have towns and regularly formed societies, though of what particular nation we know not. Here they are tractable, polite, and hospitable; and a great part of them artificers and merchants, of all countries and complexions, which has probably occasioned the improvement of their manners. From this particular, related by the historians and geographers quoted in the margin, we learn, that their government is in general monarchical: for they affirm, that the king is so rich as to have all his household furniture, and even his stirrups, spurs, and bridles, of solid pure gold: whence we may infer, that either a great traffick in the precious metal is carried on here with the distant countries, that Bornou itself produces gold, or at least that some of the neighbouring kingdoms do, from whence it is imported hither. On the north-west stands the mountain of Tanton, rich in good iron mines; and on the south flows the Niger, which, after running a great number of leagues under a long chain of mountains, rears up its head again, and mingles its stream with the waters of the lake Bornou in its course, from whence it washes the walls of the capital of this province. To own the truth, we are rather of opinion, that the Niger has its origin in these mountains, at the same time that this is contrary to the assertions of the African geographers, and of the Europeans who have implicitly copied them<sup>4</sup>. What corroborates this conjecture is, that no river has been traced east of this ridge of mountains, except the Nile, which runs in a different course from north to the south, and the White River, on the western frontiers of Abissinia, which flows in the same direction with the Nile, and is in fact a branch of it, that again falls in with it near Sennar. But not to insist too warmly upon what at best must be a conjecture, founded upon defective charts, we shall close this account of Bornou with observing, that its capital is a considerable city, of the same name with the province, besides which there are the towns of Amozen, Sagra, and Semegonda, all of them to the northward of the metropolis, and to the eastward those of Nebrina and Sama. Of any of these towns there is very little known, and some writers have gone so far as to question their existence. Baudrand, however, says, that the capital is situated on the northern bank of the Niger (which even thus high he calls the Senegal), and drives a brisk trade with all the surrounding countries, it being the only place in the whole province that merits the name of a city, all the rest being open towns or large villages<sup>5</sup>.

g We come now to describe the last and most eastern province of the vast desert of Zaara or Sarab, called by the natives and all geographers Gaoga or Kaughga, standing contiguous on the east to Nubia, and on the north to Egypt, with which we began our history of this quarter of the globe. Gaoga is bounded on the west by the kingdoms of Bornou and Berdoa, on the north by part of the latter province, and on the south by the kingdom of Gorham, which, with Medra to the west, and Gingiro and Majac to the south, are commonly placed in the division of Upper Ethiopia. Leo Africanus says, that Gaoga is divided from Gorham by the Barelabaïd river, which falls into the Nile, or by the Niger; yet it must be acknowledged, that its boundaries are by no means precise, as the Niger has never been traced beyond that chain of mountains east of the lake Bornou, and some geographers doubt the existence of any such river as Barelabaïd. This province is reckoned 180 leagues in length from north to south, and about 160 from east to west, where broadest, extending itself from the 19th to the 29th degree of east longitude, and from the 12th to the 22d and beyond of north latitude. The chief and only city in the whole kingdom is Gaoga, standing on the north side of a lake of the same name, in latitude 15 degrees 40 minutes, and longitude 25 degrees 30 minutes east, which is all we know of either. Some writers, however, mention a city called Kuka, and include it within the limits of this province, though it belongs in fact to the province of Kovar, lying north of it, near the frontiers of Egypt; of which we know nothing, as no travellers have ever penetrated that country so far as to make any considerable discoveries. The kingdom of Gaoga is mostly mountainous, the natives rude and illiterate, without cloaths, without arts, and every thing but the shape that distinguishes humanity. They dwell in poor slight hovels, of materials so combustible, that they are frequently set on fire, the flames communicating from hut to hut, till the whole face of the country is burnt up. More probable it is, that they designedly set fire to their dwellings in removing from one part of the country to another; for we find it difficult to conceive how the fire should spread amongst hamlets so dispersed and scattered. They feed large herds of cattle, both small and great, which are indeed their principal care and wealth, as well as sustenance<sup>a</sup>.

ONCE, we are told, they were a free people, but enslaved by a negro, who having murdered his master, a rich merchant, secured his effects, returned to his own country, and there by force of money assembling a large body of horse, he began with making inroads into the province of Gaoga. In time his troops became more expert and numerous, and he at last was so powerful as to reduce the whole country, the inhabitants having neither arms, courage, nor numbers, to resist him. To this usurper his son succeeded, who, after a reign of forty years, left the crown to his brother Moses, whose grandson reigned at the period when Africanus wrote his history, viz. when the Moors were driven out of Granada by Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain, or soon after<sup>b</sup>.

Of the general manners of the inhabitants of the Lower Ethiopia. HAVING now described minutely the different kingdoms and provinces of this vast, extensive, barren, and sultry desert of Sarah, we shall offer a few observations on the general manners of the inhabitants, before we proceed to a recital of the Niger and Senegal, which we think necessary, for the reader's better information of the course of these rivers. The first is somewhat remarkable, that though the rivers Senegal and Niger only divide this desert from Nigritia (F), and though the wandering and pastoral lives of the inhabitants expose them so much to the vertical rays of the sun, under a climate, perhaps, hotter than the former, yet they are of a complexion bordering more upon white than the negroes, and mostly no more than tawny in their colour, while the others are of a jet black (G). Few or none of them approach either in complexion or features to the negroes, who would seem to be a people totally distinct from these, and perhaps the aborigines or primitive inhabitants of Africa, confined by incursions of foreign nations to this tract of land, called by their name Negroland or Nigritia. Nor do the inhabitants of Sarah differ less from those of the southern countries in their manners, customs, and religious rites, than in their external appearance. The former are all professors of the religion of Mohammed, a few only excepted, who retain the old Persic rite of paying their worship to fire. Hence it is probable, that those various tribes of Arabs, Barabars, &c. are descended from those Saracens and Arabians, who, breaking out of Asia, over-ran the greater part of northern Africa in the seventh century, as we have particularly mentioned in our history of those nations. Hence we may account for that inbred and inveterate hatred that still reigns between them and the native Africans, those inhuman hostilities and butcherings they are ever committing upon each other, of which we have given repeated instances. In some provinces those Arabs, though much addicted to robbery and pui-

(F) It deserves notice, that Leo calls all those countries south and north of the Niger by the general name of Nigritia, tho' modern geographers, with more propriety, confine that name to the kingdoms on the south. Leo and Marmal describe a province of this name, on the south banks of the Senegal, in the kingdom of Mandingo, whence, as we have hinted, the whole coast probably received the name of Guinea (1).

(G) No one who is acquainted with the course of the sun in the ecliptic, can be at a loss for the reason, why countries situated within or near the tropic, are hotter than those immediately under the line. This, among others, is one of those discoveries made by that first of philosophers the great Sir Isaac Newton, and which persons, unacquainted with the higher parts of the mathematics, may peruse with more ease in a posthumous work of the late good and learned Mr. de Lauris, professor of mathematics in the college at Edinburgh.

a dering, are industrious, temperate, and abstemious, patient under thirst, hunger, fatigue, and other hardships, to which they are daily exposed by the manner of their living, their occupations, the climate, and above all, their long journey through barren deserts in pursuit of wealth. Among some of them, we are told, there are such relics of christianity, as afford strong presumptions that this religion has once been more general among them, if not the universally received doctrine. Bornou and Gaoga, in particular, are said to furnish more authentic vestiges of christianity than any other province; probably on account of their vicinity to Abissinia, and the commerce they continually carry on with this empire<sup>a</sup>.

But it is now time we should give a short view of the countries north of the Niger, of which we promised to speak before we closed the section, and entered upon the course of the Senegal and Niger. Already the reader has all the particulars we have been able to collect concerning the kingdoms of Mandingo, Fuli, Jaloff, or Oualoff, and Kasson, and has frequently seen the kingdom of Tombuto mentioned, but without any description of it. With this therefore we shall begin. Tombuto is a kingdom of vast extent, situated on both sides the Niger, part of it being that territory which we have supposed, contrary to almost all geographers, separating the rivers Niger and Senegal, or rather those two great lakes into the eastward of which the Niger enters, and from the westward the Senegal flows. In the following manner we find it laid down by the best geographers. It has Gbenza or Gbehenoa and Gualata on the west, Zuenziga and Guber on the north, Bitu and Dauma on the east: however, as all these countries are but little known to Europeans, and hardly penetrated since the time of Marmol and Leo Africanus, it cannot be expected we should be answerable for the accuracy of their descriptions: all we pretend is to follow the most approved, after comparing all.

The name Tombuto is probably of modern date, and Leo alleges, that it was so called from the name of a town whose situation is now unknown, built by king Mense Suliman, in the year 610 of the Hegira<sup>b</sup>. We are told, in general terms, that this town stood within twelve miles of a branch of the Niger; and if the present town Tombuto be the same, it lies in the latitude of fourteen degrees thirty two minutes, and longitude of two degrees twenty five minutes east from London, about fifty five leagues to the north of the lake Mabeira. In this town and the surrounding country, the houses are built of a bell form, and composed of hurdles, plaistered with a hard loam, covered with rushes; but there is one stately mosque, the walls of which are composed of stone and lime. The royal palace is also built with the same materials, of a finer design, and upon a model sketched out and executed by an excellent artist of Granada, driven hither when the Moors were expelled that country. Besides these two buildings, there are some others of good workmanship; but in general, the houses are such as we have mentioned, a kind of conical hamlets.

Tombuto is filled with weavers of cotton; and mechanicks are here more assiduously cultivated than in any other part of this division of Africa; and hither likewise the European cloths are brought from Barbary, and often from the coast of Guiney. Of these markets are held, and public fairs, to which all the women resort with their faces covered, except servant maids, who dress food. The inhabitants of Tombuto, and especially strangers residing in the city, are so rich, that the king thinks it not unworthy of the royal blood to be connected with them; an instance of which happened in the time of Leo Africanus, one of the princesses having publicly married a merchant; such in this place is the dignity of wealth, and such their regard for commerce. The same writer adds, that soon after, another princess was given in marriage to a stranger, who had acquired great riches by trade.

No kingdom in Guiney is better watered with wells, natural springs, and canals drawn from the Niger, than Tombuto. This makes it fertile in all kind of grain, grass, cattle, milk, butter, and every convenience of life besides salt, which they have by land-carriage from Tegaza, distant about 500 miles, and so highly valued, that Leo saw a camel load of this commodity sold for 80 ducats<sup>c</sup>.

f THE rich king of Tombuto has in his possession a prodigious quantity of gold plate, scepters, and other badges of royalty, some of which weigh 1300 ounces of pure gold; and the whole court eat out of golden vessels, silver or any other metal being hardly ever used. In travelling, he rides upon a camel, richly caparisoned, all the furniture shining with burnished gold, and one of his great officers leading his horse after him. In war also he rides upon a camel, but all his soldiers are mounted upon horses. In addressing him, the most profound respect is paid; and all persons approaching the throne must prostrate themselves upon the ground, take up the dust, and sprinkle it over their head and shoulders; a ceremony that is particularly observed by persons who never had this honour before, and by foreign ambassadors. His general retinue and guards consist of 3000 horsemen, all well armed with poisoned arrows and darts, besides a number of foot, who wear shields and swords. He often levies in person the tribute from those princes who do him homage, and frequent skirmishes pass between the guards and those stubborn vassals who unwillingly give this testimony of their servitude. As the country does not breed good horses, the cavalry are usually mounted upon barbs and Arabian horses, which the king purchases at a great expence; however the court and merchants commonly ride upon little nags, the breed of the country, hardy, and in every respect, but beauty, equal to the former. When the king is informed of a merchant's arrival in town with a drove of horses, he immediately orders a certain number of the finest to be brought to him, for which he pays a great price, never scrupling any expence to have his troops handsomely mounted<sup>d</sup>.

the kingdom.

The king an encourager of learned men.

THE enmity of this monarch to the Jews is so great, that he has strictly prohibited them the city, and laid a heavy penalty on all the Barbary merchants who trade with them. From whence this fixed hatred proceeds authors have not told us; though, considering the esteem in which merchants are held, it is probable, that his aversion arose from those frauds and sinister practices in commerce, for which this despised unhappy people have been noted in all ages and countries. His taste for science and literature appears from the great numbers of doctors, judges, and priests, whom he liberally maintains in the capital, at a great expence, furnishing them with all the ease and conveniences of study they can desire; and hence it is, that the human understanding has made a considerable progress in this country, considering the unenlightened condition of all the surrounding nations, and the little assistance they have received from the more refined Europeans. Manuscripts from Barbary are brought hither, and sold as the most valuable merchandize; and, indeed, there are traders who have amassed immense riches by confining themselves wholly to this literary traffick, which the monarch encourages with the spirit, the taste, and the generosity of a prince. However, after all it must be owned, that learning has been of so late date, that hitherto its influence is only perceivable about the court, and has not yet extended itself visibly over the general manners of the people, of whom it can at most be said, that they are mild and gentle in their disposition, frugal in their oeconomy, industrious in their occupations, and chearful in the hours of relaxation, which they devote to singing, dancing, and festivity<sup>e</sup>.

Tombuto.

The Tombu-
tans expert
arithmeticians.

THE currency used in commerce at Tombuto consists of gold bars, and certain shells they are supposed to have from Persia, though by what rout we know not. These they use in lesser bargains; and in all cases where a smaller standard or medium of value is requisite, four hundred of them being worth a ducat, and six bars of their gold, with about two thirds of a bar, equivalent to an ounce. What surprizes a speculative mind, is the facility with which all barbarous commercial nations, who understand not arithmetic as a science, combine their ideas of numbers, and perform the most difficult operations and abstruse calculations, in stating shares, proportions, and other circumstances of trade, by the assistance of their memory alone. From hence one would be led to conclude, that they are possessed of a greater quickness of mind in those objects upon which they exercise the understanding: and that, though less inventive, they are more expert in every point that requires not creative genius; in a word, that the understanding is limited to few ideas, but these understood with a precision proportioned to their smaller number, like blind persons, who have all the other senses rendered more acute by the loss of sight.

Dreadful fires
at Tombuto.

THE Tombutan gentry maintain a great number of slaves, which is the highest mark of pomp and pageantry among them. Their carelessness is frequently the cause of the most dreadful calamities, the whole town being often in flames by accidents, occasioned by their means; for the houses, built of so combustible materials as watlings, catch fire upon the most trivial accident, and the very sparks from their pipes of tobacco. When Leo Africanus went the second time to Tombuto, half the town was burnt to ashes in the space of five hours. Without the suburbs, the same author remarks, the Tombutans have neither gardens, orchards, or hardly any kind of pulse, so that the markets are supplied from places more remote; but he does not acquaint us with the reasons for so extraordinary a conduct.

The trade car-

ABOUT twelve miles from Tombuto, to the south, stands Cabra, a large town, built in the same manner as the former, without walls, and situated on the banks of the Niger, which serves it for a defence on one side. From hence the merchants trading to the little kingdom of Ghenoa, and powerful monarchy of Melli, go by water to the lake Timby, then crossing over the Isthmus, that separates this from the lake Mabeira, they again take water to the country of the Foulis, and traverse that by land-carriage to Melli. The people are here inferior in the refinement of their manners, but not in the innate qualities of their minds, to the inhabitants of the capital. Here is a judge appointed by the king to decide all controversies; and such is the justice of his verdict, that there never has been an instance of an appeal to the throne; which indeed might prove fatal to the magistrate, as bribery and corruption in public proceedings are a reputed crimes of the blackest complexion. The inhabitants of Cabra however, labour under some severe physical calamities; among these may be reckoned, as the worst, the variety of diseases to which they are liable, proceeding, as it is imagined, from the heterogeneous qualities of their food, usually composed of a farrago of milk, fish, flesh, butter, oil, and wine<sup>f</sup>.

To the above relation of Leo Africanus and Marmol, we shall add what farther information M. De Brue had from the Mandingan merchants. From these he learnt that the town of Tombuto, or as he calls it Tombuto, does not stand upon the Niger, but within land; that in going thither they followed the southern bank of the river, for several days journey; and that having left it, they continued their journey for five days more. We leave it to the reader to reconcile a topography so different from that of Leo, who describes Baera upon the river, and but twelve miles distant from Tombuto. The following is the rout they take; from Kaynu, about seven miles below the cataract of Felu, the last village when the river is navigable to Jagu, are five days journey: from Jagu to Baigne one; from thence to Congomon one; thence to Saaba one; from this place to Boramaja two; thence to Goury two; from this stage to Galama one; and thence to Timby, or the great lake of that name, and then across a mountainous country. Here they left the river, and pursuing their march east-south-east (H), they arrived in five days at Tombuto; a journey which we thought might assist the reader in comprehending more distinctly the geography of the country, and the course of the rivers. Thus we see, that the thirty-two days journey being reckoned at ten leagues each day, will make the distance between the cataract of Felu and the capital of Tombuto, about 320 leagues. They added, that there came every year to Tombuto a large caravan of white men, who exchanged a vast quantity of the merchandize of the nations bordering on the Mediterranean, as well as those purchased of the Europeans, for the produce of Tombuto, and particularly gold, found in prodigious quantities in this kingdom. These were in all probability the Moors from Barbary, who might well be esteemed white men, when compared with the jet black inhabitants of Tombuto. From this relation we see the falsity of that opinion, which supposes that a regular trade is carried on from the Mediterranean, by the nations of Barbary and Sarah into Nigritia, and even to the Gold, Slave, and Tooth Coasts. For it is obvious from hence, that only one caravan crosses the Niger, and that even that comes no farther than Tombuto, the most northern nation of all Negroland<sup>g</sup>.

WHEN M. De Brue was in Tripoli, he frequently saw caravans set out from thence, to a country lying southward; which they gave out to be Faisan, though it is highly probable their destination was rather to Tombuto; and our reason for this conjecture is, that they spent fifty days in the journey, which could not be to Faisan, distant only 180 leagues from Tripoli. Another reason, is, the assertion of the Mandingo merchants who have been at Tombuto, and allege, that, besides the gold that country affords, there is often gold brought from the country of Zanfara; and that the merchants, who bring it from thence, employ fifty days in their journey thither; but there is no such time required in travelling from Zanfara to Faisan, the distance not exceeding 200 leagues. From hence we have all the probability that the caravans of Tripoli go to Tombuto; and these towns being 450 leagues asunder, the journey may be easily supposed to employ fifty days. These caravans consist generally of about a thousand men, mounted on horses and camels, all of them well armed and accoutred, so that they have nothing to fear from the attack of robbers or wild beasts. Besides the the fifty days allowed for travel, there are several more consumed in refreshing themselves and cattle, exhausted with the fatigue of so long a journey; and these halts are made in the most fertile and pleasant vallies they meet with, during their stay, in which they solace themselves with every sort of mirth, dancing, singing, and a variety of games. The merchandize they carry is in general the same as the Europeans send to Galam and the interior kingdoms, consisting of black, green, yellow, white, or red serges or cloths, but more of red than of any other colour, the whole amounting in value to twenty thousand crowns. To the same amount they send glass beads and toys, imported to Tripoli from Venice and other European ports. Coral work is exported by the caravans to the amount of twelve thousand crowns: paper, copper basons, and other such goods, to the value of ten thousand crowns; so that the whole stock in trade of a caravan is worth, at prime cost, to the Tripolitans, about sixty thousand crowns; from whence we may deduce the total of their profit on the stock they procure in exchange at Tombuto, which consists of three thousand quintals of dates, sold at Tripoli for two crowns a quintal; twelve hundred quintals of Sena, worth on their return about fifteen crowns per quintal; ostrich feathers to the amount of fifteen thousand crowns;

(H) So we find it in Labat, though we must either attribute the word south to an error of the press, or to the Mandingan merchants mistaking the points of the compass. Their course must have been north east; for in going south, they must have crossed the river, and entered the deserts of Sarah.

cight hundred or a thousand slaves, worth fifty crowns a head; and lastly a thousand marks a of gold, which article alone amounts to an hundred thousand crowns. In a word, these articles amount together at Trifoli to an hundred and seventy-nine thousand crowns; which, after deducting the prime cost of their goods sold in exchange, leaves a profit of one hundred and seventeen thousand crowns; from which we must deduct the expences of the journey, computed at ten thousand crowns. Such is the prodigious profit arising, according to Father Labat, upon this trade, which he thinks might be immediately carried on at a much less expence by the Europeans, by means of the Senegal; several attempts towards which were made by the enterprizing Sieur De Brue, but all of them unsuccessful; nor does it indeed appear practicable to any besides the natives, who alone can endure the hardships and fatigues necessarily met with in such a journey or voyage <sup>b</sup>.

NEXT to Tombuto eastward stands the kingdom of Bita, having Güber and Zanfara on the north, from which it is separated by the Niger, Dauma on the south, and Temian on the east. The capital city has, according to Dapper, the same name, and stands in the latitude of nine degrees ten minutes north; which must certainly be an error, as in this case it must be situated in Guiney. The truth is, we are wholly unacquainted with its true situation, or whether in fact any such town exists, though we find it mentioned by Africanus and Marmol. De Lisle says in general terms, that the inhabitants of this kingdom are rich; a fact which he must have asserted upon conjecture, as there are no authentic accounts of it ever published <sup>a</sup>.

Temian province.

STILL farther east than Bita stands the province of Temian, bounded on the north by the Niger, and province of Cano, on the east-south-east by Bornou and Medra, and by Biafara on the south (I). The inhabitants are said to be anthropophagi, their teeth, says Dapper, resembling those of dogs; in short, authors describe them in every respect similar to a nation we before mentioned inhabiting the Ivory Coast, or lying between that and the Malaguet Coast.

Medra province.

MEDRA or Madra province, has for its frontiers on the west Biafara and Temian, Bornou on the north, and on the south the mountains that separate it from Benin and Majac.

Dauma.

NEXT to this stands Dauma or Dahomay, having Gaoga and Tombuto on the west, Bita on the north, Biafara on the east, and the mountains of Guiney on the south. Of this people <sup>d</sup> we have spoken sufficiently, towards the conclusion of the maritime kingdoms of Whidah and Ardrah, conquered by this warlike monarch.

Goram.

NEXT in order comes Goram or Gorham, with Medra on the west, Gaoga on the north, Abissinia on the east, and a ridge of high mountains on the south.

Kingdom of Biafara.

LASTLY, the kingdom of Biafara, the most populous and potent of any state in Nigritia, except Benin, Tombuto, Mandingo, and Oualof, has Dauma and part of Gaoga on the west, Bita and Temian on the north, Medra on the east, and on the south the desert of Seth; with a ridge of mountains that part it from the kingdom of Benin. This is all that is known of it; and so little acquainted are the moderns with this interior continent of Africa, that we have been able to do little more than lay down the geography with all the precision we are <sup>e</sup> able, by comparing modern charts and maps, with the description of Leo Africanus and Marmol. Directly south of Biafara stands the desert of Seth, with Benin on the south, separating it from the southern ocean, Medra on the east, and Gaoga on the west; close to which stand the deserts of Sen, which, though distinguished by separate names, form one barren, sandy expanse of territory. We may indeed say, that the whole country south of the Niger, with Tombuto on the west, and Ethiopia or Abissinia on the east, is one vast desert, now and then parted by a petty kingdom, equally contemptible for its poverty and small extent. If it be otherwise, it contradicts the sentiments of all writers, and indeed those reasons deduced by analogy from the situation of the neighbouring kingdoms, which begin to put on an appearance of barrenness the nearer they approach this division <sup>f</sup>.

HAVING now run over that multiplicity of nations that inhabit the lands on both sides the Niger, we shall, previous to our description of Biledulgerid, trace the course of the rivers Senegal and Niger, that the reader may see Labat's reasons, as well as those of Africanus and Marmol, for calling them one and the same river, or the former no more than a continuation of the latter.

(I) This Biafara is different from a small kingdom in our account of the islands of Bifce, Bifge, and of that name, extending along the sea coast south- Balam.
south-east of the river Gambia, of which we have spoken

- a "THAT the Niger, Nigir, Nigris, or Nigiris, is the same river with that we now stile Of the origin and course of the Niger, extracted from father Labat, Marmol, and Leo Africanus, with remarks.
 " the Senegal or Zanaga, is now," says father Labat, " agreed on by all hands: but that " it is only a branch of the Nile, springing from that source, and taking a different course " from it, as Ludolph and others imagine, is still much disputed." This the Arabian geographers affirm to a man, though contrary to reason, to the testimony of the best modern geographers, and to common sense, supported only by arguments as weak as they are fabulous.
 It is indeed impossible to conceive how the Nile should by any means be connected with the Niger, as their courses are altogether different, and separated by that prodigious ridge of mountains that separate Abissinia from the kingdoms of Bornou and Gaoga, without we have recourse to Labat's argument for the junction of the Niger and Senegal, that it runs by a b subterraneous passage under these mountains; a fact that may be asserted, but scarcely credited.
 As to the Niger, the Europeans have been able to trace it only part of its course, beyond which they know nothing more than what they learn from the Mandingo merchants, who, of all the negroes, are the most addicted to traffick and travelling. However, it is apparent, that they are neither expert in their observations, nor have they gone far enough to judge, whether the Senegal and Niger be one river, since they acknowledge never to have been higher towards the source of either than the lake Mabeira, which is little more than half way to the Nile, supposing them to be derived from that source.
- OTHER writers following Labat have stretched the course of the Niger back eastward, quite to the lake Bornou, under the 18th degree of north latitude, and 19th of east longitude, c fixing its spring head there, it being impossible, they say, to trace it further, on account of the difficulties and dangers arising from the barrenness of the country, the ferocity of the inhabitants, and the multiplicity of wild beasts, which are the chief rulers of all this district.
 Some other geographers, unsupported by all authority, have placed its source in another lake, near an hundred leagues to the north-east of Bornou. This they call the Niger lake, and affirm, that the river derives its name from it, and takes a south-west course, till it falls into the lake Bornou, after which it continues its course to the lake Mabeira, and so to the Atlantic ocean. Should we expect solid proofs, founded on the observations of persons of credit and experience, in support of these conjectures, we should find ourselves disappointed. This made the Nubian geographer and Ludolphus assert, that it was actually a continuation of the Nile;
 d a conjecture they believed in some measure supported by its etymon. Pliny seems to have led the way to this notion, by his inference collected from the analogy between their water in taste and colour, and the flags, reeds, fish, and other animals common to them both; and yet perhaps he too has borrowed this false reasoning from some older philosopher than himself.
 How the Romans came to have any idea of the source of this river, when the country was wholly unknown, is what we will not pretend to decide. Their account of it was the following.
 There are two rivers in Africa, which both have the name Nile, and spring from the same fountain, in the 16th degree of north latitude, in the country of Ethiopia. This source lies at the foot of the Mountain of the Moon, where there spring ten fountains, which form two lakes. Out of each of these lakes flow three rivers, which joining their streams form a third large e lake, which forms the Niger and Nile, and affords them a perpetual fund of water. The first of these rivers is stiled Nile Mesr, or river of Egypt, and the other Nile Sandan, or river of the Negroes, which last runs westward, and discharges itself in the dark or gloomy sea, that is, in the Atlantic ocean, for so the Arabs call it. The word Nile was probably derived from the Hebrew, Nebel or Nabal, as we have already observed<sup>k</sup>, signifying a river, a term emphatically applied to this river by way of pre-eminence. In other parts of the sacred writings, it is called Sibor or Sichor, which signifies black, muddy, or troubled, and answers in some measure, as our author thinks, to the name Niger or Nigris, as well as the muddy nature of both rivers. Hence, they imagine, they might both have been called Sibor or Nichel Sibor, the Black River, though the Niger alone has preserved that name, from its running thro' the f country of the blacks. This seems further confirmed, Leo believes, by what the Egyptian scribe told Herodotus, that there were two mountains with peaked tops, called *Croph*i and *Moph*i, and situated between the cities of Syene in Thebais and Elephantina; and that from the middle of the valley between these mountains sprung up the inexhaustible source and head of the Nile, one part of whose stream ran northward to Egypt, and the other southward towards Ethiopia.

ALL the above vague reasoning has been refuted judiciously by father Labat, who has himself adopted other notions equally ideal, and unsupported by authentic vouchers. The rivers
Niger and Senegal he affirms to be the same, though he has brought no arguments in proof of this assertion, which we think highly improbable, for the reasons already mentioned; however, g as this affects not his description, as far as its course has been traced, we shall extract the following

relation from him, as a supplement to what we have before said upon this subject. “The Senegal,” says he, “is a large and considerable river, and of prodigious extent in its course, even though we should not trace its source beyond the lake Bornou. But if we suppose it to spring from the same origin as the Nile, it will then almost cross the whole continent of Africa, where it is of the greatest extent, and will have a course of near fifty degrees from east to west, exclusive of its windings. The entrance to it is difficult, on account of its bar, sandy shoals, and several islands that in a manner block it up.” For the space of five or six leagues from its mouth the country is sandy and barren, the rest in general on the south side, fertile, well covered with fruit trees, and refreshed with water; for like the Nile it overflows its banks annually, leaving a slime and mud behind that greatly enriches the ground. Its inundation happens about the same time as that of the Nile, and arises from the same cause, viz. the great rains that fall between the tropics, and last from the beginning of June to the end of September, sometimes without intermission, and so violent, that those who are unacquainted with them, would reasonably expect that a second deluge threatened to destroy mankind. These rains the inhabitants foresee time enough to provide against them, by shutting themselves up in their huts, stopping every crevice that admits water, making provision of fire, brandy, tobacco, and other things to correct the unwholesome damps which would otherwise prove mortal. The earth having been incrustated for the space of eight months, with the thick and dry scurf left by the last inundation, the violence of the rains which dissolves this cover, and gives free vent to the vapours so long pent up, must necessarily occasion a stench no less fatal than disagreeable, and intolerably nauseous. At the same time all manner of reptiles and insects are produced in this filth; toads, frogs, serpents, vipers, and the whole hissing tribe. Violent and impetuous winds frequently arise during the rainy season, that sometimes overturn the little cabins of the natives, in spite of all the precautions they are able to take; and these are rendered still more horrible by the prodigious flashes of lightning and claps of thunder, that render the scene more tremendous, though they are thought to be useful in purging the air of its gross exhalations. During all this season, the Senegal is navigable all the way from the sea to the first cataract by ships of burthen, and they are assisted in their voyage by a brisk westerly wind, that drives them on against the stream with great rapidity. It here branches out into a number of other rivers of a smaller size, ditches, ponds, and lakes, which have no other waters than what they derive from this source. The most considerable of the lakes are, Kayor and Panierfouli, besides a great number of others of a lesser size, which swell during the inundation to such a height as to resemble seas.

TILL November, the waters continue without decrease or diminution, when they begin to fall off every day, and by the 8th of December are sunk at least five feet at the rocks of Senegal, and so continue shrinking till they are reduced to their primitive state, and leave the ground overspread with a treasure of fecundity.

Of the islands and cataracts
of the Senegal
and Niger.

As the Senegal receives a great number of considerable rivers in its course, which swell it so high, as to make it navigable at all times by ships of forty or fifty tons burthen, it likewise splits itself into a variety of streams, which are again re-united to it, and form before their junction a number of large islands, well filled with towns, villages, and inhabitants, some of which are erected into potent monarchies, guarded on all sides by a deep river. It likewise forms several noble rivers, which in their course receive different names, such as the Sanguirai, that breaks from the Senegal a little below Ouetesour, and, after a south-west course for the space of fifty or sixty leagues, joins itself to another river, when the mingled waters of both take the name Gios. This again branches out into a third stream, called Little Brack, and rejoins it at Guidon, after having first formed a number of small islands.

THE most remarkable island formed by these rivers is, Beguio or Bifecho, a kingdom greatly respected for the number of its people, towns, and greatness of its trade. This island stands between the great stream and the branch of its name, otherwise called Corow river. It is about thirty-five leagues in length, and twelve or fifteen broad, intersected with a great number of small streams or canals, which give it the appearance of a groupe of small islands, covered with palm and other fruit trees. This island reaches, says Labat, almost to the mouth of the great river; and above it is another, called Morphil, taking its name from the river that incloses it, and is no less than eighty miles in length, and only parted in the middle by a natural canal of about five miles, which joins the rivers Morphil and Senegal. Notwithstanding its vast length, the island of Morphil, where it is broadest, does not exceed eight or ten leagues over, and in most places not more than five or six. It is well peopled and filled with villages, the inhabitants of which trade considerably in ivory, which the negroes call Morphil, and from whence the island, or at least the river, took its name. Adjoining to that, and only parted by a canal, is situated another island, called by the inhabitants Balbus, about thirty leagues long, and five or six broad. It is rich and populous, the inhabitants cultivating the ground with

- a with great care, but commerce with still more attention, as in this they place their chief wealth. The commodities they deal in are ivory, gold dust, or flatted plates of pure gold, of different sizes and shapes, used by the women for ornaments, and sold by the men to the Europeans, as often as they can lay hands on them. Labat says, that the islands of Morphil and Balbus belong to the kingdom of Fouli, though we have reason to believe that they are each of them independent states, under princes who pay no tribute, and acknowledge no superior. The prince, nobility, and people, are all civil and obliging to strangers, happy in themselves, assiduous in procuring property, which they are in no danger of losing, under so mild, so just, and so equitable a government as this is said to be. Besides the populousness and fertility of the islands, they are rich in medicinal herbs, fruits, roots, and a number of other productions valuable to the natives, but too indistinctly described by voyagers, and intirely omitted by a late excellent French naturalist. They likewise breed great variety of cattle and other animals, fowls in abundance, besides plenty of cotton, which they manufacture and sell to a considerable advantage.

ABOUT four or five leagues east of Balbus, is a small island called Sudel, belonging, as we have before remarked, to the French Senegal company. This therefore, with what we have mentioned in general when we treated of the commerce of this river, will suffice for the islands formed by it, and the branches flowing from it.

- c THE Senegal, like the Nile, has several considerable cataracts, the most noted of which are those of the rock called Felu, and that of Govina. The first of these is almost perpendicular, and about sixty yards high, the stream growing narrower before it reaches this precipice, being pent in between two rocky mountains, and here rushing down with a force and noise no less astonishing than dreadful, into a large basin or reservoir, from whence it flows in a smooth gentle stream in the usual course. It would indeed appear to have forced its way through the mountains above Felu, as it passes them with incredible rapidity; and the inundation season carries away great parts of the rock, which it tumbles down the cataract in a manner terrifying to the spectator. That of Govina is still louder and more beautiful, as the cascade is higher, and the water beautifully spread in a continued smooth crystal surface, that exhales a mist upon which the sun beams play, and are reflected in all the colours of the rainbow. There could not indeed be a more pleasing scene than is represented by this cataract, did not the horror of the noise in some measure diminish the satisfaction of the beholder, and strike him with terror, where he would otherwise be absorbed in pleasing admiration.

- We have frequently taken notice of two great lakes, either formed by the Niger and Senegal, Of its lakes. or, as we think more probable, giving origin to these rivers; besides which, there are several others actually formed by them, by means of rivers that branch out, and then terminate in a lake (K). Mabeira lies under the 12th degree of north latitude, and second of east longitude, on the western mouth of which is seated the city Tumby, though this may more properly be called another lake. That of Bornou lies under the 16th degree of north latitude, and 10th of east longitude, in the kingdom of Bornou, and near the capital of that name. The lake which the French call Panierfouli, near the mouth of the Senegal and the kingdom of Fouli, is but small, and of an oval figure, about five leagues in length from north to south, and three in breadth, the mouth of the river connecting it with the Senegal, being almost blocked up on the south end by an island. At the time of the inundation, this lake, like that of Kayor, resembles an ocean more than a fresh water lake; but when that subsides, it sinks into its primitive littleness, when compared with some of the other lakes. All the sands round it are rich and prolific in corn, grass, fruits, and roots, being strongly manured by the ooze and mud left by the drained waters; and this authors produce as a reason why good tobacco grows here, though we never before knew that a wet rich soil was proper for raising that plant. Near Panierfouli is a large wood of ebony, which the natives call Jalam Boan; of this wood great quantities are hewn down and let drive in floats down the river, where it is sold cheap to the Europeans. As to the lake Kayor, we shall only add to what we have related, that it stands about 50 leagues from the mouth of the river Senegal, and is joined to it by a canal which the Europeans endeavoured to render navigable; but such is the indolence of the natives, and the number of rushes and weeds that choke up the passage, that we may well despair of ever seeing this work accomplished, though nothing could more facilitate the trade into the adjacent countries, or lessen the price of commodities brought from thence by an expensive and tedious land carriage, thro' difficult and hazardous roads.

To conclude this account of Senegal, we shall add, that the Europeans, as well as the natives, have, for a series of years, observed the bad consequences of a dry season in Ethiopia,

(K) It may be worth remarking, that all the neighbouring negroes look upon Mabeira as the source of the Senegal, and Bornou as the spring of the Niger; nor do we think that Labat, with all his arguments, has made the contrary very evident, any more than Ludolphus and the Nubian geographers have proved them to be branches of the Nile.

and those parts where the Senegal and Niger are supposed to have their origin; for if they fail of overflowing in the usual manner, the country on both sides is that year rendered barren, and the inhabitants starved for want of the necessaries of life. Neither grain, grass, or fruits are produced, and cattle as well as men are afflicted with famine and pestilence, the latter either in consequence of the former, or of a change in the air, charged with gross vapours, exhaled by the sultry heat of the sun, and not purified by the high winds and rains that always accompany an inundation. On the other hand, when it overflows regularly, they are no less pestered and afflicted with swarms of vermin, engendered in the mud, and the flights of grasshoppers that darken the sky, and eat up the produce of the earth before it comes to maturity. Thus are the unhappy natives tormented on the one hand by a drought, and on the other by a wet season; and yet experience has never dictated to them the foresight of establishing granaries in a fertile year to guard against the inconvenience of bad seasons. Locusts in particular are, as we observed from Adamson, the pests of all these countries, tho' the natives turn this calamity to the best advantage, by using them for food instead of the grain they destroy. But it is time we should hasten to Biledulgerid, and not fatigue the reader with dry geographical descriptions of countries, the inhabitants of which are almost intire strangers to us, in civil policy, government, religion, customs, and every thing besides the complexion.

described.

BILEDULGERID, or the antient Numidia, we have seen described in our antient history; but as the moderns all agree that its limits have been greatly contracted, we shall endeavour to determine its boundaries by the most accurate maps. To the Romans it was known by the name of Numidia, and was then divided into two large provinces, whose inhabitants were distinguished into Massælians and Massylians, the former situated to the eastward, and the latter farther west. Both were in friendship with the Romans, till they found means to fall upon Jugurtha, whom Caius Marius defeated and made prisoner, at which time they seized upon Numidia, though they did not erect it into provinces before the usurpation of Julius Cæsar. Then Masiliiana alone was called Numidia, and Massælyana included under it, by the name of Mauritania Cæsariensis. It is not our business to recapitulate in this place the particulars regarding this subjection, division, and the boundaries affixed to each province. We should indeed be contented, could we incontestibly settle the limits of the modern Numidia, which are variously adjusted by almost all the authors we have perused. There was, it must be owned, an universal confusion in all their maps and writings, before the geography of M. De Lisle appeared, who first began to reduce it to its natural boundaries, by divesting it of a number of provinces, which he, with great accuracy, and upon better authority, places under other divisions. It was before a huge chaos of kingdoms jumbled together, without order, connection, or the smallest ray of reason; now it is reduced to moderate limits, and made to fill up that space that separates the deserts on the north of Sarab from Barbary.<sup>m</sup>

ACCORDING to the older geographers, Biledulgerid, or the Land of Dates, was one of the general provinces into which the whole continent of Africa was divided; and Biledulgerid Proper appears, in fact, to be only a small part of what was comprehended under that general name, to which they added no less than seven provinces, a variety of towns and cities, upon no better foundation than the vast extent they have given it, especially from east to west, that is, from the frontiers of Egypt quite to the Atlantic ocean; or, according to their calculation, 2500 miles. Nor were its boundaries on the north and south, though much more moderate, less wild and erroneous; for they made Mount Atlas the frontier between Biledulgerid and Barbary, on the north; and the deserts of Libya and Sarab its southern limits. This the reader may see from the maps and descriptions of Leo, Marmol, Sanfon, Tillemont, and Baudrand, who seem to have copied each others errors implicitly; and they again to be followed with the same blind ignorance, faith, and indolence, by most late geographers, particularly Moll and Salmon. A little attention to the above authors would have shewn them such a contrariety of sentiments, not so much with each other as with themselves, as would sufficiently destroy the weight of their authority, and convince a judicious reader, that he must either think for himself, or ever remain in obscurity and error, with respect to the situation of this large district (L).

LEO AFRICANUS, who is much more distinct than Marmol or his translators, has plainly contracted the dimensions of Biledulgerid on the east and west sides, throwing off a number of provinces, which Baudrand upon his pretended authority joins to it. A circumstance of which we thought it necessary to apprize the reader, in apology for our differing so greatly

(L) We may add, that though Leo Africanus and Marmol have described this country in a very indistinct and confused manner, and advanced many things without the slightest authority, yet this confusion and error has been greatly augmented by their copiers, who would seem either not to understand the originals, or at least to have explained them according to their own inclinations.

a with late geographers in considerable repute, if we may be allowed to judge from the number of editions of their works which have passed.

According to Moll and some other late geographers Biledulgerid comprehends the following <sup>Errors of</sup> eight large tracts or provinces; viz. Barca, to be described elsewhere, Biledulgerid Proper, <sup>modern</sup> Segelmessa, Tafilet, Tigorarin, Zeb, Darka, and Teffel, besides a number of inferior ones, <sup>grape</sup> which they mention under the names of Oguela, Fassan, and Gudamis, &c.<sup>a</sup> De Lisle, <sup>by M. Le Lisle</sup> however, more justly confines it to the province properly called Biledulgerid, or that space of land lying south of Tunis, and, strictly speaking, only a part of it, separated by a ridge of mountains only, while the form of government is nearly the same. This province is almost of a square form, and extends itself more than eighty leagues every way, or from 28 degrees 30 minutes, to 32 50 minutes north latitude; and from 5 degrees 30 minutes, to 11 degrees 50 minutes east longitude. It is bounded on the east by a ridge of lofty mountains, which divide it from the kingdom of Tripoli and part of Gudamis, on the west by the countries of Zeb and Mezeb, on the south by the province of Verghela; and this is all that can with propriety be comprehended within the strict limits of Biledulgerid, though it be usual to include all those provinces which we have called its frontiers<sup>o</sup>.

THE whole country of Biledulgerid is sandy, barren, and mountainous, producing little or <sup>Description of</sup> no sustenance but dates, which grow here in such profusion, that the face of half the province <sup>the great pro-</sup> is covered over with trees bearing this fruit. The climate is hot and unhealthy; the people <sup>vince of Bile-</sup> lean, swarthy, and shrivelled in their complexions, with their eyes inflamed, owing to the <sup>dulgerid.</sup> reflection of the sun beams from the white hard soil, and the showers of dust and sand driven by the high winds, that blow here at certain seasons, so violently as frequently to bury men and cattle under heaps of sand. Another inconvenience with which they are afflicted, for which no reason has been given, besides the eating of dates, is an inveterate scurvy generally in the gums, whence their whole teeth drop out, tho' it frequently spreads over their whole bodies, by which they become the most unhappy, pitiable, and loathsome of all objects. In other respects the natives are vigorous, healthy, and sound, living to a good old age, without sickness or disease; though it is observable, that they discover a furrowed countenance, shrivelled skin, hoary locks, and other concomitants of old age, very early in life, and before infirmity, decrepitude, or any decay of their faculties, begin to appear. The plague, that pest of Barbary, <sup>d</sup> is not known, and scarce ever heard of in Biledulgerid, notwithstanding the contiguity of the countries, and the constant intercourse of the inhabitants at all seasons; whence one would be induced to believe that this terrible disease is less infectious than it has usually been reported. The same may be said of the small-pox, a disease no less contagious and fatal in hot countries than the plague itself.

As to the character of the natives of Biledulgerid, they are represented as a lewd, treacherous, thievish and savage people, that delight in murder, blood, and rapine. They are mostly, as we before mentioned, a mixture of old Africans and wild Arabs, who mingled themselves with them; the former living with more regularity and civil order in a kind of villages composed of a number of little huts; the latter in tents, ranging from place to place in quest of food <sup>c</sup> and plunder. In the whole country, besides Teuzar and Tonsera, on the frontiers of Tunis and Cassa, there is not a town worth mentioning; and those are placed by some geographers within the limits of Tunis. It is no less destitute of rivers, there being scarce a single stream in all this large territory that merits notice, or that is not dried up half the year<sup>p</sup>.

THE Arabs, who pride themselves upon their superiority of birth and talents over the primitive inhabitants, are wholly independent and free, frequently hiring themselves in the service of neighbouring princes at war, from which policy arise their most valuable branches of the public revenue, if any thing can be called common or public, in a nation of lawless rovers; the rest pursue no other occupations besides hunting and plundering, the first of which is one of their noblest diversions, especially ostrich hunting, which in this country are said to be of a prodigious stature, and as high as a man mounted upon a tall horse. We have elsewhere given an account of the manner in which these animals are hunted, killed, and dressed for food, by the Arabians, in their own proper country; nor do they apply them less to use here. They <sup>Dress of the</sup> eat their flesh, barter their feathers for corn, pulse, and other things they want, use their <sup>natives and</sup> hearts in their necromantic and religious rites, their fat or oil as a medicine of prime virtues, <sup>the use of the</sup> their talons for ear-pendants and other ornaments, and their skins they convert into pouches <sup>ostrich.</sup> and knapsacks, so that not a part of the animal is left unemployed in some useful purpose. Besides dates and ostriches, the Arabs live likewise upon the flesh of goats and camels, drinking either the liquor or broth in which that flesh is boiled, or the milk of their camels; for they seldom taste water, that element being more rare than milk itself, at least what is fit to be used, it being in general brackish and unwholesome, producing a great variety of chronical a diseases<sup>a</sup> (A).

Of the priests
and marbuts.

THE Arabs have some horses which they use in the chace, upon which occasion persons of better fashion are attended by their slaves of the negro kind, and the rest by their women, no less obsequious than the slaves themselves, looking after their horses, and performing all the most servile and laborious offices. They have likewise schools, to which all the boys of distinction are sent, to be instructed in that kind of knowledge fashionable in the country, and raised from thence to the high dignities of cadis and marbuts, judges or priests, in proportion to their genius, and the proficiency they have made in their studies. It is true, indeed, that learning is here at the lowest ebb, it consisting wholly in acquiring a dexterity and slight of hand, by which they may be enabled to juggle and cheat the people by holy artifice, the marbuts b being more properly conjurers, than the teachers and professors of morality, or any kind of religion. Some indeed addict themselves to poetry, for which all the natives of this country, like the easterns, shew a very early propensity and genius; nor is it uncommon to see a person rise to the highest distinctions, by means of this talent, which they sometimes carry to an amazing pitch of sublimity and sweetness, considering the rude ignorance of the people in general. Their invention is surprisingly fertile; nor can any thing exceed their talent in weaving in the keenest satires, the most affecting eulogies, and the warmest exhortations, in their fables and parables, in which kind they especially excel. There are others among them who pursue the mechanic arts; but in general the people despise them as mean, servile, and infinitely below the dignity of their birth, which is a privilege for idleness and poverty: where any of them c think it worth while to cultivate the earth, this employment they leave to their wives and slaves<sup>c</sup>.

THE Arabs have so dispersed and spread themselves over all the countries, acquired such a superiority over the original inhabitants, and exerted it with such insolence and tyranny, that the native Africans have been forced to retire more towards Negroland, and leave them to range at liberty in this. Some of them wander from one end to the other, with their herds of cattle, without acknowledging a superior; others have their particular cheyks, or chiefs; and a third sort are either tributary or subject, some to the Turks, who possess some parts of Numidia, others to other states, as particularly those towards the west, to Fez and Morocco. They are professors of the doctrine of Mohammed; but equally negligent in acquiring a competent d knowledge of its tenets, and in practising the little they do know. Indeed their religion, if it deserves that name, seems to be a mixture of the Pagan, Jewish, and Mohammedan, of which they neither have, nor are desirous of having, any distinct ideas, which might only be clogging their conduct with what they esteem an unnecessary restraint<sup>d</sup>.

Of the city
Teusera.

As to the city of Teusera, which we have placed with De Lisse within the limits of Biledulgerid, we have the following account by Marmol. It was built, he says, by the Romans, upon the banks of a fine river, that flows down from some of the mountains on the south, and was fortified with high walls, the ruins of which are still to be seen: however, it would appear to be beyond the true limits of Biledulgerid Proper, which De Lisse describes without one single river. It contained, according to Marmol, five thousand families; but appears, from its remains, e to have been much more populous. The Mohammedans, when they entered this country, plundered and destroyed the city, on account of the obstinate resistance made to their conquests by all the inhabitants of this large province. Thus all its noble structures were demolished, and have lain ever since in their ruins, the present buildings consisting of low and mean huts, in the fashion of the country, though the people are said to be wealthy in money and dates. Here they hold fairs at certain seasons, to which the merchants of all the surrounding countries resort, and bring a prodigious afflux of wealth into the place. Through the center of this town runs the river, by which the Arabs and Africans are separated, each of them possessing a certain quarter, the one to the south, the other to the north, and enjoying different immunities and privileges, though all are the inhabitants of the same city. Nay, they are at continual war with each other, and incursions are made from one division into the other, with all the f rancour and animosity that can be imagined in the breasts of savages, so widely different in manners and customs. Both indeed frequently refuse to acknowledge the Tunese government, and unite to repel all endeavours used to reduce them to submission; agreeing in this alone, to preserve their freedom, and not bend the neck to foreigners, while they are using every possible measure to ruin and enslave each other. In a word, the general character of the Arabs is, to suffer all kinds of danger and hardships, rather than yield to the yoke of a foreign go-

(A) It is probable, that the bad quality of the water of this country contributes not a little to the malignancy and frequency of that scorbatic diabets and habit we have mentioned.

a vernment. To conclude, this city stands upon the confines of Tunis, in the latitude of two degrees twenty-eight minutes north, and longitude of ten degrees twenty-six minutes east; and, though by many geographers placed within the kingdom of Tunis, is in fact a part of Biledulgerid.

CAPSA is another famed Roman city, formerly encircled by strong walls, towers, and bastions; but taken and demolished by Occuba, a famous Arab general, of whom we before gave an account. This city is likewise placed erroneously by a number of geographers within the boundaries of Tunis. The walls of the citadel are still remaining, as monuments of the ancient glory and strength of Capsa, twenty-four fathoms in height and five thick, built of large square stones, which have now acquired the solidity and firmness of a rock. The walls of the town were rebuilt by the inhabitants since their first demolition, but were afterwards destroyed by Jaacob Almanzar, who sent a governor and troops into the province. In Marmol's time Capsa was very populous, abounding with stately mosques and other structures, of superb and regular workmanship: but at present it is occupied by a poor indigent people, fleeced and oppressed by the Tunese government. In the very center of the city stands an inclosed fountain, which supplies the town at the same time with water, and a bath of a fine cool element. The adjacent country abounds with citrons, palms, olives, and other fruits; but the climate and inhabitants are unhealthy; to which writers attribute the peevish churlishness of the latter. Both men and women dress handsomely, except their feet, which they cover with coarse shoes of bungling workmanship, and made of the rough skins of wild beasts, equally inconvenient and unbecoming. As to the situation of Capsa, authors are disagreed; but the most probable is, that it stands in the latitude of thirty-three degrees fifteen minutes north, and in the east longitude of nine degrees three minutes, thirty leagues from Teusera (B).

THAT nothing may be wanting to give the reader ample satisfaction concerning a country so imperfectly known, we will not confine him intirely to our own ideas of it, but gratify him with a description of all the provinces included within the general name of Biledulgerid by other writers. First stands the province of Suz, or Souz, bounded on the east by the ocean, on the south by Libya, or the deserts of Sarah, on the east by the province of Dara, and on the north by the province of Suz in Barbary, says La Croix, as if there were two contiguous provinces of this name.

NEXT, eastward, is situated the province of Dara, which, according to La Croix and other moderns, composes a great part of Biledulgerid. It takes its name from a large river of this name, that discharges itself into the Mediterranean sea, and encloses a great part of that country called Mauritania Cæsariensis. On the north it is separated from Morocco by the greater Atlas, on the west it hath the provinces of Suz and Gezala, on the east Segelmessa, and on the south the deserts of Sarah or Libya; being in all about an hundred leagues in length. This province contains a number of castles, forts, and strong holds, situated on the banks of the Dara. One of the chief towns is Benisabib, or Mucubab, after which the traveller falls in with Quiteoa, about 200 paces from the river, well defended by walls, and fortified by a citadel. Next occurs the little town of Tozarin, with its citadel; and about twenty leagues from Quiteoa stands Tayamadert, famous for the birth of their Cherifs. Turzela and Margala, are also cities situated upon the river Dara; the former so large as to contain four thousand houses, a castle, and above four hundred Jewish families, Yinzulin, the largest town of the whole province of Dara, stands twelve leagues from Jaragala, and is a place of great extent, fortified by a strong citadel and walls. Besides a number of lesser places, La Croix makes mention of Tinefguit, as one of the chief places, situated on the confines of Gezula, and containing within its walls about three thousand fires, besides two hundred families inhabiting the suburbs.

THE province of Dara, like almost all the other provinces of this country, is in general barren, though some parts of it are capable and do produce grain, especially after the river has overflown its banks, and enriched the adjacent fields with its fertile mud. However, the whole province does not afford sufficient nourishment for the inhabitants; whence they exchange their dates at Fez for corn and other necessaries of life. Most of the people are of a very dark complexion, few of them bordering upon white; a circumstance that is attributed to their allying themselves so frequently with the negroes, and intermingling their blood. Their women are reckoned handsome; but inclinable to a gross habit. Their disposition is sweet, and tinctured

(B) La Croix places Capsa, which he calls Cafsa, under forty degrees of east longitude, and twenty-seven degrees and ten minutes north latitude; but, according to this situation, it could not be in Biledulgerid Proper, in which province he describes it (S).

with less of the savage than is to be found among most females of this country. In general, the inhabitants of Dara acknowledge the sovereignty of the emperor of Morocco, though they are governed by their own Cheyks.

3d. Ytata

NEXT stand the provinces of Taphilet and Ytata, which we shall describe under their proper heads hereafter; though they are here placed by La Croix among the provinces of Biledulgerid.

4th. Segelmessa.

THE province of Segelmessa is watered by the river Zis, and extends from the streights near Gberjulein to the deserts of Sarab, north and south, and from Dara to Jessel on the west and east. Its metropolis, of the same name, is washed by the Zis. It was formerly powerful; and one sees by the vestiges of its walls that they had been high, beautiful, and strong; but on occasion of some troubles the inhabitants deserted it, and retired to the surrounding villages. However, Gramay affirms, that it was repeopled in the year 1548; tho' for this we have no other authority. La Croix says, that along the banks of Zis there are three hundred and fifty walled towns, besides a great number of villages: whence we may conclude, that this province must be exceeding populous. The same author adds, that the method of living here, and the general manners of the people, differ in nothing from what we have described; that the heat produces a great number of scorpions and serpents; that in the summer the natives are always troubled with inflammations and defluxions of the eyes; that they are ignorant, credulous, and superstitious, to a degree of absurdity.

5th. Quanana.

ALONG the river Zis stands the province of Quaneg, or Quanana. Between Fez and Segelmessa it has several considerable fortresses, of which the chief is Zebel, situated on a high inaccessible rock, whose summit is hidden among the clouds. It is indeed an epitome of the country, than which nothing more bare, barren, rocky, and desert can be imagined.

6th. Metagara

SOUTH of Quanana lie the provinces of Metagara and Retel, filled with towns, villages, and other marks of their being well inhabited and wealthy. The chief town of the former is called Helela, where resides a Cheyk, who draws 30,000 ducats yearly from duties imposed upon merchandize brought thither. Nor is the province of Retel less populous; but the people are covetous, and much addicted to thieving, at least such of them as serve the Arabs in quality of slaves: a vice they may possibly have learned under so experienced masters.

7th. Togda.

THE province of Togda has three cities, and a number of villages; but is less populous and wealthy than the preceding. It is divided into the four following districts, Farcella, Togda, Tezarin, and Banigami; all of them inhabited by different nations, independent on each other, and yet connected by a certain political tie in one interest, and under one head.

8th. Tegorari.

NEXT follows the territory of Tegorari, or Taguriri, consisting chiefly of a desert, forty miles in length; however, it is not all so, as appears by the number of castles, which amount to fifty-three, and more than one hundred villages. Of these La Croix places the chief in 28 degrees of east longitude, and 30 of north latitude. The natives are rich, by means of their extensive commerce with the negroes; and it is besides affirmed, that gold is found plentifully in this country; yet so barren and dry is it, that it scarce produces any grain, or indeed any other vegetables, without being watered, with great labour and expence, by water brought from a great distance. For this reason it is that they permit strangers who travel the country to pay nothing for lodgings, thinking it a sufficient equivalent that they have the dung of their cattle, which they prize as gold, and the labour of their horses to fetch water during their stay. Victuals of all kinds are exceeding dear, not only on account of the scarcity of grain, but of grass, which makes them unable to maintain their sheep and cows, or render those they have valuable for their milk or flesh. Besides dates, the chief aliment is horse and camel's flesh, which they purchase, when old and past work, of the Arabians, who deal largely in superannuated cattle. With all its disadvantages, the Jews have established themselves in this country, and were equally remarkable for their numbers and riches, before they were pillaged, at the instigation of a marabout of Tremecen, by the people, on the very same year they were driven out of Spain, viz. in 1492. La Croix says, that they were not only plundered but massacred by the Tegorarins, very few of them escaping out of the kingdom.

9th. Menezal.

THERE is another country, called Menezal, about a hundred leagues east of Tegorari, and the same distance from the Mediterranean sea on the north, which La Croix ranks among the provinces of Biledulgerid. This territory contains six walled towns, a great variety of large villages, although the land is desert and barren, the inhabitants making up the natural disadvantages of the country, by a redoubled application to trade, which they push a great way into the negro kingdoms. The misfortune is, that, being subject to the Arabs, they are grievously oppressed, and compelled to pay heavy tributes to those idle and insolent usurpers.

- a IN the next place we meet with the kingdom of Tycarte as Gramaye calls it, and Tecort, <sup>10th. The king-</sup> according to La Croix, and other French writers. What reasons could induce these authors to rank this among the Biledulgerid provinces we know not: certain it is, that writers of an older <sup>dom of Ty-</sup> date, and the Turks themselves, place it in the interior parts of Algiers. However, we shall here give a short account of it under the former division, as we find it in La Croix and Ogilvie. Tycarte, the capital, which gives its appellation to the kingdom, stands at the distance of an 100 leagues from Tegorari, and an hundred and fifty from the Mediterranean sea, under thirty-two degrees fifty minutes east longitude, and twenty-seven degrees ten minutes north latitude. Here is the ancient city called Turaphilun by Ptolemy, built by the Numidians upon a mountain, the foot of which is washed by a small river, over which stands a draw-bridge. Here it is
- b fortified by good strong stone walls, and on the other side by the rugged precipices of an inaccessible rock. It contains about two thousand five hundred houses, built of stone, lime, and brick, with a handsome mosque in the center, corniced with stone.

IN the kingdom of Tycarte are about forty strong holds, and an hundred and fifty villages, which pay a considerable tax or revenue to the superior, whom we do not find called a king, though the country has the appellation of kingdom. The people consist of nobility and artificers: they are rich in dates, but poor in corn and other grain, which they import from Constantina, giving in exchange their fruits: they are fond of strangers, and so hospitable, that they lodge them for months without expecting any return, and prefer marrying their daughters to them than to their own neighbours. When, however, no such alliances happen to be

c made, and that their guests are going away, without any expectation or tie upon them ever to return, they load them with presents, which impress the highest ideas of their generous liberality.

NEXT is the lordship of Querquelen, which is in strict propriety no more than a province <sup>11th. Quer-</sup> of the kingdom of Tycarte. At present its capital gives its name to the country, though <sup>quelen.</sup> Ptolemy describes it under the appellation of Tamarca. It was built by the Numidians in the middle of the deserts, under thirty-seven degrees thirty minutes east longitude, and twenty-five degrees fifty minutes north latitude. The country produces a great abundance of dates, but scarce any grain or cattle, or indeed animals, except camels and ostriches. Most of the natives are negroes, both in complexion and features; not owing, it is

d thought, to the climate, but to the connexion they have with the blacks, and the frequent intermarriages, by which, in time, the children acquire the exterior of the mother; for scarcely any black men marry the Numidian women. The country is filled with artisans and merchants; the first supplying the latter with materials for trade, and receiving in return the necessaries of life. They are open, free, generous, and hospitable to strangers; industrious in their occupations, insomuch that by dint of trade they have rendered this barren country rich, and abounding with all the luxuries of life, though hardly any of them are indigenous. They have a superior, with the authority, but without the name and badges of majesty, who has a revenue of an hundred and fifty thousand ducats; but it is probable, that out of this he pays a tribute to the Arabs, as he certainly does to the Bey of Algiers.

e ZEB is the next province; and it is remarkable, that Procopius distinguishes it by the same <sup>12th. province</sup> appellation. On the south it is inclosed by the great road leading from Tecort to Querquelen; <sup>of Zeb.</sup> on the north, by the mountains of Bugie; on the east, by the province of Biledulgerid Proper; and on the west, by the deserts of Mazila. Leo Africanus reckons five fine cities, besides towns and large villages innumerable, in this province. The city of Biscare, situated in thirty degrees ten minutes north latitude, and thirty-four degrees of longitude, is a place of great antiquity, built by the Romans, and destroyed by the Arabs, who afterwards rebuilt it. At present it is but indifferently peopled; but the inhabitants are in general a civil, good natured people; tho' their houses are of all others the most inhospitable, on account of the swarms of scorpions, vipers, and poisonous reptiles, which crawl about in every corner. Hence

f it is that the inhabitants desert the city in the summer, when these noxious animals chiefly prevail, retire into the country, and seldom return till the approaching cold has cleared their houses of these hissing guests.

ABOUT five leagues from Biscare stands Borgie, a town much better peopled, and the residence of a great number of merchants, mechanics, and labourers of all kinds.

NOT far from hence stands Nesta, a town separated into three divisions by stone walls, and each inhabited by a people of different manners and customs from any of the others, notwithstanding the continual intercourse among them. They are all strictly prohibited to intermarry; and if any man leaves his own division to settle in one of the others, he and his posterity are outlawed. In Nesta is a fortress, the structure of which shews it to be of Roman workmanship:

g as to the inhabitants, they are covetous, thievish in their disposition, and intolerably insolent to strangers, whom they insult and oppress by every method in their power.

THE last province, according to this distribution, is that of Biledulgerid Proper, which we have described so fully as affords no room for addition; La Croix's account being taken intirely from

from the authors we then cited, and so implicitly, that he has not corrected one of the numberless <sup>a</sup> errors with which they abound, tho' he has not failed to superadd egregious blunders of his own. Thus the reader has had a complete view of the coast, from the gulph of Benin to the borders of Barbary; the manners, customs, and religion of the inhabitants; the produce of the countries; their trade with the Europeans, and every other particular regarding that vast tract, which we imagined could contribute either to his instruction or amusement. It was necessary to be extremely minute in the topography, by reason of the imperfection of all our charts; and the same may be said of the whole history of this part of Africa, which has unfortunately been treated by writers the most illiterate, immethodical, credulous, and false, of any we have hitherto had occasion to peruse. We shall make no other apology for the labour with which we have endeavoured to characterize the manners of such a variety of <sup>b</sup> different nations, since we are sensible that every discerning reader will think this method infinitely preferable to the best written general history, in which a thousand interesting curious particulars must necessarily be omitted.

B O O K XXII.

C H A P. I.

The modern history of Barbary ; containing a general account of that vast tract of land ; its several nations, governments, wars, and changes, previous to its establishment into the various kingdoms and republics of Morocco, Fez, Algiers, Tunis, and Tripoli, in which they have continued to this present time.

- <sup>a</sup> WE have, by this time, finished our stated progress around the eastern, southern, <sup>A general account of Barbary.</sup> and western coasts of this vast African peninsula <sup>a</sup>, and given the best account we could procure, not only of the several kingdoms and states situate upon them, but likewise of the various inland countries, empires, and nations, contiguous to them, as far as our best modern authors and travellers have been able to penetrate into, or receive any certain intelligence about them. Our next task, of course, leads us through the only remaining northern tract, commonly known by the general name of Barbary, and, by reason of its limits, and more ample commerce with Europe, the part best known to us of any we have hitherto had occasion to speak of, and, on that account, as well as its advantageous situation along the Mediterranean sea, and its rich and fertile soil, highly coveted, and by <sup>Situation, boundaries, and extent of coast.</sup> turns possessed, by the Romans, Greeks, Saracens, Vandals, Arabs, Moors, and Turks, not to mention the various attempts which the Spaniards, Portuguese, and other European nations, have made upon, and their several settlements in some convenient parts of, this extensive coast, which stretches itself in length from east to west, that is, from the southernmost limits of Egypt to the Streights of Gibraltar, full 35 degrees of longitude, and from thence to Santa Cruz, the utmost western verge of it, about six more, in all 41 degrees ; and is there bounded on the north by the Atlantic ocean, as it is within by the Mediterranean sea. The whole extent of the Barbary coast is computed to amount to above 757 German leagues. On the south, indeed, it is confined within much narrower bounds, stretching itself no farther than from the 27th to the 35th degree and a half of latitude, or about 128 German miles <sup>Fertility.</sup> <sup>b</sup> ; but it must be remembered, that it is by far the richest and most fertile part of that whole tract ; all that lies beyond it, as well as a considerable part of it on the south, being nothing else, for the most part, but sandy and barren deserts ; but chiefly the continued ridge of the great Atlas, intersected by sandy deserts, and inhabited by wild and other Arabs, some of whom live, as we have elsewhere observed *, altogether upon plunder, and others are tributary to the Algerines, Tunisians, &c. but all of them are such enemies to husbandry, that a country must be bad to the highest degree, if they do not, in a short time, leave it worse than they found it.

- We shall not here relate what we have said of its antient state, in a former part of this work, but refer our readers to it, as much of it relates to the knowledge which the Romans and other antient nations had of it, the various names, limits, nations, &c. they gave to it, commerce <sup>d</sup> they drove with it, and their several conquests of it, all which have been sufficiently displayed in the volumes quoted in the margin <sup>c</sup>. We here chiefly confine ourselves to that part of its history from the time of their shaking off the yoke of the Roman and Greek emperors, and resuming their liberty under their own natural, or at least African, princes, down to that of their forming themselves into that variety of kingdoms in which we now find them, the principal of which are those of Morocco, Fez, Algiers, Tunis, and Tripoli ; for it must be here observed, that those of Telenfin, or Tremecen, have been since incorporated with that of Algiers; and that of Barca, or Barce, hath been since reduced to a dependence on that of Tripoli.

According to this division, therefore, and route we have hitherto followed round the whole African coasts, Barbary begins on the west of the famed Mount Atlas, called by the Arabs Ayduacal, or Al Duacal, and incloses the antient kingdoms of Suez and Dela, now provinces of Morocco; thence steering north-eastward, along the Atlantic coast, to the pillars of Hercules at Cape Finister, through the Streights of Gibraltar, and so on, by an eastern course, along the Mediterranean coast, one comes at length to the city of Alexandria, which is the southern boundary of Egypt, and where it joins to this of Barbary. Both coasts, whether that which is watered by the Atlantic ocean, or by the Mediterranean, are most fertile in corn and pasture; the former lying towards, and being watered by a multitude of small and large rivers which come down from, the great Atlas, and empty themselves into the ocean; the other extends itself by and along the declivity of a vast ridge of mountains, some of them of a considerable height, and spreading themselves in depth above 40 leagues into the inland, all of them watered by a multitude of rivers, which, after a great number of long and various windings, some of them several hundreds of leagues, through a vast variety of pleasant and fertile vallies, discharge themselves into the Mediterranean. We may add, that the temperature of its climate, being all the way situate under the temperate zone, adds not a little to its fecundity; and of course, if not altogether, yet in a great measure, frees it from the ill effects of the extremes of blasting cold and burning heat, felt by the other two. If in any thing it comes nearer to either, it is to the former; and it may be truly affirmed of both the coasts and mountains along the Mediterranean, that they partake more of the extreme coldness of the one than of the heat of the other. They have great quantities of snow in the winter, and the tops of some of their mountains are quite covered with it, especially the great Atlas, all the year round.

climate and seasons.

THEIR winter, which begins about the middle of October, proves frequently very severe, and is attended with long and nipping frosts<sup>d</sup>. The rains commonly begin about the end of the month, and continue till the end of January, and often beyond it; with this difference, nevertheless, that how severe soever the weather may be in the morning, the afternoons are commonly warm enough to dispense with a fire. In February it becomes milder, and the weather changes usually three or four times in a day. In March the west and north winds begin to blow powerfully, gradually unlock the earth, and spread universal life and verdure, which is completed by the next month. During the whole spring season, which begins about the latter end of February, the weather continues for the most part serene and pleasant, except from the latter end of April to that of May, when the kind refreshing showers begin to fall in great plenty, which, warmed by the moderate rays of the sun, bring every product of the earth to a gradual maturity; insomuch that, by the latter end of May, they begin to gather ripe figs and cherries, in Tunis, Algiers, and some parts of Morocco; by the middle of July their apples, pears, and plums, are in their full maturity, and the gathering of grapes and other later fruits is completed by the latter end of September, which are commonly more or less copious according to the quantity of rain they have had from the 25th of April to the 25th of May; on which account they style this rain by the title of Naisan, or water lent from heaven, and lay in a provision of it in vessels for their future use<sup>e</sup>.

Spring season.

Summer excessive hot.

THE summer begins, according to their reckoning, on the 28th of May, and lasts till the 26th of August; during which the heats are excessive and dangerous, especially if they have great rains in June and July; at which time the atmosphere becomes inflamed to such a degree, as to cause malignant fevers, and other dangerous diseases of the pestilential kind, which carry off myriads of people, for want of proper caution in preventing, or proper skill and remedies to cure them (A).

(A) This, as we have formerly had occasion to observe, is chiefly owing to a religious, though senseless prejudice, not only common amongst, but deeply rooted in, the far greater part of the Mohammedans, that all such sublunary disasters are preordained, by an unerring and unalterable decree of the Divine Providence; so that all precautions either to prevent or avoid, and every kind of remedy used against them, are not only fruitless but impious (1). It must be owned, however, that this stupid notion hath been in some measure exploded among the more sensible part of the inhabitants of this coast, by their vicinity to Europe, and frequent commerce with, as well as the example of, such Christians as were conversant with them; but as to the rest, they continue still so fixed in it, that they deem it a most damnable impiety to go a step out of their way to avoid a plague, or any other disastrous calamity, or to use any means or remedy against them; and this is the cause why epidemic diseases make such dreadful havock amongst them.

(1) See before, vol. vi. p. 3, (B). Maillet, Greenhill, Perry, & al. plur.

a THEIR autumn begins on the 27th of August, and ends on the 16th of November; and Autumn from the first of these one begins to feel a sensible diminution of the heat. The winter begins on the 17th of November, and ends on the 16th of February; on which month they begin to plow and sow their low lands, but set about that work on the high lands and mountainous parts a month sooner. They reckon the year to have 40 days of excessive cold, and as many Length of heat and cold. of excessive hot weater; the former begins on or about the 12th of December, and the latter on or about the 12th of June. Their two equinoxes begin with them on the 16th of March and September, according to which they regulate all their matters relating to agriculture and navigation; and they have a great number of men among them, who are very expert in directing and establishing settled rules for both, though they can neither write nor read.

b THE people of Barbary reckon three sorts of winds which are extremely dangerous and detrimental to them; viz. the east, south-east, and south, and all of them most so in the months of May and June, in which they seldom fail of blasting all the fruits, and burning up every kind of growing grain; to which the fogs and mists, which usually reign at such times greatly contribute. They are moreover greatly exposed during the latter end of their autumn, their whole winter, and the beginning of the spring, to violent rains, snow, hail, thunders, and lightnings, and are frequently damaged by them.

As for those who inhabit the higher lands, especially along the ridge of mountains of the great Atlas, they reckon but two seasons in the year; viz. the winter and the summer; the former whereof lasts from October to April, during which there fall such vast quantities of snow, But two seasons on Mount Atlas. but mostly in the night, that they are forced every morning to remove it with their shovels from their doors, before they can get a free passage out of them. From April to September is their summer, which, in the vallies, is commonly excessive hot, but on the higher grounds more temperate and pleasant, and, on the tops, not warm enough to melt away the winter snow, which is there to be seen from one end of the year to the other, as it is on the Alps, Pyrenees, and other more northern regions; though both corn and barley grow under it in many parts of that ridge, and put forth their stems through it, and rise up to the eye as fast as the snow melts away. The grain, however, especially the barley, we are told, is apt to contract a sourish taste by it; which, being the chief food of their horses, sets their teeth on-edge, so that they eat it with great difficulty, unless it be mixed with some alkalious alloy. Its product.

d Thus much may serve for a general view of the climate, seasons, and produce of this country, which admits but of a small difference, and extends itself, from end to end, though in a kind of parallel, through the heart of the temperate zone. As to what relates to its most considerable rivers, mountains, lakes, and other such particulars, they will be better seen in the description of the respective kingdoms and provinces to which they belong.

BARBARY is chiefly inhabited by three sorts of people; viz. Moors, or Maures, who are the original natives; the Arabs, who have over-run this country, as we have seen them do in many other parts of Africa; and the Turks, who have since made themselves masters of some of the best provinces of it, and the several kingdoms of Tripoli, Tunis, and Algiers, tho' under a kind of tribute to, or dependence on, the Othman Porte; besides a great variety of foreign nations, Christians, Jews, and others, who live intermixed amongst them; not to mention a most shameful, as well as innumerable, multitude of renegadoes, who, either through mere avarice, or to free themselves from slavery, have renounced their faith, and become the most grievous nuisance to Christianity; and, though hated and abhorred by those who encourage their apostacy, are yet suffered to live and thrive amongst them, and to be employed not only in the most profitable branches of trade and commerce, but in some of the highest posts in the army, navy, and state, for the sake of the service they do to it, by the ill offices and cruelties they affect to do, above all others, to all Christians in general, and frequently to those of their own nation, as will be more evidently seen in the sequel of this chapter.

f WITH respect to the three nations above-mentioned, which chiefly inhabit this Barbary coast, we have had occasion to speak of them in a former volume <sup>a</sup>, under the name of Africans, and seen what a wretched character they bear among other nations, and even amongst those of their own: and we are fully persuaded that our readers have not met, thro' the whole course of this African history, with any thing that hath not helped to confirm rather than extenuate the justness of it to them. Nor will these we are now upon be found to deserve a more favourable one, seeing if they differ in any thing from the rest, it is only in being, in all respects, still worse than they, and out-doing them by many degrees in laziness, ignorance, superstition, thieving, lying, cheating, treachery, cowardice, lewdness of all, even the most infamous, kinds, and every sort of baseness and vice, ever since they fell under the tyrannic government of the Sharifs of Morocco; all which will be more fully seen in the subsequent history of those kingdoms and states, by whom they have been depressed to the lowest degree of misery and wretched servitude, beyond what any other Moors ever underwent in any other parts of Africa (B).

The abject condition of its antient inhabitants.

It cannot but be owned, however, that the cruel oppression they suffer under their several tyrannic governments, hath greatly contributed to their degeneracy, and that one can hardly imagine a more abject and miserable condition than theirs is, crushed, on the one hand, with a heavy load of taxes, and treated with the utmost cruelty by their insulting masters; and, on the other, exposed to the continual inroads of the plundering Arabs, who, on such occasions, never fail of stripping them of the small pittance they are able to lay up; and they dare not provide more than barely serves them the year round, lest a greater abundance should either induce those freebooters to visit them the oftener, or their Moorish landlords to raise their rents upon them; and if they chance to have any superfluity, through an unexpected good crop, and take ever so great care to conceal it, by burying it under ground, or stowing it in chests or caverns, they are in no less danger of being bastinadoed, and even tortured by both, to oblige them to discover it; so that, upon the whole, in order to avoid the cruel oppressions of the one, and the insults and ravages of the other, they are content to buy their safety and ease, at the expence of the most pinching and contemptible penury, hunger, and indigence; and how satisfied they live under all these hardships may be easily judged, by what hath been said in the foregoing note <sup>1</sup>.

It will not be improper, however, to apprize our readers, that what we have already said of this wretched people relates chiefly to the Moors who live at large in the country, where very few follow any trade or manufacture, but live altogether upon their agriculture and breeding of cattle, like one class of the Arabs. As to those who live in sea-ports along the coast, they are allowed to follow variety of handicraft trades and manufactures, and even to carry on some commerce by land and sea, and, of course, live a little better, and more creditably, tho' no less oppressed with taxes and other exactions, and, if any thing, more cruelly treated and insulted by their lordly masters, of whom they stand in the greatest awe and dread; the least oversight in point of respect to the meanest soldier or scoundrel officer in the government, being deemed crime enough to procure them a sound beating, if poor, or a heavy mulct, if otherwise <sup>2</sup>.

The Arabs in Barbary described.

THE second sort of inhabitants in Barbary is that of the Arabs; but these we have elsewhere so fully described, according to their three distinct classes, and different ways of life <sup>1</sup>, that we shall have the less to say now concerning them. They are here the same as we have seen them in other parts of Africa, follow the three same ways of living, are governed by their own despotic Cheyks, and all of them, except those of the wandering kind, and those who live under the dominion of the emperors of Morocco and Fez (of whom we shall speak more largely in a subsequent chapter), in some sort tributary to the Turks, ever since they have made themselves masters of the remainder of the Barbary coast, and on that condition only permit them to live among them; and if there be any difference between these and those who are dispersed in other parts, it is this, by being under more severe and tyrannic governments, they are more grievously oppressed, and oftener punished with military execution, either for non-payment of tribute, or even for running too far in arrear; which often obliges

(B) It will not, however, be displeasing to our readers, if, in spite of this strange degeneracy amongst them, and amidst their extreme poverty and contempt, we can, in justice to them, mention one remarkable virtue universally reigning amongst them, and no less conspicuous in the one than in the other sex, and that in a most surprising degree; namely, that of an unparalleled patience under all the various branches of their wretchedness and thralldom, such as the most pinching hunger and want, the oppression and most inhuman treatment of their insolent masters, and innumerable other hardships their abject condition daily exposes them to. And for this we need not seek for more pregnant and unquestionable vouchers than the two following; viz.

1. The peace and contentment that reign in every family, amidst all those great and shocking difficulties they labour under, the men under the yoke of tyrannic government, and the women under the no less galling one of their husbands, and the servile drudgery they are forced to submit to. And, proof, that their excessive oppression and misery hath not, as yet, driven them to coin or adopt into their language any phrases or expressions of impatience, discontent, murmuring, or repining at their unhappy condition, much less of curses and imprecations against the authors of it; and which, though nothing is more commonly heard to come out of the mouths of renegadoes and profligate christian slaves, seldom fail of meeting some severe rebukes, and sincere marks of dislike and abhorrence.

2dly, And which we think by far the more cogent

To all this we may add, that to see a circle of them sitting at the doors of their poor cots, with empty bellies and naked bodies, some either smoking or telling merry tales, others singing or dancing, and, when weary, lying supinely on the ground, one would hardly fail of deeming them a happy and contented, tho' lazy, people. And from this easy disposition results another kind of virtue; that they seldom quarrel or fight amongst themselves; or if they do, they use no other weapon than the fist; so that there are few, if any, homicides to be seen amongst them; and the war lasteth no longer than the heat of the blood, and ends as soon as it is cooled (1).

a them to abandon their habitations, and seek for new ones among the most rocky and inaccessible mountains, where they are sure the Turkish forces cannot come at them. This, however, is to be understood only of those who live in the country, and along the ridge of Mount Atlas; but, as we have observed elsewhere, there is another and more civilized sort of them, who are, like the Moors, settled in some of the towns and villages, and apply themselves to agriculture, and especially in breeding that fine and so much esteemed race of horses, known to us by the name of Barbs, for which their country is famed all over Europe and the eastern parts, and of which we have given an account in a former volume <sup>m</sup>.

As for the wild or wandering Arabs, who range at large along the great Atlas and other parts of Barbary, they are not only as great a nuisance as in other parts of Africa, but, in <sup>Their dreadful</sup> some respects, a more dangerous one, being commonly more warlike, bold, and even desperate, in all their plundering excursions, especially in their attempts on the large and rich caravans, which go from Morocco into Egypt, in which they spare none that oppose them, but slay and butcher, and carry off all that come in their way, of which we shall have occasion to give some pregnant instances <sup>plunderings</sup> <sup>n</sup>; and as these are some of the most advantageous excursions, so are they the more diligent in watching for them, and most desperate in attacking them.

THE Arabs of each class are commonly much given to the study of astronomy and astrology, to both which their pastoral life, and a sort of husbandry, not only incline them, but give them time and leisure to apply themselves to it; and the natural superstition of the whole race makes them the most fond of the latter. They neither sow, reap, plant, travel, buy or sell, or undertake any expedition or matter, without previously consulting the stars, or, in other words, their Almanacks (C), or some of the makers of them, whether they be Mohammedans or Idolaters.

THE third and last sort of inhabitants of Barbary are the Turks; and these are not only of much later date, and by far the fewest in number, as we shall see in the sequel of this history, but one may add by far the worst, and in all respects, except their surprising and uncontrouled power and sway, the most contemptible of all the three, being originally no better than a wretched crew of indigent, tattered, and famished, loose, idle, and thievish fellows, enlisted in and about Constantinople, and sent from thence thither once in three years, to recruit the soldiery, and who, having once been furnished with a gun, sword, and other martial furniture, learned their exercise, and been initiated into some regiment, from that time have a vote and share in the government, and from thence are raised by degrees from one post to another, even to that of admiral, vazir, &c. and thence to the Beyric. In all which, even from the very lowest, they behave with the most insupportable insolence and tyranny over their Moorish vassals, who, by a long series and variety of oppressions, are become such dastards, that the wealthiest of them tremble at the sight of a Turkish common soldier. And it cannot be imagined that any thing else than such a height of insolence and tyranny, could have enabled such a small number of Turkish soldiers as are in the three kingdoms of Algiers, Tunis, and Tripoli, to hold such a multitude of Moors and Arabs under so long and severe a subjection. How they raised themselves to that extraordinary height of power will be best seen in the history of each of those kingdoms; in the mean time, it will not be amiss to say a word or two concerning the origin of the name of Barbary, concerning which our authors <sup>The Turks in</sup> greatly vary in their conjectures, for little else but conjecture can be offered about it. Some will have it, that the Romans, after they had conquered that large tract, gave it that name, in contempt and dislike of the rude and barbarous manners of the natives, as they commonly did to those nations whom they subdued in Gaul, and several parts of Europe, all which they generally dignified with the name of Barbaro. Marmol, on the contrary, rejecting that disgraceful etymology, will have it to be derived from the Arabic word Berber, a name which the Arabs gave to the antient inhabitants, and which they still retain to this day in many parts of <sup>Barbary described.</sup> <sup>Their tyranny over the Moors.</sup> <sup>Barbary, why so called.</sup>

(C) As it is from them, and their vicinity to Europe, that this art, no less useful in one sense, than stupid and ridiculous in another, hath passed over to us, and spread itself through every part of it, so those astronomical compositions have still every-where retained not only their old Arabic name of Almanack, or Al Manack, or The Diary, but have been, like theirs, for a long while, and are still, among many European nations, interspersed with a great number and variety of astrological rules for planting, sowing, bleeding, purging, &c. down to the paring of the hair and nails, and represented, for the sake of those that could not read, in such plain hieroglyphics, or characters, as the most ignorant would easily understand. And we shall not need to wonder that such superstitious stuff should be so regarded by those Arabs, if we consider with what extraordinary care and caution such yearly productions are ushered into the world amongst the most polite nations of the east, especially in China, where they are made a particular branch of their monarch's and his council's attention; and the compilers of them are as liable to be fined or punished for any defect or oversight in the astrological as in the astronomical branch (3).

this tract, especially along the long ridge of the great Atlas, where they are very numerous *; a which name those new invaders gave them on account of the barrenness of their country †.

MUCH the same thing is affirmed by Leo Africanus, a half native of that country, who tells us, that it was given to it by the Arabs, on account of their strange language, which appeared to them inarticulate, and more like a murmur, or grumbling of some dumb animals, from their Arabic word Barbar, which signifies a murmuring sound or noise °; but at the same time tells us, that others derive its etymon from the single word Bar twice repeated, which signifies a desert, such as it was for the most part, till the Arabs poured their numerous herds into it; so that the fugitive king Ifrik, from whom the whole African continent is pretended to have received its name p, being closely pursued by his enemies in his flight out of Arabia Felix, and in great perplexity which way to steer his course, some of his retinue, who knew the country, cried out to him, Bar, Bar, that is, To the desert, To the desert. So that, upon the whole, its name seems rather derived from its barrenness of inhabitants, than their barrenness of manners; though it is since become one of the most fertile of the former, and barren and destitute of the latter, of any belonging to that large continent, if we except the Caffers, Giagas, and some other truly barbarous nations in the heart of it, of whom we have given an account in some former chapters q; the whole Barbary coast having been little better for these few last centuries, than a continual nest of the most destructive vermin, the most infamous pirates, as will be further seen in the sequel; though in other respects so happy in its soil, situation, climate, the number and extent of its fertile plains, multitude of its rivers, richness of its meadows and pasture grounds, and variety of cattle, corn, barley, and other grain, and products; the largeness of its woods and forests, and vast plenty and variety of game, and other considerable advantages it naturally enjoys, that, were it not for the tyranny and iniquity of its several governments, all equally destructive of every kind of industry and useful improvement, it might easily be rendered one of the happiest and most fruitful countries not only in all Africa, but perhaps in the whole world: even that part of this Barbary coast which is called Baris, and the little Atlas ends, though rather too cold to produce any great quantity of corn, yet is so fertile in barley, as to be more than sufficient to supply its numerous inhabitants, though it be in a great measure their chief food, as well as that of their horses and camels.

BESIDES the Turks above-mentioned, who belong to the soldiery, and have a share in the government, there are multitudes of others who come thither to seek a livelihood, invited thither by the favour of the government, and the preference shewn to them above the Arab and Moors. But these, like the rest, are too proud to apply themselves either to husbandry or any laudable and useful trades, but follow either the corsair or piratic business, as the most suitable to their high conceit of themselves, as well as the most profitable to them, being intitled to better pay, fare, and treatment, than the natives, who, whether on board or at land, are scarcely used one degree better than the common galley-slaves, excepting their fetters.

THE Barbary Turks do every-where make a high profession of Mohammedism, but in their practice are the most loose and negligent observers of its precepts, and indulge themselves in so many things that are forbidden by it, that, excepting the great and laudable regard they pay to the name of God, and their severity in punishing every blasphemous expression, oaths, and curses, their whole religion seems little else than a mere outside. They allow themselves to drink wine, and the eating of sundry kinds of forbidden meats; are extremely remiss in their lents and other fasts; careless in their ablutions, and addicted to a multitude of superstitions, and a dissolution of manners, which are abhorred by all true Mohammedans; though, in other cases of less importance, they endeavour to appear more conformable to them. For this reason, whenever they indulge themselves in a debauch, as they frequently do, it is commonly with the greatest secrecy, and in a private apartment, where they shut themselves up with their own intimates, neither women nor children being either admitted or acquainted with it; and there they will spend a whole day and a night in smoking, drinking, and carousing, without restraint.

THEY allow themselves, as all other Mohammedans, a plurality of wives, and marry and treat them much in the same manner, and usually prefer one above the rest, who is, on that account, looked upon as the wife, and hath a kind of superiority over all the rest. The misfortune is, that, like the generality of the Turks, not content with such a variety of women, they are equally guilty of a shameful and unnatural vice, which modesty forbids even the mention of. But the truth is, that their priests, marabouts, and fantons, are here much more remiss, if not for the most part a gang of cheats, who readily agree with, and assist at, all such irregularities, which they not only know themselves addicted to, but the opposing of a which would most probably produce no other effect than to put an effectual stop to their frequent applications and charitable returns, without suppressing in the least the common evil.

THE Moors, or natives, are likewise, for the most part, Mohammedans, there being but few of them (and those only such as are styled shepherds, and follow pasturage in the vallies of the great Atlas, and some other parts of the lesser one; in Nubia, Lybia, and Biledulgerid, and other provinces of Barbary, and who still retain their old heathenish superstitions) who have not been either induced or forced to embrace Mohammedism, since their becoming subject to the Turks, and, to their great credit, if we may depend upon the generality of African writers, are much stricter professors and observers of every branch of it, than the natural Turks; though whoever considers their natural character, and their wretched state and oppression, will find reason to doubt whether their exactness be not rather owing to the dread they stand in of their tyrannic masters, than to any zeal or conviction they can have in favour of such a religion; which having so fully described, and amply exploded, as well as the pretended merit of its author, at the very entrance of this Modern History<sup>r</sup>, we shall have the less need to add any thing farther on that subject; much less would our readers care to be led through that endless field of errors, absurdities, and strange superstitions, which have been forced into it, not only by the many visionary commentators and expositors on the Koran, and other Mohammedan legends, but insensibly crept into it, or been adopted in every country and nation where it hath been established, and no-where in greater number, or of a more extravagant nature, than in this of Barbary, especially among the corsairs, and the whole piratical crew, among whom no charm or magic spell, no expedient, though ever so senseless, monstrous, and seemingly diabolical, can be invented, that they will not have recourse to, preferably to any of a more rational nature and tried efficacy, whether in fights, storms, or other emergencies, attending their hazardous profession<sup>s</sup>.

NEITHER are their soldiery, civil officers, and mercantile part, from those of the lowest to the highest rank, less addicted to the same superstitious confidence in this kind of recourse to their marabouts and other pretended conjurers; the former of whom will think himself safer under their piece of parchment wrapped up about his turban, and scratched over with some scraps out of the Koran, than under complete armour, or at the head of a well-disciplined army. Another will rather trust to an astrological scheme, framed by some artist in that way, than to the wisest counsel and best calculated measures; and a third will deem an amulet from some of those pretenders to the magic art, of surer efficacy towards the prevention or curing the most dangerous distemper, than the best prescriptions of a skilful physician, or the virtue of the most experienced medicines. The same infatuation runs through the whole mercantile class, and every kind of handicraftsmen, even to the meanest concerns of life; and there is no sickness or ill-luck to be avoided, or good to be expected, without being previously provided with a suitable charm and counter-charm against all events (D). All which we thought not unworthy our mentioning here; as best accounting for the many and strange revolutions and disasters with which the subsequent history of those republican governments, as well as that most arbitrary one under the Sharifs of Morocco, is pregnant; and the extreme misery and oppression which the unhappy subjects of both have groaned under, even since they shook off their heavy yoke. But before we come in course to speak of these several kingdoms, it will be very requisite that we give our readers an account of the various governments which preceded them, as well as of the nations or tribes which held the several reins of them, in order to shew by what means and degrees they coalesced at length into their present form; and that will be best seen in the following section. In the mean time, we shall beg leave to close up this general account of Barbary with one observation from what hath been hitherto said concerning it (for as to what farther relates to its laws, customs, trade, commerce, navi-

(D) To these we might have added others of their superstitions, and of a more impious and diabolical nature, to which not only the natives of Barbary, but all the Africans in general, are addicted to such a degree, that neither Mohammedism here, nor Christianity in Kongo and other parts where it hath been planted, could ever eradicate them out of their minds, or abolish the practice of them (6).

These consist chiefly in offering of beasts, fowls, and human victims, to demons, or, as they deem them, the souls of the dead, since become inferior deities, and either of a beneficent or malevolent nature, according as they are glutted with a greater or lesser quantity of these, and consulting them on all emergencies, and about matters of importance. And there are still greater numbers of these diabolical ministers and pretended conjurers, who keep up that bloody practice for gain, in several parts of Barbary, though at a great distance from large towns, and dispersed among the deserts and most inhospitable mountains, woods, and caves, where they perform their infernal rites, and the people resort to consult them. But as those, whether Moors, Turks, or Arabs, who are infatuated enough to have recourse to them, are yet obliged to do it with all possible secrecy, for fear of the severe punishments which the government inflicts on such offenders, and few instances of such ever coming to light, we shall say no more on so distasteful a subject.

gation, and other like particulars, concerning each of them, they will be more properly shewn a in the history of each respective kingdom), namely, that the whole tract of it, from one end to the other, is so excellently situated for navigation and commerce, so fertile of every necessary of life in its variety of soils and climates, so rich in its mines of gold, silver, and other metals and minerals, healthy and populous, the women so fecund, and the men so robust, sprightly, and long-lived, as to preserve their vigour beyond the 60th or even 70th year, and, if rightly trained up to it, stout and warlike, that it might easily be able to contend for wealth, opulence, and every other natural advantage, and might defy the whole united force either of Europe or Asia to reduce it, were its inhabitants as industrious as they are indolent and knavish; and were the several nations that inhabit it, or the several powers to which it is subjected, as united in one common interest, as they are opposite to and destructive of each other's. All which will still more plainly appear by the figure they have made under those several dynasties, which we are going to speak of in the following section. b

S E C T. II.

The history of Barbary under the several dynasties of the Almoravides, Almohedes, Benimerini, &c. down to the reigns of the Sbarifs, and their establishment in Morocco.

Techifien's reign and conquests.

WE have already hinted the revolt which the insolence and tyranny of the Arabs caused c in these parts, under the conduct of the brave Techifien, or Texefien, of the Zinbaghian tribes, who, by the help of his marabouts, gathered up a most powerful army of malecontents, in the southern provinces of Numidia and Lybia, on which account they were nicknamed Marabites and Almoravides <sup>a</sup>. This was a favourable juncture; the Khalif Kayem's forces being then otherwise taken up in quelling other revolts in Syria, Mesopotamia, &c. and the Arabs in Spain engaged in the most bloody wars. He had accordingly all the success he could wish for against the Arabian Cheyks, and gained so many signal victories over them, that he effectually drove them not only out of those two provinces, but out of all the western parts, and the whole province of Tingitania, now the empire of Morocco, and reduced all that vast tract under his dominion before his death <sup>b</sup>.

As succeeded by his son.

TECHIFIEN was succeeded by his son Yusef, or Joseph, a prince no less brave and successful, d than famous for his noble exploits. From the beginning of his reign he laid the foundation of the city of Morocco, as deeming that of Achmed, or Agmed, his father's late residence, not grand and spacious enough for the metropolis of his future empire. Whilst that was building, he sent some of his chief marabouts on an embassy to Tremecen, or Tremessin, which province was then chiefly inhabited by a branch of the Zeneti, who were of the ichismatic sect called Kemin, or Quemin, who had made themselves masters of that whole country, and were become by that time very powerful and insolent, with a design to reduce them to what he called the true faith. But these wretches, despising his offers and remonstrances, assembled themselves at the city of Amasf, or Amfa, the capital of it, and murdered his ambassadors and other e marabouts, and immediately raised an army of fifty thousand men to invade his dominions, who accordingly were ordered to march with all possible dispatch, before he could have time to oppose them, and drive him out of his kingdom.

His conquests.

YUSEF no soon heard of their inhuman treatment of his ambassadors, and their march against him, than, fired with a just resentment against these traitors and murderers, he resolved to be before-hand with them; and, having speedily mustered up his army, led it, by long marches, into their country, and crossing the river Ommirabi, put all to fire and sword where-ever he came; whilst the Zeneti, finding him too strong for them, instead of opposing his progress, abandoned their country, and retired with their prince, with what speed they could, towards Fez, in hopes of receiving some succour from thence. But they found in the Fezzans as bad f an enemy as in the Almoravides; and whilst the latter was burning every town and place he came to, and slaughtering men, women, and children, that were left behind, the former marched out against them in the same hostile manner, as against invaders, rebels, and traitors; and meeting with them near the river Burregreg, incumbered with their families and baggage, and ready to expire with hunger and weariness, fell unmercifully upon them, and cut them all in pieces, except a small number of them, who, attempting to save themselves by swimming over that river, were mostly carried away by the current; and some others, who, in their flight, perished by their fall from the high adjacent rocks <sup>c</sup>. Such was the fatal end of those proud invaders and murderers, of whom near a million of men, women, and children, are a computed to have been cut off by both sides; whilst Yusef reduced their whole country into a mere desert, which was, however, quickly re-peopled by a numerous colony of Fezzans, who settled themselves there, under the protection and vassalage of their reigning kings.

YUSEF led his victorious forces back to Morocco; but was not long there before he declared war against those two princes, and entered the Fezzan dominions at the head of a powerful army; and having defeated their forces near mount Homegui, he made himself master, in a very little while, of all their dominions, forced the Fezzans at Tremecen to become his vassals and tributaries, and enlarged his conquests all along the Mediterranean, reduced the kingdom of Tremecen, drove the successors of Abu'l Habex, who had reigned in Kayrwan, out of Bugeia, but restored them soon after to their ancient dominions, as being Africans of the same tribe with himself, and who held them afterwards during the whole time of the Almoravides government. In this excursion he likewise reduced the kings of Fez and Tunis to become vassals and tributaries to him; and, after all his successes, returned victorious to Morocco, where, after his father's example, he took upon him the title of Emir Hamunim, or Emir Al Mume-nin<sup>d</sup>. His martial and ambitious temper did not permit him to continue long in quiet there, before he resumed it in such a manner as struck a general terror among the Arabian Cheyks, who refused to own themselves his vassals and pay tribute to him; among whom he waged such a bloody war, that neither the Libyan nor Numidian deserts, mountains, nor ridges of the most craggy rocks, could shelter them from his arms. He attacked them in such of their retreats, castles, and fortresses, as were, till then, deemed impregnable and inaccessible to any but those of that nation; and this to the great regret of the other Africans, who were no less annoyed by the ravages which his numerous forces committed in their march through their territories. Neither could he be prevailed on to discontinue his excursions against them, till he had reduced them, by fair or forcible means, to his subjection; by which time his metropolis being quite finished, he resolved to cross over into Spain, and take the advantage of its intestine wars, with which it was then miserably torn, to enlarge his conquests there.

THIS resolution, however, was not taken by him, till he had received such pressing invitations from thence, as did, in a great measure, assure him of success, and of his being joined by several Moorish princes there, who would be proud to fight under his victorious banner. He accordingly embarked, and crossed the straits of Gibraltar, full of these tempting prospects, and with a suitable force. He was, however, greatly disappointed in his expectations, though he signalized himself with his usual bravery, upon every occasion: but as these exploits of his are foreign to our present African history, we shall defer all further detail till we come to that of Spain, which will follow in due course, according to our plan, in some subsequent volume. All that we shall say further upon it is, that, after he had repulsed the Christians with great vigour, he had the mortification to see those Moorish princes, who had so warmly invited him over to them, become, all of a sudden, as cold and disaffected towards him. This did not hinder him, however, from pursuing his conquests; so that he reduced in that expedition the greatest part of the kingdoms of Murcia, Granada, Cordova, Jaen, and some few places in that of Valentia: after which he returned into Africa with his son, leaving those conquered dominions under the government of his nephew Mohammed, with a considerable part of his army.

He was no sooner arrived at his African kingdom, than he published a general Gazie, or religious war, through his dominions, and, with a fresh and numerous army, embarked at Ceuta for his Spanish conquests; and soon after rejoined his nephew Mohammed in Andalusia, where they put all to fire and sword<sup>e</sup>. We shall again refer our readers to the subsequent history of Spain for a further detail of the various successes of this expedition, from which he returned into Africa three years after.

His next descent was not till five years after, when he carried his arms thither with such success and speed, that he penetrated so far into Portugal as to reduce the city of Lisbon, and with it a great part of that kingdom; but lost the cities of Alguazir and Gibraltar, which he had taken before, but were now retaken from him by the king of Seville, Alphonso's brother-in-law. In the mean time, Alphonso having equipped a powerful fleet, sailed over with it to Africa; but meeting with that of Yusef, in his way to Barbary, a hot engagement soon followed, in which the former sunk ten galleys of the latter: after which he continued his course directly to Barbary. Here he received proposals from Yusef for a truce; but refused to consent to it, unless he submitted to become his tributary; which so exasperated the Almoravide monarch, that he swore ruin and destruction to Christianity. In pursuance of which vow, he prepared himself for a fresh descent, which he made into Spain, and landed, as usual, at Malaga, and led his army into the enemy's country with greater fury and resentment, and, in all likelihood, with less caution and conduct, than ever he had done before. The consequence of which was that famous battle,

Battle of the Seven Counts. since called the battle of the Seven Counts. For, being obliged to raise the siege of Toledo,<sup>a</sup> which he had invested, and to retire from the superior forces of Don Sanches, who was sent by his father to its relief, he found himself so closely pursued by that brave young prince, that he was obliged to give him battle; in which, though he had the good fortune to defeat and slay him, together with a number of other noble warriors, yet he lost so great a number of his own men, that he was obliged to return to Africa, where he died soon after, at his capital of Morocco, and was succeeded by his son Ali.<sup>f</sup>

Ali, the third king of Afric. 1110. This prince, less warlike than his father, upon his coming to the crown, instead of minding his Spanish conquests, employed his thoughts in erecting of several sumptuous buildings, and in particular the great mosk of Morocco, which will be described in the history of that empire, whilst Alphonso king of Arragon was daily recovering some considerable cities from him; neither could he be prevailed upon to pass over into Spain, till strongly pressed to it by the united instances of the Moorish princes, whom Alphonso greatly harrassed and distressed all that time; and when at length he was obliged to come to their assistance, he spent a whole campaign there, without performing any thing considerable. He was no less unsuccessful in his subsequent expeditions; in the last of which, though joined by the united strength of the Moorish chiefs, he was defeated and slain by king Alphonso, with the loss of 30,000 men, except a small number, who escaped and sailed over into Barbary, in the sixth year of his reign.<sup>g</sup>

Defeated and slain. 1115. He was succeeded by his son Al Abraham, vulgarly called Brabem, a prince altogether addicted to pleasure, and averse to martial exploits; who was no sooner declared successor to the throne, than he confirmed all the governors and chief officers of his eastern provinces of Barbary, Numidia, &c. in their posts: upon which they readily acknowledged him for their sovereign, with the title of Emir Al Moslemim, or Chief Commander of the Faithful; by which act, having secured the peace of his dominions on that side, and seeing all quiet at home, he gave himself no farther thought than that of pursuing his pleasures and extravagant debauches, which in time obliged him to load his subjects with such an intolerable weight of taxes, as produced a general complaint, and ended in that strange and fatal revolution, which at once transferred the supreme government from the tribe of the noble Almoravides to that upstart one, since called, from its obscure founder, Almohedi, or Al Mohedes, and of which we are now going to give an account, though it did not begin before the twenty-fifth year of his reign; from which the reader may judge how unworthily that monarch spent the former part of it, seeing there has nothing happened worthy to be recorded concerning him during that long period, if we except the unfortunate attempt which the Christians made on the city of Kayrwan, about the beginning of it; but which, though in some sense foreign to our present subject, yet, being both curious and interesting, we shall subjoin in the margin (A).

The rise of the Almohedes. THE author of this surprising change was a Berber, of the tribe of Muzamada, named Abd'allah, and a famed preacher among those of his tribe, who were seated along mount Atlas, but who, the better to succeed in his premeditated design, took upon him the name, or rather the title, of Mohdi, or Mohedi, and set up for head or leader of the orthodox, or Unitarians, who, by this time, were become so numerous by his preaching, and had swelled him to such a degree of insolence, as to dare even to exclaim against and bid defiance to the king; but he might easily have been suppressed, and the revolt nipped in embryo, had not Brabem been too much immersed in pleasures to regard it, and too confident to apprehend any ill consequences from such low sorry miscreants. He soon, however, found cause to

(A) By this time the Christians who, in their wars with Tunis, had made themselves masters of the city of Mohedia, the late residence of the Khalifs of Kayrwan, and, as we have elsewhere seen, built by one of them, with all the advantages of strength and beauty, were making frequent inroads from it into the adjacent countries, and sadly harrassed the Tunizens. A considerable reinforcement being landed from Italy at Mohedia, were likewise ravaging those coasts, when an Al Faki came to them, and offered to betray the city of Kayrwan to them, provided they bestowed the government of it upon him; to which they readily agreed; whereupon he put himself at their head, and marched towards the place; but had not proceeded above two days journey, before they came in sight of the Moorish army, ranged in order of battle, and ready to give them a warm reception, whom the Al Faki immediately joined, and fell upon the Christians with such fury, that 7000 of them were killed upon the spot, and the rest, with great difficulty, retired to Mohedia. The Moors pursued them thither, and laid siege to the place, but without success. However, the Al Faki being, by this serviceable stratagem against the Christians, become considerable among the Moors, turned his forces against the Almoravides; but being defeated by them, was taken in his flight by the Cheyk of Pizara, a relation of Brabem, who ordered his eyes to be plucked out, and himself to be thrown into a dungeon, where he died with misery.

It must be observed, that the Christians here mentioned, and which we stile Italians, are, as the Morocco historian tells us, called by the Arab writers Rumiss, from the capital of Rome; as they do the Spaniards Phosfos, from their kings; the Portuguese Chamoriss; the Greeks Nizaraans, or Kaisareans; and the French Franguis. And hence it is, perhaps, that no European writer before Marmol has mentioned this unfortunate expedition (1).

a alter his measures, when he became apprised of the ravages they committed in those western parts, under pretence of standing up for liberty, and how daily they increased in number and boldness under that pretence. He was at length prevailed upon, though late, to march against them, and, as unhappily for him, with a force by far too small to oppose them; so Brahem dr- that he was totally defeated at the very first engagement he had with them, and his army seated and put to flight, in which they were timely assisted by the intervening night. pursued.

ABD'ALLAH, in the mean time, seeing himself master of the field, failed not to take all precautions to shut up all the passes to prevent the king's regaining his capital, whilst he dispatched another part of his army thither to invest it in form, and a third, under the conduct of Abdolumen, to go in close pursuit of him. This last order was so punctually executed, that the unfortunate prince was at length constrained to refuge himself in the city of Fez. Here he had again the mortification of seeing the gates of it shut up against him, but opened soon after to receive his pursuers, whether out of dread of them, or hatred to him, on account of his predecessors having made Morocco the seat of the empire, we will not determine. In this extremity, he pitched upon the city of Auran, vulgarly Oran, for his last refuge, into which he was at first readily admitted; but did not enjoy that small respite long, before he saw the place invested by Abdolumen, vulgarly Abdulman, and threatened with fire and sword. Upon which the magistrates earnestly intreated him to seek for some other shelter, since they were in no condition to protect him against such a force. He accordingly set out on a dark night, with only a favourite wife on horseback behind him; but being discovered by the guards, and seeing no way left to avoid falling into their hands, he, in a His death; fit of despair, clapped spurs to his horse, and hurried him headlong, with himself and his wife, down a steep and rocky precipice, where they were all found, the next morning, dead and dashed in pieces. This was the fatal end of that unhappy prince, which put a final period to the empire of the Almoravides <sup>b</sup>.

THAT general, being apprised of Brahem's death, caused his head to be cut off, in order to have it carried in triumph to Morocco, and staid no longer in those parts than to levy the tribute in these provinces; which done, he traversed the kingdom of Tremecen, in his way to Morocco, where, upon his arrival, he found the traitor Abd'allah dead, and was soon after declared his successor by all the chiefs of that revolt, and proclaimed king of the Al Mohedes, proclaimed king of the Almohedes. under the title of Al Emir Al Mumin Abd'allah Mohammed Abd'al Mumen Ebn Abd'allah Ibni Ali; that is, Chief, or Emperor, of the true Believers, of the house of Mohammed Abd'al Mumen, the Son of Abd'allah, of the lineage of Ali (B).

BRAHEM had left a son behind him, named Isaac, an infant, whom, at his departure from that capital, he had committed to the care of proper governors. On the news of his father's death, they caused him to be proclaimed king, and obliged the inhabitants to swear allegiance to him; of which the new Emir was no sooner informed, than he began to batter the city with all his might; and finding it make a stout defence against him, swore, in a furious fit of resentment, that he would not abandon the siege till he had reduced the place, and caused it to be sifted through a crib. He accordingly plied his battering engines with greater vigour than ever; and, having made a sufficient breach, caused it to be mounted by his men, sword in hand, who quickly made themselves masters of the city. The first thing he did after he had entered it, was the ordering the unfortunate young Isaac to be brought to him, whom he strangled with his own hands; by whose death the Almoravidic line, called by the African writers Luptumns and Marabuts, became extinct; and, to obliterate the memory of those His devastations and cruelties at Morocco.

(B) Abd'allah reigned just long enough to make some prudent regulations according to his sect, for the most firm establishment both of it and of his new kingdom; and left them behind in his last will. He appointed a council of forty disciples of his sect, all of them preachers; some of whom were to regulate all public affairs, and, at proper seasons, to go a preaching about the country, and spread their doctrine abroad, and had sixteen other disciples to serve them as secretaries, all preachers likewise; and out of the former were to be chosen the successors to the regal and pontifical throne: for they were, after their founder's example, to assume both these titles and dignities.

Their disciples, or followers of their sect, were stiled Mohameddin, or Al Mohaddin; but the Arabian writers stile them only preachers, and the Spanish Al Mohedes;

and the descendants and successors of that tribe continued to stile themselves Emir Al Mumenin, or Chiefs of the Faithful, or true Believers, as long as their dynasty continued, and have been very powerful both in Africa and Spain.

As to the particular tenets of this new sect, if we except their more specious pretence to orthodoxy, as stricter adherers to, and preachers of, the unity of God, they had little or nothing peculiar, but what was artfully calculated by its founder, and suited to the loose genius of that people; which, added to their great outcries for liberty, and against the tyranny of the Almoravides, could not fail of alluring the greatest part of the kingdom to second the revolt, and embrace their sect and doctrine (2).

founders of that metropolis as much as he could, he caused all its stately antient edifices, particularly the great mosk, the royal palace, and other public buildings, to be levelled with the ground, causing some part of their ruins to be ground small, and sifted through a sieve, in compliance with his oath, and new ones to be built in their stead, and after a more ample and sumptuous manner. These he caused to be called by his own name; but had the mortification to find their old ones remain still indelible in the people's memory, though erased by him from their old marble and stone monuments, and to hear these new edifices still called by the names of the old ones. He was no less industrious in extirpating all the unhappy remains of the Almoravidic race; and ceased not persecuting them till he had destroyed all that came either to his own knowledge, or to that of his officers. He exercised the same cruelty against the citizens, officers, and soldiers, who had most signalized themselves in the defence of that city, or for their zeal and loyalty to their infant sovereign; so that the first years of his reign were little better than an æra of blood and slaughter <sup>1</sup>.

New principalities erected.

In the mean while his cruelties and swift conquests, as well as the strenuous oppositions of the Almoravide governors in most of their conquered provinces, who refused to submit to him, and of others, who, weary of the Almoravide tyranny, thought it now a lucky juncture to shake off their galling yoke, and make a brave attempt to regain their liberty, occasioned a very quick and surprising change through the greatest part of those provinces, and more particularly in Barbary, where the Arabs of Numidia, who had been driven from their seats by their Almoravide masters, and forced to retire to the mountains, and live wholly upon agriculture, and feeding of catle, took this opportunity to invade and make themselves masters of Tunis and Tremecen, and forced the native Africans to submit themselves under their dominion; but were quickly after obliged to stoop to that of the Almohedes. On the other hand, several of the Almoravide governors, taking the advantage of the wars and distractions then reigning, erected their governments into independent principalities and petty kingdoms; and those who dwelt in the mountainous parts, into a variety of lordships, under their own Cheyks. In particular, the states of Barbary, Tripoli, Kayrwan, Tunis, Algiers, Tremecen, and Bugeia, had each their own sovereign. The Nubians and Libyans had shewed them the example; and many others besides them were ready to follow it.

His success and conquests.

Takes Mohebia from the Christians.

WHILST these changes were introduced in Africa, the Moorish princes, greatly harrassed by king Alphonso, sent in vain to Abd'olmumen repeated intreaties to come over to their assistance, his own dominions requiring his whole attention against so many opposers and deserters; and all he could do for them was to send over to them an army of 30,000 men, from among his African mountaineers, the Gomerites, a stout and warlike tribe we have lately spoken of <sup>2</sup>, who proved exceedingly serviceable to them against the Christians. All this while he was pursuing his own conquests with surprising success, assisted by those of his own valorous tribe of Mozamuda, and especially those of the branch of Benegueregal, of which he himself was, and, on that account, had the greatest share in his favour and confidence. The consequence of which was, that he, within the space of a few years, reduced the Numidians and Galatians on the west, and the kingdoms of Tunis, Tremecen, and the greatest part of Mauritania and Tingitania, some by allurements, and others by forcible means, under his subjection; excepting only the Arabs of Tunis, who still preserved their liberty and government, through various successes, until they were wholly subdued by the great Al Mansur, the fourth king of the Almohedic line, as will be seen in the sequel. Abd'olmumen likewise dispossessed the Christians of the chief city of Africa, or Mohedia, and some others on the same coast, after they had been a considerable time in their possession <sup>3</sup>, besides his other conquests in Spain and Portugal. He died in the seventh year of his reign, and was succeeded by his son Yusef, or Joseph (C).

(C) Abd'olmumen, or, as others write him, Abd'almon, is reported to have been the son of an obscure potter, but a youth of a bold and enterprising genius, to whom a Moorish astrologer had foretold all that grandeur and good fortune which actually happened to him; upon which he readily joined himself to his predecessor Abd'al-lah, who was not long unacquainted with his parts and valour, soon raised him to be one of his chief officers and confidants; and we have seen already how well he answered all his expectations, so as to be chosen by his council of forty as the fittest person to succeed him in his new kingdom. But after his coming to the crown, he took care to efface the meanness of his extract, by giving himself out for a descendant from the family of the great prophet Mohammed, and a person, like him, chosen and sent by God to preach and propagate his religion among the Africans, and to suppress the tyranny of the Almoravides, and oppose the heresy of the schismatic Khalifs of Egypt (3). And it was with this view that he assumed the pompous titles which we have mentioned in the beginning of his reign.

(3) Grammay Afric. illustrat. lib. iv. c. 7, & al. ubi sup.

- a YUSEF proved a martial prince like his father, and inherited all his hatred against the Christians; so that he had no sooner quelled some slight troubles in his new kingdom, and established the kings of Tunis and Bugeia in their respective kingdoms, as his tributaries and vassals, than he prepared to embark for Spain, to the assistance of the Moorish princes, who all earnestly pressed him to it, and were perpetually harrassed there by the Christian powers. He set sail accordingly on the very entrance of the year, at the head of a more powerful armada than had perhaps ever crossed that sea, it consisting of 60,000 horse, and above 100,000 foot, and, at his landing, was joined by that of the Moorish princes who had invited him thither, and came, according to their engagements, to take the oaths of fidelity to him. We shall defer the detail of his various successes till we come to the Spanish history, and only observe here, that it did by no means answer his expectations, and that he was glad, at the end of eight years, to return into Africa, to suppress a revolt which the Zeneti had raised in the kingdom of Tremecen; and, as it was his long absence which had encouraged them to it, so his unexpected return and presence quickly put a stop to it. As soon as he had made all quiet there, he raised a fresh army, more numerous than the former, and crossed over again into Spain, where he had much better success, and carried his conquests so far, that the pope and most of the Christian princes of Europe joined their forces into a kind of crusado, to put a stop to his progress; so that, finding himself on the eve of being opposed by such an united force, whilst he was besieging Don Alphonso Henriquez in Santarino in Portugal, as he was hastening the siege with all his might, he received his death by an arrow, shot, some say, by one of his men; others, by a Portuguese. However that be, the Moorish princes raised the siege immediately after, and the African troops sailed back into Barbary.

- YUSEF was succeeded by his warlike son Takub, or Jaacob, surnamed Al Mansur, or The Conqueror, who found his African dominions in the utmost confusion, and the greatest part of his tributary provinces in open revolt; and it was not without great difficulty that he reduced them to their duty. The king of Fez was one of the first who thought it the safest way to acknowledge him for his sovereign; whilst those of Tremecen and Tunis absolutely refused to follow his example, and resolved to stand out against him. This obliged him to have recourse to artifice, and to stir up the Arabs against them. To this end, he clapped up a kind of feigned peace with their Cheyks, and so successfully instigated both nations, underhand, against each other, that, whilst they were at mutual hostilities, he had leisure enough to raise an army in Tingitania, under pretence of suppressing the tyranny of the Arabs, but in reality to join with them against the Tremecenians and Tunizens, as he actually did; and having defeated those two kings, stripped them of both their kingdoms. By this artifice, both sides found themselves strangely over-reached; the two revolted kingdoms were easily brought under subjection, and the Arabs, who had assisted him in it, obliged to transport themselves from these provinces; the most considerable of them into those of Dukela, Tremecen, and Azgar, and the other part into those of Numidia and Libya; by which means, under pretence of settling them in more fertile and pleasant habitations than the barren mountains they inhabited, he effectually weakened and dispersed them, beyond the power of reuniting and molesting these two kingdoms in haste; whilst those who remained in Mauritania and Tingitania were obliged to submit to become his vassals; that nation, known to be out of their element when driven out of their deserts, and to degenerate by degrees from their natural stoutness and courage<sup>m</sup>; being forced then, instead of living upon plunder, either to apply themselves to agriculture and feeding of cattle, or to starve.

- Those of the province of Azgar continued to pay their tribute to the Almohedes; but those of Dukela and Tremecen, who were more considerable and powerful, soon found means not only to free themselves from it, but to oblige the native Africans to pay it to them. Those also that were sent into Numidia and Libya were obliged to submit to the yoke, when they were unacquainted with the country; but by degrees became united, and powerful enough to make themselves masters of those provinces, and even to enlarge their dominions, and to render themselves independent of any government but that of their Cheyks (D).

(D) As these are, on that account, reckoned the most noble of all the Arabs, as scorning all other subjection, and every other way of living but that of plunder on their neighbours and travellers, it may not be amiss to mention the method which these last take to secure themselves from their violence; namely, by applying to one of their Cheyks, and obtaining, by a certain sum, or other valuable consideration, a safeguard from him, who, upon the payment of it, writes down in his register the names of every traveller, and deposes one of his subjects to conduct them through his territory or district. The man commonly carries a lance in his hand, with a kind of standard, on which are painted or embroidered the arms or device of the Cheyk; and goes with them till he hath brought them to the next Cheyk, where the same ceremony is to be repeated, and a new safeguard obtained; and thus, by travelling from one dower, or district, to another, under such a safeguard, one escapes

AL MANSUR having thus far secured himself both against the revolted and the plundering Arabs, and settled those parts in quiet, went on with his other conquests with such speed and success, that he saw himself master, in a little time, of all that tract of land which lieth between Numidia inclusive, and the intire length of the Barbary coasts from Tripoly to the kingdom of Morocco, including with it those of Fez, Tremecen, Tunis, and Tripoly, the whole extending itself above 1200 leagues in length, and in breadth, from the Mediterranean to the sandy deserts of Libya, above 480, exclusive of his Spanish dominions and fresh conquests, and where the greatest part of the Moorish princes acknowledged him for their sovereign. So that he is justly esteemed the greatest prince, next to the Arabian Khalifs, that ever reigned in this part of Africa, as he is also better known in history by his new title of Al Mansur, or Conqueror, than by his proper one of Abu Jakub. As he had frequent occasion to cross the sea to and from Afric and Spain, on account of the revolts which frequently happened during his absence from either, he built some considerable towns and fortresses on each coast, to facilitate his embarkations, and among them the cities of Rabettoner Sale, Al Calcarquivir, Al Carcar-zegued, Mansora, and some others, which we shall have occasion to speak of in the sequel: for as he never passed from one to the other of his dominions without a powerful armament, which took up a long time in preparing, embarking, &c. so it often happened that some rebellion or war broke out in the one before he was well got to the other; which obliged him to hasten back without doing any thing considerable, except quelling them by his sudden appearance. By that time he had finished some of those, and suppressed the revolters in Africa, he caused a general Gazie to be published through his dominions (E), which brought innumerable multitudes to enlist themselves volunteers in it, by which means he quickly raised an army of 400,000 men, 100,000 of which were horse, and passed immediately into Spain, where he was joined by Fernandez de Castro, his viceroy, at the head of another, and there gained a complete victory over the united forces of the Christians, near the city of Alarcos, on the 19th of July. From thence he pursued his march towards the Tayo, and would have gained many other advantages over them, had not Alphonso been forced, by the badness of his affairs, to sue to him for a truce; which he the more easily obtained, because a fresh revolt in Africa demanded his immediate presence there.

THIS last had been hatching by the governor of his capital during his three years absence; in which time he had found means to draw the wandering Arabs into his measures, and had raised a numerous army in the adjacent provinces; but upon the news of Al Mansur's arrival at the head of a much superior force, not daring to meet him in the field, he had by this time retired and fortified himself in that metropolis. Thither the king led his victorious troops, and laid close siege to it during a whole year; when his army despairing to reduce the city, that valiant prince ordered all his officers to repair to his head-quarters with scaling-ladders, of the height of the walls, by the next morning. He was so readily obeyed, that 4000 of them appeared by that time ready to mount to the assault; when putting himself at their head, We have, said he to them, fought hitherto for the sake of glory; but now we must fight for the sake of revenge, and to wrest your wives and children out of the hands of traitors and ravishers: with these words he scaled the walls at the head of them. The assault lasted three whole days and nights; during which time the besiegers were plied with constant refreshments, whilst the besieged, quite spent for want of such succour, were forced to abandon the town, and retire into the fortrefs.

AL MANSUR, followed by his brave troops, entered the city in triumph; but their joy was soon allayed by the stench of the dead bodies, with which they saw the streets quite covered, and were almost suffocated; but that prince would not suffer any of them to be removed, much less interred, till they were quite consumed, and then ordered the bones to be burned; alleging, that no smell was sweeter than the stinking carcases of a traitor and an enemy. All this while the fortrefs, into which the governor had retired, with a great number of persons of both sexes, and of all ages and conditions, was so closely invested, that they found themselves under a necessity, for want of provisions, of imploring the king's mercy; and a marabout, then in high esteem, was pitched upon to apply to him for it, who soon returned to them with the joyful news that he had obtained it; upon which the governor came the danger of being plundered, and perhaps murdered, by these freebooters, who, otherwise, spare neither Jews, Turks, or any other nation, but fall on all comers without distinction.

(E) We have already observed, that what the Mohammedans call Gazie is a kind of religious war, like the crusade among the Christians, and by which every zealous volunteer, who enlists in it, expects to gain heaven, and, if slain in battle, to be immediately conveyed thither; and, if we were to judge of their sincerity and zeal from the infinite multitudes that are allured to it on both sides, one could not but deem them all alike fired with the same religious ardour.

But mark the end!—The 2,000 which came thither from France, to help to wrest Toledo out of the hands of the Turks, were no sooner denied the plundering of that potent city, when rescued, than they turned their backs in anger, and returned to their own country; refusing to strike a blow without it, even for the cause of religion itself.

a out the next day, with all his friends and attendants, to throw themselves at his majesty's feet, and thank him for his great clemency : but, to their great surprize, they beheld the incensed prince's eyes still glaring with anger and resentment ; till, no longer able to contain himself, he threw his slipper at his head, and then ordered him to be beheaded, with all his friends and adherents. Here the marabout, who had accompanied him to the royal presence, offered to expostulate, and insisted upon his promise ; but was coldly answered, that no promise was to be kept with such perfidious traitors <sup>a</sup>.

HERE we must be obliged to put an unexpected period to the history of that glorious prince and conqueror, seeing the remainder of it is wrapped up in the deepest darkness ; being told by the Arabic writers, that, to the great astonishment of his court, he on a sudden disappeared, soon after, some say immediately after, this execution ; touched, as they pretend, with remorse for his cruelty and breach of faith, he wandered about, obscure and unknown, and died at last a poor despised baker at Alexandria. And the Africans, who conceal this last circumstance of his turning baker, allow of his dying at Alexandria, and add, that the people of the city of Morocco celebrate the anniversary of his death ; and that a favourite wife of his, after having waited a considerable while for his return, and hearing no news of him, likewise suddenly left that capital, and went in search of him, with only a female child she had by him in her arms ; that, after much travelling, she found him at length at Alexandria, where he had lived already some years an obscure person, and undiscovered by any one ; that she continued with him till his death, after which she retook the road to Morocco ; but in her way was stopped at Tunis by the king's son, who would have forced her daughter, at that time grown tall and handsome enough to attract his affection ; but upon his being apprised of her noble extract, and her mother producing the certificate of her marriage, he readily consented to marry her. They relate several other things concerning her, which will be more properly seen in the history of that kingdom, whilst we resume that of Morocco, where we left the court in the utmost perplexity and concern about their lost monarch.

VARIOUS were their conjectures about his flight, and the cause of it, as well as the methods they took to find him out. The most probable they could form concerning the former was, that he had undertaken a pilgrimage to Mecca, in some obscure and ordinary garb, in order to expiate his crime of cruelty and perfidy ; and then they elected his brother Al Abraham, or Brabem, to govern the kingdom during his absence, under his son Al Naker ; but after having waited a whole year in vain, they raised that young prince to the throne, and confirmed his uncle in the regency of the kingdom <sup>o</sup>.

MOHAMMED, surnamed Al Naker by the Spanish writers, was accordingly proclaimed his father's successor, and with the title of Emir, or Prince of the Faithful. He proved a warlike prince like his father, and, on his coming to the crown, resolved to pass into Spain with all speed, where king Alphonso, contrary to the last truce concluded with his father, had recovered several considerable places from him. To prevent, therefore, all revolts at home, during his absence, he confirmed the two vassal kings of Tremecen and Tunis in their dominions, and all the other governors of his tributary provinces and chief officers of his kingdom in their old posts and dignities. He next raised the most numerous army that had yet been known to pass into Spain, and consisted, according to the unanimous report of all the Spanish writers, of 120,000 horse, and above 300,000 foot, besides the Arabian Cheyks, who repaired to him from the eastern and western parts of his dominions, and accompanied him thither, each at the head of his choicest troops. All the Christian powers were apprised of this vast armada, and dispatched all the forces they could spare to the assistance of king Alphonso, and the pope, at the same time, proclaimed a fresh crusade, in such promising and engaging terms, as brought into that kingdom an infinite multitude of strangers, to fight against the infidels.

MOHAMMED, however, landed with his army in Andalusia, where he was joined by all the Moorish princes, and with them marched directly to Salvaterra, the then residence of the knights of Calatrava, who had lately wrenched it out of the hands of the Moors, and after a long and arduous siege made himself master of that strong place, as will be seen more fully in the Spanish history. Encouraged by this success, he soon after ventured to engage the whole force of the Christians on the plains of Tbolosa, where he was, though advantageously posted, attacked with such intrepid valour, that he was totally defeated, and with the loss, if we may credit the Spanish historians, of above 150,000 foot, 30,000 horse, 50,000 prisoners, and forced to abandon his camp, with all its immense and rich baggage, to the plunder of the enemy ; himself escaping with great difficulty, attended only by a small number of his men, chiefly by the fleetness of their horses. This famed battle was fought, according to some Arabic writers, in the year of the Hejra 609, but according to the Spanish and other historians, in 617. However, after this signal overthrow, the Christians gained still fresh advantages over the Moors. Mohammed was glad to make the best retreat he could to hasten a back into Africa, as soon as the wind and sea would permit him, leaving his Spanish dominions, and the remainder of his scattered army, under the command of his brother Ebn Zayd, who became soon after king of Valentia.

THE shame and regret of this defeat, at the head of so numerous and gallant an army, and the loss of so many thousands of men, the very Arabs and Africans acknowledging it to have amounted to between 70 and 80,000, joined to the cold reception he met with at his court and capital, where they scrupled not to ascribe his disgrace to his blindness and cowardice, affected him so sensibly, that it made the short remainder of his reign very uneasy to him, and very probably hastened his end; which, as soon as he perceived, he immediately appointed one of his grandsons, named Zeyd Arrax, or, as others write it, Ceyet Barrax, for his successor to the crown. He expired soon after, as unwilling to survive his misfortune; and the news of his death and successor quickly reached his conquered provinces, and caused in them an almost universal revolt. The kings of Tremecen, Fez, and Tunis, broke forth into an open revolt, which began to flame out in the first of them, under the conduct of an African named Gamarazan Ebn Zeyen, or the son of Ceyen, of the tribe of the Zeneti, and a descendant of the Abd'olkwates, antient monarchs of that kingdom, but then vassals to the Almohedes. He had put himself at the head of a pretty considerable force of malecontents; but finding it still too weak to make head against that of Al Zeyd, who was in full march against him, he was forced to retire into a strong fortress, where, being ready to perish for want of provisions, he had recourse to a near relation, whom he sent under the disguise of a malecontent, who came on purpose to shew him a way by which he might easily ascend to the top, and make himself master of the place. Zeyd was weak enough to accept of his offer;

who is assassinated, which puts an end to the Almohedic kingdom.

and going out with him to reconnoitre it, was assassinated by him at a convenient place; after which the murderer fled to the castle, and acquainted his cousin with what he had done. Zeyd's death put at once an end to the dynasty, or government, of the Almohedes (F); and the traitor Gamarazan, taking advantage of the confusion and panic which the news of it had thrown his whole army into, fell suddenly upon and totally defeated them; so that, having no enemy left to oppose him, he quickly reduced the whole Tremecenian kingdom under his own subjection, and held it as long as he lived; and ordered his successors for the future to exchange their old name of Abd'olkwates for that of Benimeyeni, or Benizevenez.

And Abd'allah in Fez.

ABOUT the same time the governor of Fez for the Almohedes, named Abd'allah, of the Zenetan tribe, and of the same branch of the Benimerini, likewise revolted, seized on several cities, particularly those of Robotto and Anfat, in the kingdom of Tremecen, and defeated the Almohedes, in the plains between Fez and Mequinez, and forced them to retire into the kingdom of Morocco; by all which singular advantages the Benimerini became very powerful. Abd'allah, at his death, left the Fezian crown to his son, a minor, under the government of his brother Yakub, who had assisted him in all his conquests, and who, after his nephew's death, took possession of the crown, as immediate heir to it. This last took the title of Muley Cheyk, or antient or old king; a title equivalent to that of sovereign lord, on account of his having governed the Fezian kingdom with the title of king of Mequinez during his nephew's life.

Mohammed Budobas takes Morocco;

NEAR the same time another uncle of the young king, named Mohammed Budobas, rose up in arms in the provinces of Tedba and Daminet; the former of which he yielded to the king of Fez, to obtain his assistance, and entered into a league with him. They accordingly marched their joint forces towards Morocco, where the young king Zeyd was; but upon the news of their approach, abandoned that metropolis, which his uncle immediately entered, and took possession of it in his own name, and at the same time dispatched one of his chief officers in pursuit of him, who overtook him at Sequelmessa, and murdered him. Budobas immediately caused himself to be proclaimed king and Emir of the Almohedes; and, instead of performing his engagements with the king of Fez, turned his arms against him, declared him a traitor and rebel against the Almohedes, from whom he had usurped the Fezian kingdom, which they had intrusted under his government, and himself the rightful and determined avenger

(F) We do not mean by it an utter extinction of their line; for there were enough still living of it to lay a just claim to the crown, and to make some strenuous efforts to regain it; but only that they all miscarried in their attempts, by some strange or unforeseen accidents. Amongst these we cannot forbear mentioning the late king's uncle Abd'al Kader, who, the better to succeed in it, had caused himself to be chosen by the chief officers of that state; but yet finding himself too weak to cope with the power of some of his competitors, was glad to compromise the contest with them by a kind of treaty of partition, out of which sprang several petty sovereignties.

At the same time several governors of the provinces for the Almohedes likewise revolted in other places, as in Nubia, Libya, &c. as well as in Tremecen, Fez, and Tunis, who set up for themselves, and continued unmolested in their new assumed sovereignties, whilst the Almohedic dynasty was every-where suppressed, in spite of all their efforts to raise it up again, as the sequel plainly shews (1).

- a of his black treason; protesting, that he would not sheath his sword, till he had driven him out of his usurped dominions. Such was the consequence, as is commonly the case, of their treasonable and unnatural alliance. The misfortune was, that all this vapouring and threatening ended in his own total defeat, and death of the Almohedic chief, by which the kingdom of Morocco, and its conquered provinces in Barbary, fell under the subjection of the Benimerini, and the victorious king of Fez became the head of a new dynasty, which, in process of time, reduced all the kingdoms of Tremecen, Tunis, and other inferior sovereignties. For although several of the Almohedic governors, who had revolted under the same reign, were suffered to retain their dominions, especially in the mountainous parts, those of mount Atlas above-mentioned in particular, yet was it only on condition that they should acknowledge the kings of Fez as their lords. Among those we may add a considerable branch of the Muzamadin tribe, so called (though originally of the Berberi extract) from the mount, or rather large ridge of mountains, on the great Atlas, extending itself about 20 leagues in length westward, towards the Atlantic ocean, and where they reigned a considerable time under their own princes, after the declension and abolition of the tyrannic power of the Arabs in several parts of Africa, particularly in Numidia, Libya, as well as this of Barbary; and still retained their antient name. They are a wealthy and warlike nation, and valued themselves for their antiquity and nobility; and were once very powerful, and continued so for a considerable time, as will be farther shewn in the sequel of this work.

- Among other branches descended from them, that of the Henteti, so called from the famed mount of that name, the highest and most populous of the whole Atlantic ridge, have also made a very considerable figure in history, under their own princes, on account of their wealth and power, and particularly for their brave cavalry, and the frequent wars they have successfully waged against the Sharifs of Morocco; till at length these being become masters of that kingdom, and much inferior to it in strength, were obliged to set aside all farther hostilities, and crave their alliance and protection, in order to be confirmed by them in their inferior dignity and scanty dominion. This forced alliance was made by Maleyo Idris, one of their kings, who boasted himself to be descended from the Almohedes, and, as such, began to lay claim to the crown of Afric, which they had been possessed of before, as we have lately seen, and to assume the regal title, though he had, till then, contented himself with that of king of that mountain. He was then in possession of the city and strong fortress of Geman Tedid, which had been founded about two centuries before by Hentetao, of his tribe of Mirzamada, and had continued to be their chief residence ever since. He held also several other fortresses on the same mountain, all likewise advantageously situated, and watered by the river Ecifelmed, so called from the prodigious noise it makes in its rapid descent from those heights, whence, running down into a spacious plain below, it expands itself into a delightful lake. To these he added the city of Temelet, a small but strong fortress, situate on an eminent part of the mountain of its name, formerly built by the same tribe; and exceedingly well peopled, as well as adorned with a stately mosk, held in great veneration by its inhabitants, who pretend that the famed Mohedi, and his disciple Abd'almumen, the first king of the Almohedes, lie interred in it †; from which also those of that sect affect to call the city by his name Mohedi.

THIS was the situation of Muley Idris's small dominions, when the dread of the Sharif's power put him upon that ill-concerted expedient of securing himself in them by the above-mentioned alliance, which he soon afterwards found cause to repent of. The measures he took to extricate himself out of them were no less hazardous, and likely to have proved equally, if not more, fatal to him.

- THIS transaction, as well as the occasion of it, having something singular and instructive in it, we hope our readers will not deem it a digression from our subject, if we subjoin a short account of it, as we find it related in the authors quoted in the margin *. It happened in the reign of the Sharif Muley Hammed, by which time the Portuguese had got some considerable settlements on that coast, and particularly the strong castle of Salee, a considerable sea-port in that kingdom; the governor of which, named Nunez, ever attentive to his master's interest, and apprised of the dread Idris was in from his new ally, had found means to invite him to exchange him for that of the king of Portugal, who, he assured him, would prove a more faithful, as well as more powerful, protector. The juncture was then altogether promising and favourable, inasmuch as Muley Hammed had lately made himself master of the city of Morocco, that is, after the death of Naker Buchentuf, the Almohede, and last possessor of it, and was become by that means a more formidable neighbour; which circumstance, that governor presumed, could not fail of determining the alarmed Idris to accept of the new proffered alliance. To effect it with the greater safety and speed, he employed a servile Jewish merchant, who traded in those parts, to convey a letter to him from his Portuguese majesty, which, to avoid discovery, was sewn between the soles of his shoe. But the Jew, whether to avoid suspicion, or to serve some other end, took the direct road to Morocco, and not only a staid some time in that capital, but ventured to appear before the Sharif, and transact some private affairs with him; which so alarmed the Henetan prince, that, upon the Jew's delivering the letter to him, he returned it to him unopened, and ordered him to carry it back to Morocco, and put it into the Sharif's own hand, together with another written by himself, in which he earnestly intreated him to have a watchful eye over the Christians, who, he was well assured, were carrying on some dangerous plot against him. This precaution, luckily for him, which was wholly owing to his suspicion that the Jew might have discovered his correspondence with the Portuguese governor, had the desired effect; and Muley, now satisfied of his friendship and integrity, failed not to make him some grateful acknowledgements for it, whilst he turned his whole resentment on those strangers, who had, with such treacherous artifices, attempted to deprive him of so faithful an ally, and for such treasonable designs against him, in order to invade the more effectually the dominions of both. The Jew was the first who fell a victim to his jealousy, whom suspecting to be more deeply informed of their designs, he caused to be put to the torture, which was several times repeated; and, not being able to extort any confession from him, condemned him to be torn in pieces by four wild horses †. But as he could not penetrate farther into the mystery of this conspiracy, this fresh instance of the Portuguese ambition and policy only served to make him have a more watchful eye over them; and, at the same time, if he had really entertained any views against those of his Henetan ally, it made him set them aside, for the present at least; and Idris found in him from henceforth a friend and protector, instead of a formidable neighbour; and his successors enjoyed their small kingdom in peace for some generations, though they were, in process of time, reduced under the yoke of the Sharifs, as will be more fully seen in the next chapter. Thus much may suffice for these two considerable branches of the Zeneti, inhabiting the western parts of the Atlas, under the names of Hentela and Zamadins. Other branches of the same tribe spread themselves likewise in other parts of Barbary and Africa, as in Numidia, Nubia, Libya, &c. and founded some considerable cities, with an account of which we shall not here interrupt the thread and course of our history, having apprised our readers * that they should be taken proper notice of in a supplemental volume, in the same order as they have been transmitted to us by Abu'lfeda and other Arabic historians and chronologers. All that needs be added here to that of the Almobedes, lately spoken of, after having made a considerable figure in the kingdom of Fez and other parts, during the space of about 170 years, waged very cruel wars against the kings of Fez, Tunis, Tremecen, &c. and greatly enlarged their wealth, power, and dominions, were at length succeeded by that of the Benimerini, another, and equally eminent, branch of the Zeneti, above mentioned; these last having, like all the former branches already spoken of, held the government during the space of above 117 years, enlarged their conquests, and enriched themselves by their frequent incursions not only into all the neighbouring kingdoms above-mentioned, but even Nubia, Libya, and Numidia, were at length, like the rest of these African parts, swallowed up by the general inundation of Mohammedism, as will be more fully seen in the sequel.

ALL these principal branches, not to mention some others which have likewise had their particular share of dominion in other parts, and a much greater number of inferior ones, which have branched out into an innumerable variety, beyond an author's power even to enumerate, as Leo Africanus expresses it, out of his Arabic historian †; and, if they could, would be of little use or instruction to an English reader; all these, we say, have had their several periods of government in Barbary; and, if our author is rightly informed, were the chief, if not the only ones, which retained so much of their Arabic extract, as to prefer the scenite and wandering life, as the most noble and suitable to their origin and taste, whilst they obliged those who lived under their government to inhabit in cities and villages, to cultivate the lands and pasture grounds, to follow husbandry and breeding of cattle, and to exercise variety of such trades and manufactures as the exigencies of nature and society required. They every-where retained their original or Arabic tongue, in its purity, or, at least, with so little intermixture or corruption, that whether they live in towns or villages, or roam at large in the spacious plains, mountains, or deserts, or how intermixed soever with others, they easily understand one another §. During that long interval, each of their sects had its authors, fautors, and disciples, all contending with equal warmth for their particular tenets, and triumphed over the others in their turns, and enjoyed Mohammedism of their own fabrication; till the Sharifs on the one hand, and the Turks on the other, having reduced the whole Barbaric tract, obliged each of them to submit to a new one of their own, as will be farther shewn in the subsequent chapters.

- a We have, by this time, gone through all we thought needful, by way of preliminary to the history of this large and opulent part of Africa; and, in order to inform our readers by what degrees and strange means the several states that now compose it came insensibly to coalesce into the different forms of government under which they now live, we shall next give their respective histories. Nevertheless, it will not be improper, before we close this chapter, to subjoin here an account of the once famed kingdom of Telensine, or Tremecen, of which we have had frequent occasion to make some mention; especially with regard to the share it hath had in the wars and other transactions with the states lately spoken of, before its reduction by, and being incorporated into, that of Algiers; in all which it hath made so considerable a figure in the history of Barbary, that it might be justly deemed an inexcusable omission not to give it
- b a place.

S E C T. III.

The history of the kingdom of Telensine, or Tremecen.

- c THIS kingdom was antiently considerable enough to be reckoned the third in rank of Kingdom of the Mauritania Cæsariensis. Its other name it received afterwards from its capital of Tremecen, or, as some write it, Termecen, of which we shall give an account in its proper place. It stretches itself from north to south-east, that is, from the west Mediterranean to Its limits. mount Atlas, about the length of 150 leagues; but in breadth it is, in some places, about 50, and about 26 or 21 where narrowest. On the east it hath the kingdom of Tunis, or Africa propria, from which it is severed by two rivers; namely, the Zis and the Moluya, the former of which hath its spring-head on the Zanbaghian mountains, and running thence across the countries of Quinena, Matagara, and Relch, spreads itself into a lake, in a desert south of the territory of Segelmessa (A); and the latter, by a contrary course, runs from mount
- d Atlas across the whole country, and empties itself into the Mediterranean, near the town of Ona<sup>a</sup>. From thence to that of Gigel is the utmost breadth of its coast; this last being its utmost boundary on the other side, as the Numidian is on the south. The kingdom is divided into four principal provinces, whereof the first and chief bears the name of Tremecen; the se- Its antient provinces. cond is called Tenez, the third Algiers (which three formerly constituted the Cæsarean Mauritania), and the last is that of Buga, vulgarly called Bugia, which some geographers place in the kingdom of Tunis. These four provinces have, ever since the decay of the Roman empire, been preserved by the Arabs of the Zenetan tribe; next to them by the kings of Tunis and Fez; and last of all by the Turks, as will be seen in the sequel. The former of them in particular, who are very numerous in each, and no less stout and warlike than greedy of plunder,
- e have proved a perpetual plague to them, being advantageously seated on the mountainous parts, where they cannot be easily come at, or, in case of danger of being so, are ever ready to remove their habitations into the most inaccessible part, where they range at will, and without paying any subjection or tribute to the Tremecen princes, living mostly on the spoil of their subjects below. They are divided into five branches; viz. Berbers, Zeneti, Hoars, Zinbagians, and Azogues, all of them Mohammedans, and have their mosks in great numbers, tho', for the most part, more tractable, and less averse to Christians, with whom they carry on a considerable commerce, than those of the kingdom of Morocco, who still retain an irrecon-

(A) The province of Segelmessa is situate between the kingdom of Tremecen and the desert of Nubia, and stretches itself about 120 miles southwards along the river above-mentioned. It is inhabited by a barbarous branch of the Zanbaghian Zeneti, and had its name from its capital Segelmessa, since taken by the kings of Fez, and made the residence and appenage of their sons; but was since destroyed on account of some rebellion; ever since which the inhabitants have built several castles in this province, some of whom live independent of any but their own princes, and others are tributary to the Arabs (1), and both apply themselves to sow and plant, and other kinds of agriculture.

The city, which hath never been rebuilt since, shews by its noble remains of stately walls, temples, and a fine aqueduct, which brought the water to it from the river Zis above-mentioned, all the marks of antient splendor that could adorn a royal city; from which our author, who was there about seven months, tells us, that some African writers, who gave it the name of Bieri, supposed it to have been built by Alexander the Great, for the relief of his wounded soldiers. Which notion, however, he looks upon as altogether absurd (2), there being no vestige in history of his having penetrated so far into Africa.

cilable hatred against them (B). However, the former have proved worse enemies both to a this kingdom, and Tunis, Fez, and others on this coast, ever since the Turks have been masters of so great a part of it, and have been ever ready to excite revolts, and join forces with their enemies, especially such as paid them best for acting against them.

THE clime and soil of this kingdom, being pretty much the same as we have seen it in other parts of Barbary, that is, sandy and barren on the southern side, and more fruitful and mountainous towards the Mediterranean, we shall not need dwell on a detail of its products, which are, for the most part, the same through the whole Barbaric tract. That especially about the capital of Tremecen is little else than a continued barren plain of a vast extent; so that there are but few other cities of any note in its neighbourhood. But it is far otherwise towards the south, and near the sea, where the plains, vallies, and even the mountains, yield a most agreeable b verdure, plenty and variety of pasturage, fruits, and several sorts of grain; whilst the southern parts are very poorly furnished with cities and towns of any note, except the capital, and are only defended by some strong castles, dispersed at proper distances, and advantageous posts (C). The northern ones have a considerable number of them, especially upon the coasts. Yet both the inland and maritime parts drive a considerable commerce both out of the kingdom and with each other; the former with Numidia, Nigritia, and other inland parts, for slaves, gold dust, elephants teeth, ebony and other woods, and a great variety of gums, and other commodities, and exchanges them with the maritime parts for their corn and other products, as well as great variety of European goods, cloths, knives, scissars, razors, rings, beads, bells, and other trinkets, brought thither from Spain, France, and Italy, but more particularly from Venice and Genoa, whence a good number of merchant ships used to resort c to the two famed ports of Auran, or Horan, and Marfa Al Kasbir, till both towns were taken, and the commerce quite obstructed, by Ferdinand king of Spain, as will be seen in the sequel, and was not restored till Barbarossa made himself master of the Tremecenian kingdom, recovered and repaired the maritime and trading towns, and reinvited those merchants to revive their commerce with his new dominions, which their fear of the Christians, and the wars which had raged till then, had so greatly obstructed. We shall not, however, take up our reader's time with a detail and description of those towns, because we shall find the most considerable of them still standing and flourishing under the dominion of the Turks, when we come to the history of the kingdom of Algiers, of which this of Tremecen is now but a part, and where they will more properly come under our notice. At present we shall content our- d selves with singling out two of the most remarkable ones; viz. that of Ned Roma, and that

(B) There is still another class of them, more mischievous than the others, and these are those who inhabit the desert of Angab, which lies on the road between Tremecen and Fez, and is computed to be twenty-eight leagues in length, and eighteen in breadth, and across which runs the Moluya lately mentioned, though everywhere else destitute of water and almost every kind of food; but swarms with such multitudes of lions and other wild beasts, as well as with those wandering and pilfering Arabs, as made it, on both accounts, very dangerous to the merchants who were obliged to travel from one kingdom to another.

This obliged the kings of Tremecen to keep a body of troops along the banks of the river, both to suppress the one and destroy the other, which they did during the summer season, so as to make it passable all that time; but when the winter drew near, and the soldiers were obliged to go in quest of provisions as far as Numidia, as they must do every year, then do those two nuisances begin to rage again, and make it exceeding dangerous to travel through that sandy and barren wilderness (3).

The Tremecen princes had here likewise erected the strong fortress of Tenzegzeg, on the road between their capital and the city of Fez, which stands on a high rock, in the midst of a spacious and fertile plain, watered by the river Tama, which falls down from the mount Atlas into that of Aresgole. This fortress was designed to guard the pass into the desert above-mentioned, on the side of the capital, from the incursions of the Arabs; but hath been since seized and possessed by them, and since then by the Turks; who, having made themselves masters of Barbary, have fortified it, and keep a constant garrison in it (4).

(C) Amongst that number we shall only select one, to serve as an example of the rest; viz. that called by Leo Iszli, and by Marmol Zexil, said to have been built by the Africans as a frontier town; but, by what one may judge from the height and strength of its walls, the beauty and largeness of the square stones, more like a work of the Romans, and probably the Giva of Ptolemy, who places it in 14 degrees 30 min. of longitude, and 32 degrees 30 min. of latitude.

It is situate, like that spoken of in a former note, in a barren plain, between the desert of Angab, and the territory of Tremecen, and was formerly well inhabited and garrisoned, having some spacious fields in its neighbourhood, which produced some corn, barley, and other provisions; till being at length taken by Yusef, or Juseph, prince of the race of the Benimerini, and the inhabitants expelled, it was some time after reinhabited by a set of religious monks, in great veneration amongst all the Mohammedans and Arabs; insomuch, that neither the princes of Tremecen, nor even the plundering Arabs, raised any tribute or exactions upon them, on account of the great hospitality they exercised towards all strangers who passed by, whom they liberally entertained during three days, and dismissed without paying any thing. There is a small river passes by this castle, which supplies them, and their fields round about, with a sufficient quantity of water; without which their fields would not produce any thing. As for their houses, they are mere huts, built of earth, and thatched only with leaves. So that the place hath nothing now remarkable left but its antient high walls above-mentioned (5).

a of Tremecen, the former called so for its antiquity and likeness to the antient Rome, and the other as being the metropolis of the Tremecenian kingdom, and the splendid residence of its princes.

b NED ROMA, so called from the Arabic, importing its likeness to that antient metropolis of the world, and built by its once lordly conquerors, whilst masters of this part of Africa, is seated on a large plain, about three leagues from the great Atlas, and about four from the Mediterranean, much resembling that of Rome in its situation; and some very considerable remains of its antient splendor not only bear still a very remarkable resemblance to that old mistress of the world, but it is the only one in all those parts that hath preserved any of them (the barbarous Vandals having, as hath been formerly hinted *, made it one part of their glory to destroy all the antient monuments of the Roman grandeur); on which account we thought that antient city might well deserve a particular notice in this place. Its walls, which are still standing, and appear high and lofty, built of large square stone, strongly cemented, and reared after the Roman style, the remains of sundry other sumptuous edifices, marble colonades, sepulchres, and other monuments, with Roman inscriptions, though, for the most part, either thrown down and lying in ruins, or terribly defaced, are still so many evidences of its antient greatness. As to its houses, they appear to have been rebuilt after the coarser African style; so that it is likely the old Roman ones were destroyed either by the Vandals above-mentioned, or during the later wars between the kings of Tremecen and those of Fez and Tunis. The adjacent fields are still very pleasant, fruitful, and well watered by a large river, descending from the great Atlas, whose banks on both sides are beautifully shaded with variety of fruit-trees, and the neighbouring mountains are likewise covered with various kinds of trees, one of which in particular, called by the antients Karobs, or Karobies, bears a fruit of a sweet and pleasant taste, and of which they make a kind of bread, which they eat of all the year round with all their other victuals. They have likewise great plenty of wheat and barley, abound with excellent pasturage and variety of cattle. They have also a fine sort of cotton growing amongst them, of which they make some of the finest linen in all Barbary. Upon the whole, nothing appears more delightful and agreeable, and promising, than the adjacent parts, and the remains of this old city; nor any thing more shocking and mean than its inside; the entrance and every part of which presents you scarcely with any thing but a parcel of poor tattered buildings, mostly of earth, or at best patched up here and there with some of the square stones of the old city, and a heap of other ruins, some within and others without the walls. We shall only add, that Ptolemy, who takes it for the antient Salamium, places it in 12 degrees 10 min. of longitude, and 33 degrees 20 min. of latitude. Both the city and the inhabitants of the adjacent mountains are of the Zenetan tribe, and a branch of the Zanbaghians †; they were once stout and warlike, and could bring 25,000 fighting men into the field; but, since their tyrannic subjection under the Turks, are greatly decreased both in number and courage §, and remarkable for little else than their potteries or earthen manufactures; though, from the advantageous situation and richness of their fields and pastures, one would judge it to have been formerly a place of great commerce ‡.

c THE capital of this kingdom is the other city we are now to describe. It is commonly City of Tremecen de- called, by our modern geographers, Tremecen, Tremesen, Temecen, or Tremisen; but an- tiently, and according to the true Arabic orthography and pronunciation, Tlemfan, or Telemfan. It is pleasantly situated, about five leagues south-east of the mouth of the Tefna, upon a rising ground, below a range of rocky precipices, supposed by the learned Dr. Shaw to be the Sacbratain of Edrisi †, and upon the first ridge of them (for there runs another to the southward) lieth a slip of level ground, that bursts out in every part of it with springs of water, which, gradually uniting together into little streams, fall afterwards into a pleasant variety of cascades in their near approach to Telemfan. These the author last-quoted supposes to be the springs which form the Annafrani of Edrisi, they still continuing to run in the same f direction, into a stream which turns a number of mills, as that river is said to have formerly done. There is besides a large source of water in the heart of the city, conveyed thither by a subterranean chanel, from some other place; and the mountains above-mentioned, to the southward of this ridge, yield such plenty of water, that there was the less need for Marmol to fetch those from the Fouara of Numidia; this conduit not only yielding a sufficient supply to the city, but being conveyed from the reservoir to the castle, mosks, and other places of resort || (D).

(D) There is likewise on the west end of the city, a taste, two hundred yards long, and about half as broad, large square basin, built, we are told, after the Moorish on which, if we believe the tradition which goes current among VOL. VII. O O

It is not easy to conjecture when, or by whom, this royal metropolis was first founded ; and though we are told that there have been found among its ruins many rows of pillars, and other fragments of Roman altars, with inscriptions to the Dii Manes, and other Roman antiquities, yet most authors are of opinion, that it had but a small beginning, and did not arrive at its zenith of grandeur till after the destruction of that of Aresgol by the Zanbaghians, in the year of the Hejra 410, of which we shall speak more fully in the sequel. Till that time it seems to have been only a small fortress, possessed, if not built, as Marmol conjectures, by the Magarean Zeneti †. However that be, it was known to the antients by the name of Temesi, and Ptolemy places it under the 13th degr. 50 min. of longitude, and the 33d degr. 10 min. of latitude.

THE walls of it, when in their largest extent, according to our learned traveller, were, for the most part, moulded in frames, and appear to have consisted of a peculiar kind of mortar, made up of sand, lime, and small pebbles, so well tempered, that it acquired the hardness and solidity of stone. The several stages and removes of those frames are still observable to the eye, by which some of them appear to have been 100 yards long, and a fathom in height and thickness, by which one may estimate the quantity of mortar made use of at one time. They were of a considerable height, and strong enough to be reckoned impregnable ; at least they proved so far such, as to withstand an obstinate siege of thirty months, in spite of the daily vigorous assaults of the besiegers, under the eye and command of their prince Abu'l Hasseim, king of Fez, who at length made that fatal breach in it, which occasioned the surrender and ruin of the place, and the death of its valiant prince, as will be seen in the sequel <sup>b</sup>.

scribed.

TILL that time Tremecen was wisely divided into several distinct wards, each of which might be considered as a separate city. They were of an oblong figure like the town, and each inclosed with its own high walls, of the same structure and materials, and were of singular use, either to prolong a siege, or prevent any insurrection, and intestine commotions among the citizens ; and we are told that there were two of them still standing in the time of Edrisi <sup>c</sup>. The rest of them had been demolished by the conqueror, and from the remains of it our author computes the whole compass of the city to have been about four miles <sup>d</sup>. What other considerable damage this noble capital received in its other sumptuous edifices and public buildings, we are left to guess ; however, after the decay of the Benimerinian family, it began to be repaired and inhabited afresh, insomuch that it soon increased, we are told, to 12,000 families <sup>e</sup>. Its trade and commerce were likewise so well revived, and its merchants and citizens became so wealthy, that the palace also resumed its pristine grandeur, so far as to vie with the city of Fez in almost every thing, but the stateliness of its buildings ; so that, in our author's time, there were many noble structures, as mosks, public schools for Mohammedan preachers and professors, particularly five colleges, most sumptuously built, some by the kings of Tremecen, and others by the kings of Fez, with variety of other public buildings, as baths, hot-houses, and stately urns, or caravanseras, for the use of the merchants and strangers, and built after the African style, unto two of which the Venetians and Genoese usually resorted. The Jews were here likewise very numerous, and vastly rich ; but on some discontent, or misdemeanor, they were all at once brought to the lowest state of misery and contempt. This happened soon after the death of king Abubaddillah, in the year of the Hejra 923 ; since which time they have never recovered themselves, nor their credit <sup>f</sup>. As for the citizens they lived in great ease and wealth, and have each their trades and occupations in a particular part of the city, as they have in that of Fez.

Palace,

suburbs,

WE have already described the noble city walls, and shall only add, that they had four principal stately gates, all beautifully adorned, well fortified, and with spacious houses or rooms for the entertainment of the guards. Without the walls, on the south side of the city, stands the royal palace, built in the manner of a fortress, in which are the lodgings, or apartments, in great number, and of great strength and beauty, each of them adorned with stately gardens and fountains. The palace hath two sumptuous gates, the one towards the city, and called Beb-gadit, the other towards the country, called Beb-el Gied. The city is likewise surrounded, at some distance, with other beautiful villas and houses of pleasure, and great variety of gardens and orchards, where the richer sort of the inhabitants spend great part of the summer, in among the inhabitants, the Tremecenian kings were wont to take the diversion of the water, and their subjects to learn navigation. But, as Leo Africanus rightly observes, the waters of the Sachrattain, which supply it, being easily turned off their usual course, it is more likely that this basin was originally designed as a reservoir against a siege, fire, or other emergencies, as well as to refresh a great number of beautiful gardens and other plantations below it. Edrisi mentions a structure of this kind, where the fountain of Omojahia discharges itself (8).

- a time of peace. These are also furnished with plenty of water, and stored with all manner of fruit trees, particularly of olive and walnut, from which they make plenty of oil. Vines are there likewise in great plenty, and furnish the people with excellent grapes, which, being dried in the sun, serve them all the year round *. They do the same by their figs and other fruits, and, to close the charming account which our author, an eye-witness of what he relates, gives of it, nothing could be more delightful and fertile, of all that nature can produce in those warm climates, than what he beheld in the adjacent parts of this opulent metropolis, nor more peaceable and happy than its inhabitants ; all which probably continued, if not improved yearly, till the year 1670, which was that of its last fatal overthrow, when Muley Hassan, the Bey of Algiers, having taken a dislike to the inhabitants, on account of their
- b disaffection to him, reduced the greatest part of it into ruins ; so that there was not the sixth part of it left remaining when our learned traveller visited those parts about an. 1526 <sup>b</sup>.

BEFORE we take our leave of this metropolis, it will not be displeasing to our readers to give a small sketch of its court, and of the surprising state which the Tremecenian princes took upon them, when in the height of their grandeur and prosperity ; and though most of them were but mere upstarts, in comparison, yet they affected, when they could reach it, all the pomp and grandeur of the greatest eastern monarchs ; one instance of which, among the rest, was, that none of their subjects were ever allowed to speak to them, or to appear in their presence, except their prime ministers, nobles, and officers of their court, and that in a manner suitable to each of their respective dignities, as every such was suited to their rank and nobility. The c first of these was of the lord-lieutenant or prime minister, who had the disposing of all the inferior ones, the command of the army, and frequently led them into the field, and against the enemy. Next to him was the chief secretary of state, who minuted and recorded all things appertaining to the king. The next in rank was his high treasurer, who receives his revenues and tributes. The next was his lord almoner, or dispensator, who bestows such liberalities as the king chuses to grant. The fifth officer is the captain of his guard, who, as often as any nobles are admitted into the presence, conducts the guard to the palace gate. We omit the rest as not worth a particular mention, such as the master of the horse, or, as he is there styled, the overseer of the saddle and stirrups ; the lord chamberlain, who only attends whenever the king gives audience, &c.

- d THE royal revenue, which chiefly arises from the imports and exports from and to the city of Auran, where the principal custom-house was, did not then amount to above six hundred thousand crowns yearly ; the one moiety thereof was appropriated to the maintenance of his forces, and the other to that of his household ; and, if there arose any overplus from either, it was laid up to defray the exigencies of war. However, it is plain, that they had not attained the art of improving so beneficial a branch of their revenue ; and the Turks, since their becoming masters of this kingdom, have greatly increased it, even after the taking of that commodious port from them by the Spaniards, by removing the commerce of it to the capital of Algiers, this last being no less advantageously situate for trade, both to and from Europe and Africa, as will be seen in the subsequent chapter, and hath swarmed with pirates from both
- e coasts ever since. The Tremecenian kings had likewise a considerable trade with the inland, which the Turks have taken great care to improve ; the misfortune was, the Numidians, who carried it on with them, being of such insatiable avarice, that they could scarcely be brought to any equitable terms †.

UPON the whole, those kings in general affected to imitate, if not to vie with, those of Fex, of whom we shall give an account in a subsequent chapter, in the splendor and ordering of their court. There is however one remarkable singularity, which our author observed amongst them <sup>i</sup> ; that whenever he that was then on the throne appeared in public, or went abroad, it was always not only with a less numerous and splendid retinue than the former, but in such a plain and ordinary dress, that he was hardly to be distinguished from a common captain in f time of war ; and when he travels, from any of his attendants.

THEY used to stamp a gold coin of baser alloy, though of a larger size, and of about the value of an Italian ducat and a quarter <sup>k</sup>.

- WE shall conclude this section with such a sketch of the history of this kingdom as we have been able to collect from the authors quoted hitherto in the margin. We have already taken notice that it was known to the Romans and Greeks, under the name of Temisi, and was a part of the Mauritania Cæsariensis, which they had subdued. After the decline of their empire, it may be reasonably supposed that it underwent the same fate with the other parts of Barbary, that is, groaned like them for a long while under the tyranny of the Arabian Khalifs, and their Cheyks, though how long is hard to determine ; till, their yoke becoming
- g intolerable every-where, they were forced to shake it off, and to form, like the rest, a new government or dynasty of their own, from which sprang that vast number and variety, which flourished in their turns, not only in the several parts of Barbary, but of all this northern part of Africa, as far as Nubia, Libya, Numidia, &c. as hath been frequently shewn through the course of this chapter.

Great state
of its kings.

ACCORDINGLY those of Telensine, or Tremecen, who were of the tribe of the Zeneti, of the branch of the Magrawas, or Magroas, formerly spoken of, became the first founders of this government. They called themselves Beni Abd'ulgad, and were esteemed the most antient and considerable of all the Barbary princes, living in the greatest magnificence and splendor, and keeping the most superb court, and state above all the rest. Their successors, as hath been lately hinted, being chosen from among the highest nobility, affected to make the most pompous appearance, and have had regiments of cavalry under them for their retinue, and all likewise sumptuously mounted and habited, even vastly above their estate and income. The prince's revenue, in spite of all their great show and state, was so small at first, that that of three whole years was scarce sufficient to maintain war one whole twelve-month; which obliged them to have recourse to the expedient of having not only their gold coin of a baser alloy, but their silver also, as occasion required. They found means, however, to augment it by degrees, as well by the taxes they levied on their subjects, as by their commerce both with Europeans and Africans; and, by customs, imposts, and exactions, to become very wealthy and powerful, and to hold the reins of that kingdom during the space of three hundred years, without any considerable alteration, excepting now-and-then some wars with their neighbours, but more particularly in time by the upstart Almoravides and Almohedes successively, both which, in their turns, either reduced them, or contented themselves to keep them under tribute, as we have seen in the foregoing chapter. Yet, under all these disasters, they seldom failed of recovering their liberty, and putting themselves again in statu quo.

Reduced by the Almoravides and Almohedes.

Ghamrazen
crown.

ONE of the most remarkable of these revolutions happened in the time of one Ghamrazen, or, as others call him, Gamazaz, a man of valour, of the family of the Beni-zeiens, who headed a revolt against the Almohedes, towards the decline of their government, and recovered the kingdom of Tremecen out of their hands, and left it to a series of successors, who took upon them the new name of Beni-zeiens, instead of the old one of Abd'allades, and reigned there during the space of near 380 years, according to Leo and Grammay*, but of only 160 according to Marmol. However, they were forced, during the latter end of that interval, to sustain several very fierce wars from the kings of Fez, who had once driven them out of the greatest part of their dominions, making some tributary, obliging others to flee for refuge among the barren and inhospitable mountains, and holding the rest under a severe subjection. They were no less harrassed by the kings of Tunis, under whom they fought several unsuccessful battles, and endured many obstinate sieges in their capital and other fortresses, besides other dreadful ravages they committed in their frequent incursions.

king of Fez;

BUT the most dreadful siege this capital of Tremecen underwent was under Yusef, king of Fez, which lasted seven whole years successively; that prince, having built a strong fort on the east side of the town, reduced it to such distress and want, that the citizens began to labour under an intolerable famine. Upon this they all agreed to apply to the king in a body, and, in the most pathetic terms, to beseech him to have compassion on their distress, and not to deliver them up to the dreadful effects of a general assault, after having sustained this obstinate siege in his defence. The king, who was then at supper upon a piece of horse-flesh, stewed with barley, admitted them to his presence, and pointing to his homely fare, plainly shewed them how little better his condition was than that of the meanest of them. This allayed their clamours for the present; quickly after which, having called them together to an assembly, he exhorted them, in the strongest terms, to consider how much more noble and glorious it was to die sword in hand, in defence of one's own country, than to submit to a life of the basest and most ignominious slavery? This alternative the generous prince displayed in such lively and affecting colours, that they unanimously resolved to sally out upon the enemy, with a becoming bravery, on the next day, and either conquer or die. This noble resolution was immediately put in execution, and all proper preparations were made with all possible diligence, against the next day, which they all now waited impatiently for. However, before the wished-for morning appeared, they were surprised with the sudden news of a more effectual deliverance, as well as more suitable to their singular bravery, beyond what their most sanguine wishes could have surmised or expected. The Fezian king was murdered that very night by one of his own subjects; the news of which, being brought to the city, inspired the king and its citizens with fresh courage; upon which they followed him out of the gates, and fell upon the enemy's camp, then in the utmost confusion and disorder, with the utmost fury and resentment, killed vast numbers, and totally dispersed the rest, who left their camp, with all its plenty and variety of provisions, as well as immense store of other rich plunder, behind, as a a spoil to the starved Tremecenians, and a due reward of their singular bravery and constancy ; and the wealth they found in their camp helped to repair, in a great measure, the damages which they had received during that long and dreadful siege †.

ABOUT forty years after, Abu'l Hassan, the fourth king of Fez, of the Marinian family, built a fortress within two miles westward of Tremecen, after which he began that long thirty months siege, lately mentioned, making daily some fresh and obstinate assaults, and every night erecting new forts against it ; so that, at length, the Fezians made a sufficient breach to scale and enter the place ; and, having made themselves masters of the Tremecenian king, carried him captive to Fez, where he was quickly after murdered, and his body cast among the common filth of the city, by order of his inhuman conqueror ‡.

b THIS did not, however, prevent the Tremecenian crown continuing in the same family about 120 years, without any considerable alteration, excepting that they were constrained for a short space to become tributary to Abu Ferez, king of Tunis, and to his son Hutman ; but the tribute was withdrawn on the demise of the latter. They continued in the quiet possession of their dominions, and of a most advantageous commerce with the Genoese and Venetians, who yearly resorted with their merchant-ships to the two considerable sea-port towns of Auran and Marsalquibir, till the time of Ferdinand king of Spain, in the reign of Abu-Chemen ; upon which the Tremecenians rebelled, and drove him out of his dominions. This last was no better than an usurper, who had revolted from his uncle Abu-zeijen, and kept him confined several years ; but, upon the expulsion of the traitor, he was again restored to the crown. He did not, however, enjoy his kingdom long before he was slain by the Turkish pirate Barbarossa, who had, by this time, made himself master of this kingdom, as we shall see more fully in our history of Algiers ; upon which Abu-Chemen resolved to make a second effort to wrest it out of his hands. But as he had neither power nor interest sufficient for such a bold enterprise, he applied to the emperor Charles V. for assistance ; offering to become his vassal and tributary, and to entail the same tribute on his successors, from the moment he had acquired the quiet subjection on his possession of it. The emperor easily listened to this proposal, and furnished him with men and money for that purpose, so that he was soon put in a condition to attack Barbarossa, and to drive him out of his new conquest ; after which he severely revenged himself on such of the Tremecenians who had been accessory to his expulsion. He likewise gratified the Spanish soldiers who had assisted him, and sent their officers home laden with tokens of his gratitude and generosity, and allowed the emperor a large yearly revenue, as long as he lived. But, after his death, his brother Abd'alla, who succeeded him, relying on the power and friendship of the Turkish Soltan, Soleyman, then on the throne, refused to continue that tribute any longer ; and kept quiet possession of it till the year 1526, when it was again reconquered by the Turkish Algerines, and has continued in their hands ever since, as will be seen in a subsequent chapter.

Morocco, &c.

Situation.

Extent.

Climate.

Short frosts.

Scarcity of timber.

Abundance of springs and rivers.

Famed for horses and horsemen.

THESE two kingdoms, which now compose one empire, were once part of the ancient Mauritania, described in a former part of this work <sup>a</sup>, and are situate on the most western borders of Barbary, being bounded on that side by the ocean, on the east by the river Muluya, which parts it from Algiers, on the north by the Mediterranean, and on the south by the great Atlas, or rather by the river Sus, which divides Morocco from the province of Darbas, and by part of the kingdom of Taflet. The whole empire extends itself from 28 to 36 degrees of north latitude, and from the 4th to the 9th degree of west longitude from London. Its greatest length is from the north-east to the south-west, amounting to above 590 miles (A); but in breadth not above 260, according to the most recent observations, where broadest, but not above half of that where narrowest.

EACH of these kingdoms retains still its old name, though the empire and emperors are chiefly called by that of Morocco, or, as the Spaniards write it, Marruecos, as the most considerable of the two. Each of them is likewise divided into inferior provinces, of which Morocco contains seven; viz. Hea, Sus, Gefula, Morocco proper, Ducala, Escura, and Telda; and that of Fez seven more; viz. Azgar, Chapous, Errif, Fez proper, Garet, Hazbat, and Temefine <sup>b</sup>. Some only divide the whole empire into three principal provinces;
viz. Morocco, Fez, and Sus; and others again enlarge its boundaries beyond the last-mentioned province southward, as far as the river Niger, which would give it near 1200 miles in length from north to south; but if any of the Sharifs of Morocco ever extended their dominions so far, all that lies beyond the river Sus is so desert and barren, that it hardly deserves being looked upon as a part of that empire; especially as it is inhabited chiefly by wandering Arabs, who acknowledge no submission to any but their own Cheyks <sup>c</sup>.

THE climate is every-where hot, and much more so as it extends itself more to the south, yet is generally healthier than those of Algiers and Tunis, being pleasantly diversified and moderated by mountains and plains, and cooled by the sea breezes, which fan it, especially on the west, from the Atlantic ocean; so that it is reckoned much more temperate than one would imagine it from its situation. The great mount Atlas, which surrounds it on the south like a crescent, hath its tops covered with snow a great part of the year; and even in the vallies it freezes sometimes very hard in the night, during the winter months, but the next day's sun commonly melts it away; so that there is scarcely any to be seen by noon-tide. Their rainy season usually begins about October; and if it continues too long in summer, it seldom fails of producing some pestilential fevers: the north-west winds likewise, which begin to blow about March, prove sometimes so sharp and violent as to affect the lungs, nerves, and limbs, as well as their fruits, and other products of the earth. In other respects they enjoy a clear and serene sky, and wholesome air, as they have but very few woods to stagnate it; and those they have are in some measure destitute of timber trees. The country in general is well watered with springs, and very considerable rivers; most of the latter have their source on mount Atlas, and empty themselves either in the Atlantic ocean, or in the Mediterranean, after a course of windings of some hundreds of miles <sup>d</sup>. These mountains likewise abound in mines of sundry metals, especially copper, breed vast quantities of cattle both small and great, as well as of horses, mules, and asses, all useful in their kinds.

THIS country hath been always famous for its horses; which, though inferior in size, make up that defect by their fine shape, fleetness, and particularly by their peculiar docility. The inhabitants have been no less celebrated for their dexterity in breaking, training, and riding of them, ever since the time of the Romans †; and even to this day are allowed to excell all nations, and to be, in some measure, inimitable in both. They have two other creatures

(A) This length is variously taken and reckoned; we have computed ours from the two most opposite points, in a transverse line, from N. E. to S. W. that is, either from Cape Forcas, or rather from the mouth of the river Muluya, to that of the river Sus; whereas, taking it in a direct line from north to south, it will be found to be little more than 500 miles. The breadth we likewise compute from mount Miatbir, near the spring-head of the Muluya above-mentioned, on the Algierne side, to the mouth of the Ommirabi, near the seaport of Azamora, where it extends itself from east to west almost six degrees (1).

(1) Concerning these limits the reader may collect the different computations from the authors above-mentioned, compared with the map hereunto annexed.

- a which are extremely useful to them, and well suited to those climates ; the one for speed ; viz. their dromedaries, of which we have spoken in some of the foregoing chapters ; and the other for burden, and for long journies over those dry and barren deserts, through which they are forced to travel in their caravans to Egypt, Arabia, Libya, and other countries ; viz. their camels, a creature seemingly designed by Providence for those climates, and with which this country abounds more than any other in Africa, and which, we are told<sup>c</sup>, vastly exceed those of Asia ; for they will not only travel ten or more days without water, but without any other sustenance than what each part of their bodies contributes to their preservation ; so that in such cases their bunches will be first observed to decrease, next to that their bellies, and lastly their hinder parts ; by which they become at length so feeble and emaciated, that they will sink under a load of 100 weight ; whereas they could carry one of above 800 or 900 at their first setting out, and would continue so to do, if supported with sufficient nourishment, to the end of their journey (B).

- The lands in general, both upper and lower, are so good, that, if they were cultivated with more industry, they might be made to yield most of the products of other parts of the world, and in as great plenty. But that is not to be expected in a country which groans under such a tyrannic government. They are commonly computed to be capable of producing 100 times more than the inhabitants consume, and, where duly cultivated, will yield two or three crops in a year ; yet lie waste, and without a proprietor every-where, except about three or four leagues about their towns and cities, through the cruel exactions of the government, and the frequent inroads of the plundering Arabs. The northern parts, however, are most productive of corn, oil, wine, fruits of all sorts, wax, honey, silk, and the finest wool ; and the southern of dates, sugar, cotton, indigo, variety of gums, ginger, &c.<sup>e</sup>

- The inhabitants of this empire are, like those of Algiers and Tunis, a mixture of, 1. Berebers, or, as they style themselves, the antient natives, who still follow their old customs, language, and poor way of living in huts on the mountainous parts, for the sake of enjoying their liberty ; so that these have never been entirely subdued. 2. Arabs, who are here also of the wandering kind, and range from place to place with their numberless herds, cultivate the plains, sow corn and other grain on the most fruitful spots, and whose chief wealth consists in their cattle, horses, and grain. These are no less impatient of all foreign yoke ; and, tho' they are under a kind of tribute, live under Cheyks of their own race and chusing. Some of their tribes there are, however, who live rather upon plunder than industry, and cannot be easily suppressed, as they commonly live in some of the most inaccessible parts, from which they make their excursions on the low lands, and against the caravans and other travellers. 3. The Moors, who are mostly the descendants of those who were driven out of Spain ; and, though poor and oppressed, are very numerous, especially along the sea-coast, though they have no trading vessels of their own, nor drive any immediate commerce with foreign nations. These are reckoned covetous and superstitious to a great degree, great cheats, jealous, vindictive, and treacherous, yet inferior to, 4. The Jews, in craftiness and villany. They likewise are, for the most part, such as were obliged to flee out of Spain and Portugal ; and, though the greatest rogues under the sun, are yet suffered to be the chief traders, factors, minters, and bankers, in the realm ; and, by their fraudulent ways and impositions, make themselves ample amends for the grievous taxes and imposts with which they are loaded. But the worst of all are, 5. The renegadoes, who, though not so numerous in these parts as in Algiers and Tunis, yet make a distinct class of people, though hardly less detested by the rest of the inhabitants, than they are by the Christians ; and for that reason, though not employed like the slaves in the lowest and vilest works, yet are not exempt from hard service, such as the guarding the gates of the royal palaces, and fortified places, and such other employments as they are fit for. Some of them are likewise distributed among the governors of the provinces, to be by them made use of as occasion offers. We are even told, by M. St. Olon, that, in time of war, they place them in great numbers at the front of the battle, where they run the risk of being cut in pieces if they are observed to flinch. 6. The slaves make another considerable class, being here very numerous, and much more inhumanly treated than those of Tunis or Algiers, whose thralldom and misery, hard as it is, is a state of rest and happiness, compared to that of those in the Morocco dominions. These all belong to the king, yet are treated far worse in every shape than in any other country, their labour being of the hardest and vilest kind, and almost without intermission, their pittance a pound cake of a coarse barley bread, sodden in a little oil, which yet they are often forced to cram into their mouths with one hand, while the other is employed in some grievous drudgery. Their lodging at night is a subterraneous dungeon, about five fathoms in diameter, into which they go down with a rope-ladder, which is afterwards drawn up, and the mouth of the prison is fastened with an iron grate. Their dress is of a piece with all the rest, consisting of a long coarse woollen coat with a hood, which serves them for a cap, shirt, coat, and breeches. To crown this quintessence of their misery, they are harnessed in carts, with mules and asses, and more unmercifully lashed for every the least inadvertency or intermission of their business, though owing, perhaps, solely to their strength being quite exhausted through labour, hunger, and drought. In a word, those monsters of cruelty take a singular pleasure, and even make a merit, to torment those unhappy wretches; and the only alleviation they allow to their worse than Egyptian thralldom is, that they exempt those that are married from hard labour, the women on account of their breeding and nursing a new brood of slaves, and their husbands probably on the same account; but neither the one nor the other are fed, clothed, or lodged, better than the rest. Some of them are, moreover, permitted to make brandy, the materials for which the Jews furnish them with, and pay a tax for it to the emperor, who is made to believe that the Europeans would lose all their vigour and ingenuity, if they were not revived by that liquor. These are the six different sorts of people who inhabit this large empire (C), and of whose various conditions it may be justly said, that bad is the very best, but the worst hath nothing equal to it on this side hell.

(B) The greatest part of these, as well as their fine horses, are bred by the Arabs, who live altogether upon those wild uncultivated mountains ; and, having fitted them for use and service, sell them to the townsmen, or exchange them for other commodities with the Jews and other traders ; from hence they are transported into other countries, and are commonly known by the name of Barbary horses (2).

BUT there is still another nation whom we have not yet mentioned; viz. another race of Moors, which is the only one that bears the greatest sway, and makes the noblest figure in all those dominions, especially ever since Muley Ishmael obtained the government of them, tho' in all respects they are no less exposed to that tyrannic government, and even more to the avarice, jealousy, and cruelty, of a sovereign, merely on account of the wealth and privileges they enjoy under him. A danger which the rest can more effectually ward off, by concealing the little they have, and letting nothing appear among them but poverty and misery.

WE have formerly given some account of the principal rivers of this country, and endeavoured, notwithstanding the variety of names by which some of them are called by antient geographers, to ascertain their correspondence with their modern ones<sup>i</sup>; and shall now only supply what is wanting there in the descriptions, or omitted in the enumeration of them. We begin with the Mulwyah, Molucha, Mulvia, by Marmol, Mulvya, but more properly Mullooyah, which divides the kingdom of Fez from that of Algiers. It springs from the foot of mount Atlas, in the province of Cbaus, runs through the desert of it, and between those of Garret and Angued; then winding round the mountain of the Benizeti, falls into the Mediterranean, near the town of Cassaca<sup>k</sup>. Taga, by the antients Taluda, Tamuda, and Tanuda, springs from the same mount, and discharges itself into the Mediterranean, but much nearer to the streights of Gibraltar, to the eastward of the promontory of Gebha. These two are the only ones of note that fall into that sea; and the last is only remarkable for a city of its name built on the banks of it, and supposed by Dupin to be the Tanudajensis Episcopatus, under the jurisdiction of Carthage.

THOSE that fall into the Atlantic are the Sebou, or Cebu, and Subro, which runs from mount Atlas through the provinces of Fez and Asgar, and in its course cuts its way through two steep rocks of a prodigious height, near the mountain of Beni-yazga, and falls into that sea near Mamor, a city destroyed by Almanzor, about twenty miles north of Salee. The method which the mountaineers have to convey themselves from one side of this dreadful chasm to the other, is no less singular than hazardous, which is by seating themselves in a strong basker, big enough to hold about ten people, and runs by a pulley along a stout cable, which is

(C) To these we might add another sort, that seem to differ wholly from the rest in every thing but their human shape, and who lie dispersed in most provinces of the realm, especially in that of Hea. These are always in arms, live wholly upon the plunder of their neighbours, and of every thing that comes into their way. They have no notion of justice or probity; can neither write nor read; climb up the steep rocks, and ravage the plains like wild beasts, and eat, lie, and fight, like them. They use lances, bows and arrows, but without method or order; and, when closely pursued, flee to the tops of the mountains, or narrow defiles, whence they endeavour to overwhelm their pursuers with their weapons and volleys of stones. They are very robust, and their wives very handsome, which makes them extremely jealous of them, and use them with the utmost cruelty, upon the least occasion. They profess the Mohammedan religion, but know no more of it than what their Alfakis are pleased to teach them, which cannot amount to much, seeing these are for the most part ignorant of it (3).

a fastened at both ends to two beams fixed in the rock, and is drawn by the people on the opposite side; so that, if the basket or any of the tackle chance to break, as it hath sometimes done, by the weight of the passengers, they fall into the river from a height of above 1500 fathom<sup>1</sup>. This river, which Marmol styles the largest in all Mauritania, abounds with the most excellent fish, the farm of which brings in to the emperor above twenty thousand ducats<sup>m</sup>.

b THE next in rank is the Ommirabib, or Ammirabea, corruptly Marbea and Umarabea. It Ommirabib; hath its spring-head on mount Magrau, one of the heads of the Atlas, in the province of al. Marbea. Tedlez, near the confines of Fez, whence it runs through the plains of Adachson, through sundry strait vallies, in one of which it hath a beautiful bridge built by Abu'l Haschen, the fourth monarch of the branch of the Beni-merini; thence, winding southwards, it waters the spacious plains between Dukala and Temesena, after having received the Dernu and Niger, as Marmol calls it, or, according to Leo and Sanfon, the Quadel or Huedei-abid, that is, the River of Servants; from thence it widens considerably in its approach to the ocean, into which it discharges itself, and forms a capacious bay, on the east side of Azamor. This river is fordable neither in summer nor winter, so that the inhabitants are forced to ferry their effects over by the help of baskets, fastened to leathern pontons, or over rafters. Its fish furnishes not only all that country, but even Spain and Portugal<sup>n</sup>.

c THE Tensift is deep and large, and springing from the heights of the Atlas, near the town Tensift. of Animmey, or rather Hanim-mey, runs through the provinces of Morocco and Dukala, and enters the ocean near the port of Saffi. It receives a considerable number of other rivers in its course, the most noted of which are the Gicfelmel Agmed, and Hued Nefus, or Neffis, which have their spring near the same mountain; and, having watered the fertile plains of Morocco, fall into the Tensift. This last, though, for the most part, very deep, is yet fordable in many places, during the summer season, and hath, in the neighbourhood of Morocco, a most stately stone bridge, of fifteen arches, built by the great Almanzor, which is justly esteemed Its stately bridge. one of the noblest structures in all Africa. But three of these arches have been demolished by Abu Dubu, one of the last kings of the Almohede race, to prevent his rival following him over it, and have never been rebuilt since. The Tensift parts the provinces of Dukala and Hea, and is supposed to be the Phut of Ptolemy, who places the city of Asama at the mouth of it<sup>o</sup>.

d THE last river of note in this empire is the Sus, which gives its name to the province which The Sus. it waters in its course from the Atlas to the Atlantic ocean, and is the southern boundary which divides it from the province of Darba. This river is very large, and is, by the inhabitants, cut into a vast number of chanel, which renders the province one of the most fruitful, tho' the most southern, of all. Each side of its banks is variegated with rich corn and pasture lands, gardens, and orchards; it turns a great number of sugar mills, so that the inhabitants of this province, who are chiefly Berebers, of the tribe of Musamoda, are very numerous and wealthy, and live much more comfortably than those of Hea, especially those who live in the towns, and are employed in the sugar manufacture. Most geographers take the Sus to be e the Una of Ptolemy, who places it in the 8th degree of longitude, and 28 degrees 30 minutes of latitude. It is commonly full and rapid, and often overflows the low lands in winter, but in summer is both shallow and narrow<sup>p</sup>.

f BESIDES these six principal rivers, there is a prodigious number of others that fall into them, some of which are also cut into variety of chanel, and greatly enrich the lands on both sides, but have nothing else remarkable, if we except that of Hued Agmed, which hath its fountain-head on the mountain of that name, and whose water is always clear. It waters the fertile territory of the city of its name, once the capital and seat of the empire, and about eight leagues east of the city of Morocco. It runs through some vast fertile tracts, quite to that metropolis; soon after which it sinks under ground for some space, and then rises again, and falls at last into the Tensift<sup>q</sup>.

WITH regard to the mountains of this empire, we have already observed that the great Mountains. Atlas surrounds it on the south, in the form of a crescent, and divides its dominions from the province of Darab, or, in a larger sense, divides Barbary from Biledulgerid. This large chain, which stretches itself from west to east, that is, from the city of Messa on the Atlantic ocean, in 9 degr. 30 min. of west longitude, and 30 deg. 15 min. of latitude, quite across Barbary, to mount Meys, in the desert of Barca, about 80 leagues west of Alexandria, is called by the natives Ayduacal, but changes its name often, according to the multitude of territories it runs through, and the vast chasms of plains and vallies that intersect it, in the same manner as the Pyrenees, Alps, Apenines, and many other ridges of that kind, are found to do, though they bear one general name. This we are upon is called great Atlas, to distinguish it from the little one, which is another ridge that extends itself along the Barbary coast, from the streights of Gibraltar quite to the district of Bona, in the kingdom of Algiers, and is, by the natives, called Erriff. Both chains being of such a vast height, and, for the most part of the year, so covered with snow, as to be seen at a vast distance off at sea, are called by the Spaniards, Montes Claros, or Bright Mountains<sup>r</sup>, and by the natives, formerly, Dyris, and Adyris, according to Strabo<sup>s</sup>, who hath probably given that Greek termination to the Phœnician Dyrim and Adyrim, which, in that language, signifies any thing that is mighty<sup>t</sup>.

the great At-
habitable.

THE great Atlas, though running through so warm a climate, that is, almost under the 30th degree of latitude, is, nevertheless, in many parts, uninhabitable, either through their extreme heat and coldness, their ruggedness and inaccessibility, or the vast forests which cover the eminences, and shade and darken the vallies below, from which such a number of springs and rivers flow. The highest and most difficult of access are those which run along the confines of the kingdom of Tremecen, and the coldest, those that extend themselves along those of Morocco. As to the generality of the rest, they enjoy a much kinder climate, and are not only inhabited by the various tribes of Berebers, Arabs, and other African people, but, in many places, well cultivated and fertilized, and a number of towns and villages dispersed in them, well inhabited, and stored with abundance of cattle: though in many of these they are obliged not only to retire into their vast caverns all the winter season, which is there very long, but to take in with them all their numerous herds, which would otherwise perish with excessive cold, and deep snows, as well as those who were left to take care of them (E). But as soon as the snows begin to melt, the mountains yield such plenty of herbage, besides good barley and other grain, that they appear quite covered again with men and cattle, all severally expressing their joy at their return to a kind of new life, and the all-reviving summer season. For in all these parts they can hardly be said to have any more than these two; the former of which, and a most dismal one it must be supposed to be, begins about October, at which time the snows begin to fall, and force them into their gloomy retreats till the month of April, when the other begins; and, by a gradual thaw, discovers the grass, barley, and other herbage, which had grown up under the snow, in their most delightful verdure, and ready to raise into a stalk, as fast as the warmth of the weather comes on. Some of the inhabitants are even so industrious, as to form terraces on the declivity of the bare rocks, and to build a kind of wall on the bottom, to prevent the earth being washed away<sup>u</sup>.

ous and well
cultivated.

Men and cattle
live in cavernous all the winter.

As the several branches or parts of this great chain are more or less dispersed through all the fourteen provinces of this empire, as well as through the kingdoms of Algiers, Tunis, and Tripoli; and we have, in these three last, given an account of the most remarkable of them; so we hope the reader will not be displeased if we do the same, in a few words, in this chapter, both with regard to the mountains themselves and their inhabitants. We have already taken notice of those wild ones that inhabit the mountainous parts of the province of Hea, who prefer a plundering wretched life to industry; and though those are not the only mountaineers who do so, yet there are a much greater number of a different character, especially among the antient Berebers, about whose lofty habitations we find plenty of the necessaries of life produced by their labour. Such is the mountain called Beni Mager, so called from the vast numbers of pines, cedars, and jubeb trees, which grow upon it, but which, by the industry of the inhabitants, produces great quantities of corn and barley, and other necessaries of life. This mountain, which is in the province of Dukela, hath a lake at the foot of it, filled with the greatest variety of fish<sup>v</sup>. That of Morocco hath no less than eight such mountains, whose inhabitants are equally fit for the sword and the plough, and abound with grain, fruits, cattle, and pasture grounds. The chief is called Deren-deren, whose inhabitants were with great difficulty subdued by the Sharifs, though headed by a young heroine, who behaved

(E) The snow falls so thick, in the vallies especially, that their houses, or rather huts, will be covered with it in one night, so that, by the next morning, they are obliged to set all hands to work, to sweep or shovel it in heaps, to open a way out. And there is a long and narrow streight near the town of Agmet, through which the caravans from Numidia pass into Barbary, with their camels loaden with dates, about the month of October, where the snow sometimes falls above a rod deep in one night, and overwhelmeth both man and beast.

The most considerable rivers that spring from mount Atlas, are the, 1. Sus. 2. Tensiff. 3. Tecchino. 4. Hued el Abid. 5. Burregreg. 6. Bekth. 7. Subu. 8. Lucus. 9. Melulo. 10. Melucan. 11. Mulowyah, or Mulwya. 12. Zos. 13. Tefn. 14. Mina. 15. Kel. 16. Hued Jaer. 17. Hued el Quibir. 18. Suf-Jemar. 19. Yadok. 20. *Hued y! a with surprising valour and conduct. The mountain of Zalag, or Seleg, in the province of Fez proper, and near the capital of it, is covered with vines, which yield excellent grapes, and so pleasant, that many of its citizens have their country seats upon it. That of Zarbon, or Zaranban, resembles a kind of forest, from the prodigious quantities of olive and other fruit-trees that grow upon it. The men are martial and stout, and the women handsome and polite. There is an old castle upon it, which they pretend to have been built by Pharaoh's Pharaoh, king of Egypt, who pursued Moses in his flight, quite to these parts; but which is casile more likely to have been the work of the Goths.

b THE mountain of Aaron, in the province of Habat, is mostly inhabited by Berebers, who are famed for their valour and indefatigable industry, and are accounted the best soldiers in all Barbary, but are, on that very account, so heavily loaded with taxes, that they can just barely live by their labour. The Sharifs allow them neither arms nor horses; but if they are obliged to it, on some particular occasions, they take both away from them as soon as the campaign is over. They are reckoned about 10,000, all fit to bear arms.

c THE next to it, called Beni-zeker, is still larger, and contains 15,000 men fit to bear arms. Beni-zeker. But these are richer, and drive a good trade in honey, wax, and hides, which they exchange Their traffick. for wheat and barley, which are here very scarce. Amegara, in the same province of Habat, though covered with timber-trees fit for shipping, doth yet produce great quantities of corn and wine. And that of Hued-Idris, called also Guadres and Vatres, situate between Ceuta Hued-Idris. and Tangier, is inhabited by such warlike people, that the kings of Granada chose them above all others for their guards. And it was upon this mountain that the celebrated African warlike Buba-lul was born, whose memory and name are still held in the highest veneration. The province of Errif hath above 24 of these spacious mountains, though not equally fertile and populous. That of Beni Oriegan is covered with vines, cedar-trees for building of gallies, Oriegan and Beni Manzor. olive and other fruit-trees. The women are arrant sluts, and very lewd, and their husbands no less jealous and vindictive. That of Beni Manzor, contiguous to it on the east side, is of a larger extent, but nothing near so fertile. The inhabitants gather scarce any thing besides a little barley and millet, which are their chief food; but hold a yearly fair for the bringing of d other provisions to them.

e THE province of Guaret hath, among others of less note, those of Quizna, or Teuzin, Quizna and Teuzin. and Guadan; the former inhabited by Berebers, and the latter by Arabs; both of them rich and warlike, and enjoying, by means of some small tribute, a greater share of liberty and politeness than any in the empire. Those of the province of Cutz, or Chaus, about fifteen in number, spread themselves above 35 leagues from east to west, and about 14 from north to south, and are inhabited by Zeneguas, a different tribe of Berebers, stout and valiant in Zeneguas, a deed, but fierce and cruel, who put all to death that fall into their hands, and to whom the cruel tribe. caravans are forced to pay a tribute, to avoid their fury. Some of these mountains have mines of silver; but those barbarians chuse rather to get that metal ready coined out of the pockets Silver mines. of travellers, than to dig it out of the bowels of the earth. That of Miath byr, or Hundred wells, so called from the great number it hath of them, is not so famous upon that account, as for a superstitious tradition, which was current among the Fezans, that those wells were A superstitious filled with treasure; and thousands of idle fellows were continually sent by them in quest of folly. it, for a long series of years, without being discouraged by the ill success of those that had gone before them, or deterred by the many lives that were lost in that dangerous search, till a lucky accident, which happened to one of them, convinced the rest of their folly, and put an end to that stupid notion (F). This mountain hath neither village nor house, but some antient ruins on the top, and a well so deep, that the bottom could never be found out *. We shall conclude this article with observing, that many of these mountains are so high, and the night f so piercing cold, that the inhabitants, who breed up great quantities of cattle, are obliged to gather them about their huts, and to keep a constant fire all the night, which preserves them at once from being frozen to death, and from the jaws of the lions, which haunt these mountains, but are kept at a distance by the fires †. Fires made in the night for the cattle.

(F) These wretches were forced, in their search after this pretended hidden treasure, to pry into those subterraneous places from one hole to another, by the help of lighted torches, but which were often put out, by the flutter which the bats, owls, and other such creatures, made with their wings; after which they wandered in the dark, till they were almost perished with hunger and cold. But one of them at length having the good fortune, in groping his way out, to take hold of a creature which they call Dabuh, and is, according to Leo Africanus, of the bigness of a wolf (5), he followed him through a long cleft in the rock, which opened into a thick wood, at the bottom of the mountain. This aperture was no sooner perceived, than multitudes came on purpose to dig on each side of the cleft, but had the misfortune to see their works overflowed with water; which put an end to their proceedings and hopes, though not to their notion of hidden treasure (6).

Chief cities of the empire. IT is time now to leave these poor and cold eminences, to take a more delightful view of their cities, those at least of every province which have any thing worth notice in them ; which is the case of so few of them, that our readers will be glad enough to be eased of the dull round of all the rest, especially as they have little else to present to their view, but some few melancholy monuments of their antient splendor, and these mostly destroyed by time, wars, and Mohammedan fury, and half buried in the common ruins. We begin with the capital, from which the whole empire now hath its name.

Morocco. MOROCCO, by its pleasant situation, and the number and variety of its noble edifices, may be justly esteemed the richest and most considerable city in Africa, though much sunk from its pristine grandeur, both with respect to the number of its houses and inhabitants, and the magnificence of its palaces and other public structures (G). It is conveniently seated between two rivers, the Nephtis and the Agmed, and upon that of the Tenist, all spoken of before, on a spacious plain, reckoned above 50 miles in length, about 16 north of mount Atlas, 170 from the Atlantic ocean, and near the same spot where Ptolemy places the antient Boccanum Hemerum, if not on the ruins of it. The city is encompassed with very high stone walls, the cement of which resists the force of the pick-ax, and will even strike fire ; insomuch that, though it hath undergone such frequent and obstinate sieges, and been so often plundered and damaged within and without, there is not the least token of a breach to be seen in them. They are likewise flanked with strong and lofty towers, with bastions and other bulwarks, and surrounded with a wide and deep ditch. The gates are still 24 in number, and retain some tokens of their pristine strength and beauty, though not of their use ; and the houses are dwindled from 100,000 to less than one third of that number, the rest lying now waste, or turned into gardens, orchards, and corn fields, and many of the noble structures that adorned it, either destroyed or gone to ruin. However, there remain in the part which is inhabited many stately buildings, particularly the royal palace, three magnificent mosks, some few baths and hospitals, together with some antient inscriptions in Arabic, which seem to indicate the name of the founder, in words to this effect : Under the reign of Jausiph Ebn Texifin, &c. (H) <sup>2</sup>.

The castle and imperial palace, its fortifications. THE Al Cassava, or Michowart, within whose cincture is the imperial palace, is a large fortress on the south side of the city, and capable of containing above 4000 houses. The walls that surround it are high and strong, flanked with lofty towers, bastions, and other works, and surrounded with a good ditch. It hath only two gates, one on the south, facing the adjacent country, and the other on the north, leading to the city ; both of them very grand, and guarded by a company of soldiers, to prevent any Christian slaves going out without their keepers. This gate faces a strait handsome street ; at the end, and in full sight of which, in the center of a spacious court, stands the magnificent mosk built by Abdalmumen, king of the Almohedes ; but which, they tell us, being too low for its bulk, was raised 50 cubits higher by his grandson Al Manzor, who also built the great tower of it ; which, for height and beauty, is only to be equalled by those of Rabat, in the kingdom of Tremecen, and of Seville, in Spain, which were the works of the same architect. This noble building was moreover embellished with carvings of jasper, marble, and other costly stone, which, together with the rich stately gates of the cathedral of Seville, covered with bas-relievo work in brass, and bolts of the same metal, that conqueror caused to be brought from Spain, by way of trophies, to enrich this new fabric. On the top of the tower above-mentioned were fixed through an iron spike four large balls of copper, plated so thick with gold, that they were supposed to be all of that rich metal. These were of different sizes, the largest capable of containing eight, the second four, the third two, and the uppermost one, sacks of wheat, all the four together weighing 700 pounds. Their origin, and many other particulars relating to

(G) The founder of Morocco is supposed to have been the famed Abu Techifin, and his warlike son Joseph the finisher of it, after the many signal victories which he gained in Spain, whence he brought 30,000 slaves, whom he employed in surrounding it with walls, 12 miles in circumference. It is affirmed to have contained 100,000 houses, 24 stately gates, and a vast number of palaces, mosks, and other magnificent buildings, many of which have been destroyed by civil wars, or left to go to ruin. So that it comes far short now of what it was in its most flourishing state, notwithstanding the new buildings and other ornaments which have been added to it since by many of the Sharifs (7).

(H) Marmol mentions a strange one which he saw over a tomb, without one of the gates of the city, which runs thus : Here lieth Haly, the son of Attia, who commanded over 100,000 men, had 10,000 horses, and caused 101 wells to be digged in one day, to supply them with water. I married 100 maidens, was victorious and faithful, and one of the 24 generals of Al Manzor. I ended my life in my 40th year. Let him that readeth this epitaph pray to God to forgive me (8).

a them, the reader may see in the margin (I); they being either so little credited or minded by the late Muley Ishmael, that he made no scruple to take them down, and convey them into his treasury <sup>a</sup>.

UNDER this large mosk is a deep vault, of the same length and breadth with the building, Large cistern. in which is repositied an immense quantity of corn, belonging to the emperors; but it was at first designed for a capacious cistern, to receive the rain-water which fell upon the leaden covering, and was conveyed into it by pipes of lead. The battlements of the tower are of such an uncommon height, and offer to the view such a vast prospect round, as seldom fails of striking the beholder with sudden dizziness, from which one cannot easily recover one's self; whilst the tallest men below appear like so many little children: and from thence upwards arises a spire of about seventy feet high, on the top of which were fixed the four (Leo says only three) balls above-mentioned. The royal apartments, the seraglios for the Sharif's wives and concubines, the state-chambers, halls of audience, and the galleries leading from one to the other, are no less splendid and lofty; pillars, moldings, cieling, and other ornaments, all shining with gold, and the furniture answerable. Royal apartments.

THE gardens within, if not so regularly designed and variegated, do nevertheless shew Gardens. something of an uncommon magnificence; being adorned with terrasses, fountains, spacious fish-ponds, shady pavilions, &c. great variety of fruit and other trees, fragrant verdures, and every thing that is curious and delightful. But in the midst of all this splendor, one sees other noble buildings, such as palaces, colleges, baths, hospitals, halls, and other antient edifices, with all the marks of their former splendor, running or run to decay. About 400 Other fabricks going to decay. aqueducts, some broken down, others tottering, and all of them shamefully neglected (K). The houses of the rich and noble are indeed built of stone, but much out of repair, and, which hath still a worse appearance, stand at such a distance from each other, as hardly to form one contiguous street in any part of the city; whilst the chasms between are filled up either with

(I) Some writers affirm these four balls, or golden apples, as they style them, to have been the dowry of some queen of Morocco, who was daughter and heiress of the king of Gagoa, who, to eternize her memory, caused them to be thus planted on the top of that tower. Others say, that one of the wives of the famed Jaacob Al Manzor sold all her jewels to defray the expence of this whimsical ornament.

However that be, the notion that went for current among them was, that they were set up by some extraordinary conjurer, under a proper constellation, and that it was either impossible, or at least extremely dangerous, to attempt the taking them down, and would be attended with some fatal calamity. This notion, the Al-fakis tell you, was so impressed on the minds of the people, that several of their kings had essayed it to their cost; and particularly that, an. 1500, Naker Beuchentuf, being exhausted by an expensive war with the Portuguese, Arabs, and Fezans, having ordered one of them to be taken down to pay his troops, the people surrounded him in a tumultuous manner, and told him they would sooner sell their all, even to their wives and children, to raise him money, than suffer it. Beuchentuf was soon after treacherously poisoned by Muley Hamed; and the people interpreted it as a just judgment for his avarice and irreligion. This did not deter Hamed, in a little time after, from attempting the same thing, and with better success, because he went more cunningly about it: for having caused it to be taken down in the night, and the gold to be taken off by a Jew, who gave him 25,000 pistoles for it, he ordered it to be barely gilt, and set up again in its place, and the Jew to be hanged near it; and caused it to be given out, that the demon to whom the care of these balls was committed had inflicted that punishment on him, for having attempted to take it down. After this report had been spread abroad, which was readily swallowed down by the populace, there seemed to be a final end put to their fears of their being ever taken away: and after such a severe example on the impious Jew, they rested themselves satisfied, that those precious apples were too powerfully guarded ever to become objects of the like furtive attempt. And they were not undeceived in this superstitious notion till a long while after, when Muley Ishmael, who reigned when Marmol was a slave in that capital, caused them all to be taken down, and turned to better advantage (9).

(K) Among those once noble structures, we may reckon near a dozen palaces (for such they were) built by the great Al Manzor for his several ministers of state, guards, treasury, exchequer, halls of audience, judicature, arsenal, magazines, granaries, &c. A little further stands a magnificent pile, which served formerly for a school to the young princes of the royal blood. Another large one, where the kings gave audience to foreign ambassadors. A third, where these held their conferences with the ministers of state. Others for their wives, concubines, children, &c. To these we may add a great number of halls or colleges, where the sciences were taught, and where the doctors and scholars were lodged in stately apartments; together with hospitals no less sumptuous, and richly endowed.

In the first court of the royal palace, the apartments, though built in the moresco style, appeared with a surprising grandeur, adorned with basons and fountains of the finest marble and workmanship, and shaded with citron, lemon, and orange trees, and other odoriferous verdures. The next was embellished with galleries and colonades of white marble, so exquisitely wrought, that some of the nicest judges in architecture, of ours and other nations, have beheld them with the greatest admiration, even in their decaying condition. In this court stood likewise a great number of marble basons and vases, full of water, in which the Moors made their frequent ablutions before prayer. The stables both for riding and carriage horses, mules, camels, &c. were no less splendidly built and roofed; near them were two granaries, capable of containing each 30,000 loads of corn. These were two stories high; the lower for the wheat, and the upper for oats and barley, which were conveyed, by an easy ascent, on mules, to the top of the building, and with such mud houses as all the meaner sort are forced to take up with, with kitchen gardens <sup>a</sup> and orchards, or with old ruins and houses uninhabited and ready to tumble down. This is the present state of that once opulent metropolis, which in Leo's, and even Grammay's time, contained no less than forty-five wide spacious streets, intersecting each other at right angles from end to end, all finely built, and well inhabited, as well as the prodigious number of lanes that ran parallel and collateral to them <sup>b</sup>. All which doleful dilapidations are, in part, owing to the frequent wars it hath been exposed to, the change of sovereigns it hath gone through, but most of all to the tyrannic government it hath groined under ever since the Sharifs made themselves masters of it.

Other gardens. THE gardens, which stand at the farther end of the castle towards the country, and the park almost contiguous to them, shewed both some eminent tokens of their former elegance <sup>b</sup> and costliness, when Mouquet was there; the former of which, besides a prodigious variety of fruit and other trees, shrubs, flowers, &c. was adorned with a noble square spot, railed in with a marble balustrade, in the center of which stood a column that supported a lion, both Marble fountain. of the same stone. This last threw a fine stream of water out of his mouth into a large basin within the rails, on the four corners of which stood four leopards, curiously carved, likewise of white marble, beautifully spotted with round spots of a green colour, and natural to the Park and wild beasts. stone. In the others were to be seen a great variety of wild beasts, such as lions, tygers, leopards, elephants, gyraphos, deer, &c. Our author adds, that he saw the lions kept in a large ruined building, quite uncovered, and to which one ascended by a flight of steps <sup>c</sup>.

The Jewish quarters walled in. AT a small distance from the palace above-mentioned stands the quarter of the Jews, inclosed <sup>c</sup> within its own walls, and with only one gate, which is guarded by the Moors. Mouquet tells us, that in his time there were at least 4000 of them that lived within that precinct, and paid a certain tribute to the government. The foreign agents, and even ambassadors, chuse to live in that place, rather than in any part of the city. As for the rest of the Christian merchants, they commonly live near the custom-house, which stands about three miles distant from the palace. The Jews have always been highly taxed for their liberty of religion and trading; in spite of which there are many of them very rich, as they are the only agents, brokers, money-changers, and minters, in the empire; and there is no doubt but the number of them is greatly increased since that author wrote. But it is, however, their constant <sup>d</sup> policy, in all these despotic governments, to make the meanest appearance in their dress, houses, &c. to avoid being still more oppressed: and well may they do so, when the natural subjects are obliged to do the same, for fear of becoming a prey to those rapacious monarchs, or their ministers. Hence the miserable show that the houses of the middling and common <sup>e</sup> people make, in all the parts of the city that are still inhabited. As for those of the Alcaydes, nobles, military officers, and courtiers, they are lofty, strong, well-built, and surrounded with stout walls, and flat on the top, with a turret in the middle, where they commonly spend the evening in fresco, after the African manner. The river Tensift runs through the city, and hath a handsome bridge over it; on its banks are a variety of mills turned by it, for divers purposes, and from it is conveyed a sufficient quantity of water into all the houses, gardens, &c. to serve their necessities. Thus much may suffice to give our readers <sup>e</sup> such an idea of this famed metropolis, both in its flourishing and declined state, as may enable them to guess at the rest. All we shall add is, that of the twenty-four gates it formerly had, each of which was usually kept by a captain at the head of a thousand horse, there are not now above five or six in use, and guarded by a few rascally Moors; whilst the inhabitants, who, we are told, are reduced to about 25,000, occupy but one or two quarters of the place, which lie between the gates of Dukela and that of Zoco, the one facing the south, and the other the north; all the rest being either turned into gardens and orchards, or, which is worse, into a wilderness <sup>d</sup>.

FEZ, the next in dignity, as being the capital of the once powerful kingdom of its name, is divided into the old and new city. The first of which is the most worthy of notice, <sup>f</sup> as being computed near nine miles in circuit, and is not only the largest, but the most populous, wealthy, and best governed, in all Africa. The immense riches of all sorts which the thence thrown into their proper chambers by trap-doors, and thence, with the same ease, distributed again into the stables and mangers, by proper conduits. The reader may see a more copious description of the beauty and splendor of all these grand edifices in Leo Africanus, who saw them when they were in their full perfection, and Mouquet, who viewed them in their decline (10), but which our limits will not permit us to dwell longer upon.

- a Moors brought thither from Spain, contributed not a little to restore her to her pristine greatness, after a long series of destructive wars had brought her to the lowest ebb. And next to that, the great concourse of scholars, who come from all parts of Africa to study the Mohammedan law, hath helped at once to augment the opulence as well as the number of her inhabitants; to which if we add, that it is the center of commerce in this empire, our readers will not wonder at its so far eclipsing its rival of Morocco, nor at our confining our description chiefly to it; that which is called New Fez having scarcely any thing worth our taking notice of, in a work so extensive as this (L). Old Fez stands on the declivity of two mountains, and the valley that lies between them, and is surrounded by a strong wall of square stone, flanked with stately towers. The houses are square, terraced on the top, and without any windows fronting the streets, like all the rest in Barbary. Those of the rich and wealthy, as well as the colleges, hospitals, mosks, cloisters, baths, &c. have spacious courts, adorned within with sumptuous galleries, fountains, basons of fine marble, fish-ponds, &c. shaded with lemon and orange trees, which are loaded with fruit all the year; all which are plentifully supplied with water from the river Fez, which here divides itself into six branches, and turns about 400 mills for grinding, fulling, and other uses, as well as for conveying water into all those public buildings, and into every house.

THE city hath seven stately gates, but no suburbs. The streets are narrow, but mostly strait; and are shut up at night, to prevent people going out at that time, except upon extraordinary occasions. Most of the houses have turrets on the top, in which the women have neat apartments, and delight themselves with the fresh air and the fine prospect of the city and country. The river here hath no less than 250 stone bridges over it, some of them very beautiful and grand. There are 336 ovens, which are daily employed from morning till evening.

THE mosks are computed to amount to 500, fifty of which are reckoned of the first rank; among which there is one that exceeds all the rest. It is called the Caruvin, and is affirmed to be near a mile and a half in compass, including the college and cloister belonging to it. It hath 30 stately gates, a roof 150 cubits long, and 80 in breadth. The minaret, or tower, is of a stupendous height, supported in its length by thirty, and in its breadth by twenty pillars. The body of the roof is divided into seventeen arches, besides a good number of inferior ones, and the whole supported by 1500 pillars of white marble. Every arch hath lamps burning in them, of a large size, and curiously wrought, particularly that which hangs over the Alfaki's desk, which is of a prodigious size, and surrounded with 150 smaller, all finely cast in brass. They reckon 400 cisterns in the cloister, in which the people repair to make their usual ablutions before prayer, and forty-two galleries, where they keep the sacred utensils belonging to the mosk. Within the cincture of the mosk is a noble spacious college, in which divinity, philosophy, and other sciences, are taught by their most learned men, the chief of whom is chosen president over the rest, and raised to the dignity of Grand Mufti. In this college is likewise one of the most valuable and largest libraries in all Africa; a thing one would hardly expect in this country.

WE have no room to go through their other public buildings, which are very numerous, spacious, and stately; the colleges and hospitals are richly endowed; the magazines and warehouses of the merchants are plentifully furnished with all sorts of merchandizes, both domestic and foreign. We are sensible that Mr. Braithwait, who had an opportunity of seeing

(L) Most authors make three cities of it, as being built at different times, the most antient of which is called Beleyd, and stands on the east side of the river Fez, and is said to have been built by an Arabian king called Muley, or, as La Croix and others will have it, by Idris, the son of Idris, an Arabian patriarch, about an. 801. However that be, it is computed to have above 4000 inhabitants, and is adorned with the noble gardens and fountains of Zingiford. The other old city, built on the opposite side of the river, and founded by prince Hoslem, the grandson of the patriarch above-mentioned, is called Ain Alu, and is computed to contain above 40,000 inhabitants. But in time both cities became subject to different masters, who were often at war, till Jos, an Almoravide king, conquered them both, and put them to death; and, to prevent all future quarrels between the two cities, broke down the wall that parted them, built a bridge over the river, and joined them into one city (11).

The third, or new city, built by Jaacob king of Fez, of the race of the Benimerini, to serve as a citadel and place of residence, stands about a mile distant above the old, and is computed to contain near 10,000 inhabitants, who are divided into fifteen quarters, or wards, according to their different trades and occupations. Besides which it hath a royal palace, which is a noble structure, some stately mosks, colleges, baths, and other public edifices; is very well fortified with walls and other works, and is comprehended with the other two under the common name of Fez; which name, signifying gold, some suppose to have been given to it on account of a great quantity of that metal, said to have been dug up in the laying of its foundation, but which it more properly took from the river on which it is situate (12).

this famous city, in his way to the court of Mequinez, ann. 1727, not only gives a more dis- a advantageous account of it, with respect to its populousness, magnificence, &c. but cries down the descriptions that have been given of it by most authors that have written before him, as greatly exaggerated in all those respects *; and it is not unlikely that the vicissitudes it had undergone since its becoming subject to the Sharifs of Morocco might have greatly diminished its grandeur by that time, especially at this present juncture, when it held out against the forces of the emperor on the throne. However, we cannot reasonably suppose, that if so many learned authors, some of them natives, had so greatly exceeded the bounds of truth, some of those many Europeans, who have since then been in the place long enough to be better informed, would not long ago have contradicted them, and given us a more exact state of it. But be that as it will, we are farther told, that there are no less than 200 inns, b both large and beautiful, for the entertainment of strangers, which pay a certain tribute to the government for their licence. The misfortune is, that, excepting those which are frequented by the Christians, all the rest are a downright sink of unnatural abominations, acted not only impunely, but barefaced; insomuch, that the masters of those Sodoms in miniature are permitted not only to entertain a number of catamites for the use of their customers, but even to stand before their doors, or rove about the streets, some in womens cloaths, to entice people by their effeminate voice, and lewd gestures and songs, into their houses. It is true, indeed, that the Musti, to shew his abhorrence of those prostitutes, in a city which is looked upon as one of the chief sanctuaries of the Mohammedan religion, debars them from entering into the mosks; but that is all the penalty he can inflict upon them; whilst the emperor, who draws a c considerable revenue from those houses, openly tolerates and protects them (M).

Punishments.

In other respects the government of the city is under very good regulations, and the magistracy very strict in keeping it up; and so they had need to do, considering the vast number of its inhabitants, amounting to near 300,000, besides the great concourse of merchants and other foreigners with which it seems to swarm. The prime magistrate, who is stiled provost of the merchants, and is much like our lord-mayor, hath several inferior ones under him, and usually resides in some of the most populous streets, that he may be near at hand to punish all delinquents. Those streets are crowded all the day long with merchants, tradesmen, farmers, custom and other officers, cryers, &c. This chief magistrate is chosen from among the citizens, not by rotation, but merit and ability; but, besides that, there is a governor ap- d pointed by the emperor, who hath a Kadi, or judge, under him, to try criminal causes.
 When a person is condemned to death, if he be a plebeian, he is led through the chief streets of the city, with his hands tied behind, to the place of execution, and is obliged to proclaim his punishment, and the crime for which he has been condemned; and when he is come to the gallows, he is hanged by the feet, and hath his throat cut. But if a gentleman, or person of higher rank, his throat is cut before hand, and the hangman marches before the body, and proclaims his crime. A man that is guilty of murder, is immediately carried to the nearest relation of the deceased, who may either condemn him to what death he pleases, or compound with him for a sum or fine. But if he denies the crime, he is tortured either by the bastinado or scourging, which is done in such a severe manner, that most of them die under the execu- e tioner's hands (N). These severities are, nevertheless, in some measure unavoidable in such populous cities, and among people so naturally given to all manner of pilfering, villainy, and lewdness.

Fez being the emporium and common magazine of Barbary, to which all manner of commodities are brought and exchanged, either for import or export, all the streets swarm either with merchants, or men of all trades and professions f.

(M) We meet with a flagrant instance of this infamous sordidness in Sharif Mohammed, who being reprov-ed for making war against the king of Fez, who was of his own religion, answered, that he did it to punish him for tolerating such an unnatural crime within his dominions.
 So that he had no sooner made himself master of that capital, than he ordered a great number of those catamites to be put to death, and their bodies to be thrown to the dogs. But finding soon after what a wide chasm that severity was likely to make in his revenue, he suffered those monsters to resume their abominable practices with impunity (13).

(N) There is still one circumstance more inhuman attending this kind of ordeal; which is, that when the accused stands proof against it, and is declared innocent, if he hath not money enough to pay the Kadi's and his secretary's fees, the former condemns him to such an additional number of blows or lashes as he thinks will be an equivalent to them (14).

This punishment is likewise for lesser crimes; and often, for want of a present to the Kadi, is executed with such severity, that the person dies under it, or soon after, in the same manner as it is done at Algiers.

a THE imports chiefly consist in spicery, cochineal, vermillion, iron, brass, steel, wire, arms, Imports. ammunition, drugs, watches, small looking-glasses, quicksilver, tartar, opium, allom, aloes, English and other linen and woollen cloths, muslins, callicoes, fustians, gold wire, silks of all kinds, brocades, damasks, velvets, red woollen caps, toys and trinkets of all sorts, Guiney cowries, combs, paper, and a great variety of earthen wares.

THE exports consist in hides and leather of all sorts, particularly the Moroccin, which is Exports. the manufacture of the country, skins, furs, wool, dates, almonds, resins, figs, olives, honey, wax, silks of their own manufacturing, cotton and flax, cloth of the same, horses, ostrich feathers, terrass, variety of pot-ashes, gold-dust, ducats, &c. of both which the Jews have the sole brokerage, for which they pay a considerable tribute to the government. The city Two castles. is defended by two castles, the one old and decayed, and the other of a much newer date and form; but neither of them have any cannon, or any defence but that of a guard of a few companies of Moors. Besides those two castles the city walls have two acute bastions built on two of the highest parts of it, which have only a few old pieces of cannon, and an inconsiderable guard <sup>z</sup>.

FEZ stands in 38 deg. of latitude, and 4 deg. of west longitude.

MEQUINEZ, or Miquinez, is another considerable city, situated on the river Sebu, or Subro, Mequinez. in a large and delightful plain, about twelve leagues westward of Fez, and three to the east of Sallee. It is three miles in compass, surrounded with stout walls, at the feet of which are very delicious gardens, which spread themselves out into the country all around. <sup>a</sup> The inside of the city is full of mosks, colleges, baths, and other public buildings. It hath a continual Market. market, to which the Arabs resort in shoals from all parts, to sell their hides, honey, wax, butter, dates, and other commodities. The palace resembles another city; and, though built Stately palace. in the Moreisco style, hath something surprisingly grand, though much out of repair. The apartments, offices, &c. which are almost without number, are interspersed with parks, gardens, pavilions, and other decorations. It stands on the highest part of the city, and is surrounded with stately white walls, and consists of a great number of spacious squares, and two noble mosks. In one part is the seraglio, a vast extensive edifice; in another the halls of state, audience, council, &c. a third is for the handicraft trades that work for the armory; and in a fourth are lodged the king's artillery, magazines, and a number of his guards. The galleries of all these grand apartments are adorned with variety of mosaic work; the walks, pavements, alleys, gardens, &c. are all kept in good order; and the whole fabric is inclosed within a cincture of three miles in compass.

THE Jews have their quarter in the heart of the city, and have here, and in most parts of the empire, the privilege of shutting their gates up at night, on account of their usefulness in carrying on the commerce (O). Mequinez is parted only by a road from Negro-town, so called Negro-town. from the king's black troops which are quartered in it <sup>b</sup>.

SALLEE, Saley, or Cele, a city mentioned by Ptolemy, stands on the banks of the Gueron, Sallee. now Buragra, or Buregreg, which divides it into two parts; the northern, called by the natives Sela, and by us Sallee, is encompassed with a strong wall, about six fathoms high, and half a fathom thick; on the top of which are battlements, flanked with towers, of a considerable height and strength. The southern part, on the opposite side of the river, is called Ravat, or Rabat, and is of a much greater extent, but incloses a great number of gardens, orchards, Rabat. and corn fields, in which they may sow wheat enough to serve 15000 men. This is likewise surrounded with high walls, said by the natives to have been built by those Christians Walis. which Jaacob Al Manzor, king of Arabia Felix, brought hither from Europe, after his conquest of Spain. On the south-east quarter stands a very high tower, from which they can see Watch tower. a ship at a great distance. It is much lower than it was at first (P), yet serves still for a land-

(O) Or rather, perhaps, to prevent their being robbed or insulted by the pilfering Moors, six of whom were some time ago crucified here, for the murder of a Jew. In other cases they suffer them to be abused by every rascally Moor, as they go along the streets, who call them Cornados, cuckolds, and dogs, and even pelt them with dirt. The noblemen and princes of the blood beat them severely with their whips, if they dare to come in their way as they ride along; and, as a still greater mark of contempt, suffer them not to go out of their quarter with either shoes or boots, but bare-foot and bare-legged. All which they are forced to bear with singular patience, it being sure death to them to lift up a hand against a Moor or Negro (15).

(P) This was owing to a clap of thunder, which struck off some part of the top, and caused a wide rent on the south side, which runs from top to bottom. The tower is 50 feet square, built of stone, jointed by a strong cement, and opens towards a stately mosk 1400 paces long and 300 wide; in the cincture of which is a well 100 feet wide and 30 deep, for the ablutions of those that go to prayers there (16).

mark in the day-time, and for a light-house in the night; and under it are the two docks a belonging to the town, the one for building of ships, and the other for them to winter in. The ascent between these and the tower is so easy, that a man may go up it on horseback.

Harbour.

THE harbour is large, but shallow, seldom rising to above twelve feet at high-water; so that the corsairs which belong to this place are obliged to put into the island of Fedal, at a small distance from it; the entrance of the harbour having a bar across it, which prevents any but the lighter sort of vessels from sailing into it. The town is now guarded by two castles, the old and the new; the one stands directly at the mouth of the river, next to which the walls are built on rocks, and high enough to shelter the governor's house from cannon-shot. The fortifications of it are very irregular, but such as the ground would permit; b and within its walls, which are mostly of square stone, is a fort, just before the principal gate, which commands the whole town. Below it, next to the sea-side, near the point of the rock, facing the bar, is a bastion, mounted with five pieces of cannon, to secure the vessels that come to anchor in the road, or to shelter themselves from the pursuit of the enemy.

New castle.

THE new castle is seated on the west side of the town, and of a square figure, flanked with towers and battlements, like the walls of the city. There is a communication between one castle and the other by a high wall, flanked with two towers, and built upon arches, under which the people pass and repass to and from the strand. On the west side, before the breach c in the town-wall, stands another bastion on a rock, but much neglected of late, which renders the taking of this part of Sallee very easy. The emperor sends thither a governor, who presides over the city council, which is chosen from among the citizens. All merchandizes, imported or exported, pay a tenth part of their value to the governor: but the chief wealth of the place arises from the piratical trade carried on by the corsairs, who are the expertest and boldest of any on the Barbary coast <sup>i</sup>.

Government.

Tefeu-sara.

FROM Sallee one may behold, in a most spacious plain, about eight or nine miles distance, the noble ruins of the antient city of Tefeu-sara, situate on a fertile territory, and inhabited by the Arabs, who have hitherto prevented it, as they have Marmora, Almodine, Alcassar, and a great many more from being rebuilt, that they may have the greater freedom to range about with their herds. d

Mazagan.

MAZAGAN, by some Masignan, stands on the same coast, and about ten leagues south-west of Sallee. It is a strong and well-built town, in the hands of the Portuguese, who keep a good garrison in it, to prevent the Moors retaking it from them, as they did the strong city of Larach, situated on the same coast, near the mouth of the river Lucus, or Lucerio. Mazagan is surrounded with a stout wall, so thick that six horsemen may ride abreast upon it all around, and well furnished with cannon. The worst is, that the pirates often intercept the provisions that are sent to the garrison, which obliges it to make incursions on the neighbouring Arabs for subsistence. It was this inconvenience that caused the loss of Larach, though much more strongly fortified *.

Alcassar.

ALCASSAR, Alcazar, or Alcaçar, formerly Cæsar Al Cabiris, is on the same western coast, e and was once the residence of a governor. It is said to have been built by the famed Jaacob Al Manzor, during his war with Spain (Q), and was formerly a town of good trade, till the Portuguese made themselves masters of it, an. 1458. But though it did not continue long in their hands, it is since gone gradually into decay, and lies now in a ruinous condition <sup>k</sup>. It is called Alcassar Quibir, or the great castle, to distinguish it from Alcassar Zequir, or the little palace, in the same kingdom.

Arzila.

ARZILA stands upon the same coast, within eight leagues of the straits of Gibraltar, and about forty-eight from Fez. It is another of those cities that were taken and held for some

(Q) The occasion of its being built, we are told, was that conqueror's being likely to have perished in a tempestuous night, among the marshes, in pursuit of his game, and at a great distance from his retinue; when perceiving a fisherman's hut, he went into it, and was kindly entertained by the poor man. He asked him whether he could not conduct him to some adjacent town; and was answered, that it could not be done without imminent hazard of both their lives: and, on the next morning, the king being fully satisfied of the truth of what he had told him, bid him ask some recompence for his hospitality; to which he modestly answered, that he should be very thankful to have a better house built on that spot. Upon which that generous prince caused a noble palace to be built there, and made him keeper of it, with a handsome pension, and used often to resort thither for his diversion, and called it by his name Abdul Kerim. He afterwards fortified it; from which time it grew to a considerable town, had a good market resorted to by the Arabs, who brought thither their dates, wax, honey, corn, cattle, &c. (17)

a time by the Portuguese; but being afterwards abandoned by them, have been decaying ever since. It was antiently called Zitia, and supposed to have been built by the Romans, about twelve leagues south of the streights <sup>1</sup>.

TANGIER, on the same coast, but about two miles within the streights above-mentioned, Tangier was antiently called Tingis, and was the capital of the Mauritania Tingitana <sup>m</sup>. It stands on a handsome bay, and was once a very considerable place, and is said by the African fabulists to have excelled all the cities of the world for largeness and magnificence, and to have been surrounded by walls of brass. It had, however, many sumptuous edifices and palaces, and a considerable number of noblemen who resided there in the time of the Goths and Arabians; but being taken by the Portuguese, an. 1471, or 1473 according to others *, grew more considerable for its strength than beauty. At length finding the expence of keeping it exceed by far the advantage they reaped by it, it was readily yielded to the English, as part of the dowry of the princess Catherine of Portugal, upon her marriage with king Charles II. who, at an immense expence and labour, made it one of the strongest places on all those coasts, and built a deep mole, which ran 300 fathoms into the sea. But finding it too chargeable to keep, and the parliament refusing to vote him the sums demanded for its maintenance, caused all those fortifications to be blown up, after twenty-two years possession, an. 1684. Since which time the Moors have endeavoured to repeople it; but have not hitherto been able to raise it above the degree of a mean fishing town <sup>n</sup>.

CEUTA, no less considerable for its advantageous situation at the entrance of the Mediterranean, than for the beauty of its public buildings, and the strength of its walls and bulwarks, by which, and a good garrison, it held out, not indeed a vigorous siege, as the Spaniards style it, but an obstinate blockade, against an army of Moors, is situate on a rising ground, at the foot of the mountain of Apes, which juts out into the streights, and makes the nearest point to the Spanish coasts. It is still very considerable, and a bishop's see, hath a good palace, and noble cathedral. Near it stands the celebrated mountain with seven summits, known to the antients by the name of Septem fratres <sup>o</sup>. The Moors laid siege to it, an. 1697, and have kept it blocked up ever since, without intermission, though without any great likelihood of their ever mastering it.

THE extreme indigence of the natives round about Ceuta makes them so surprisngly active, that they will go, we are told <sup>p</sup>, from Tetuan to Mequinez, which is 150 miles, for a ducat, without minding heat or rain, in less than twenty-four hours. A river in their way causes no delay, because they swim across it with the same expedition that they make on land; and their whole support is only some meal, a few figs or raisins, which they carry in their goat-skins; and their richest liquor water, mixed with a little honey.

SEVEN leagues south of Ceuta stands the city of Tetuan, al. Tetegin, or Tetteguin, upon the rising of a rocky hill, on the streights mouth. It is neither large nor strong, being surrounded by a wall made of mud and mortar, framed in wooden cases, and dried in the sun, without any mixture of broken bricks or stone. Here are not above 800 houses; but the inhabitants, what with piracy and a good trade for leather, wax, honey, raisins, &c. are most of them in good circumstances, without daring, however, to make any shew of it, lest that should give occasion to the government to fleece and oppress them. Its chief strength consists in a stout garrison of about 1500 foot and 400 horse; and the port is guarded by a square castle, flanked with towers of the same materials with the town walls, and, in time of danger, can entertain a garrison of 500 men; and, though it is commanded by the adjacent mountains, yet of great security, and affords a safe shelter to the corsairs, who resort here in great numbers, to take in provisions. On which account the Spaniards attempted to choak up the mouth of the river, by sinking vessels loaded with stones, but the Moors found means to open it again.

THERE is in the heart of the city a large musmorra, or dungeon, wherein they lock up their Christian slaves at night, which are here very numerous, and as hardly used as in any part of Barbary. The inhabitants are mostly the descendants of those Moors and Jews who were driven out of Spain; the latter of whom carry on here a very considerable commerce. The houses are kept so continually white-washed, outside as well as in, that the reflection of them quite dazzles the beholders eyes in the sun-shine.

THE Basha's palace is not only a curious but a magnificent structure, as is also his villa, about two miles out of the town. The mosks and other public buildings are likewise very grand, though in the moresco taste. There are likewise about a dozen cloisters belonging to their Santons, or monks, which are asylas for all manner of crimes, except those against the government. The Jews, who are computed to be about 5000, are allowed to make wine and brandy, by the help of which they often cozen those they traffick with. They have seven synagogues, and no more than 170 houses. The people here, as at Algiers, and other parts of Barbary, visit one another from the tops of their houses, which have handsome turrets on them, in which they regale themselves in the cool of the evening, and which add much to the beauty of the town.

Noble prospect. BUT what completes the delightful prospect is the fertile territory that surrounds it, and which is covered with fine gardens, orchards, villas, with shady walks, avenues, and other fine vistas, especially a spacious burying-ground, on an adjacent eminence, which is adorned with such a beautiful variety of cupolas, pyramids, and other monuments, that it looks like a fine city in miniature. To which, if we add its fine prospect towards the sea, and adjacent hills and plains, and the courteousness and affability of the people, beyond what they are even in their most noted capitals, we shall not scruple to pronounce it one of the most agreeable cities in all Barbary.

The province or kingdom of Suz. WE have now taken a review of the most considerable cities of the two principal provinces, or kingdoms, of this empire; viz. Morocco and Fez; it is now time to say something of those of the third and last; viz. that of Suz, Sous, or Sowz, the most southern of all the three. The river of its name, which, as we observed before, was the southern boundary of the whole empire, divides it from the province of Darah, of which some part still retains the name of Farther Suz, as that on this side of that river is called Hither Suz. But whether the emperor receives any tribute from the former is not certain, nor very material.

Produce. THE province of Suz is mostly, more especially on the south side, intersected by several ridges of the Atlas, from which the many springs that flow render the whole country very fruitful in pasture, corn, rice, sugar, indigo, &c. dates, vines, and other fruits. The river Suz in particular, which, like the Nile in Egypt, overflows all the low lands, and is, like that, cut into canals, doth exceedingly enrich all the territories it runs through. Some of the mountains yield copper and allom, and those of Tibar gold in great quantities, which is called by the negroes Nack-naki, and is conveyed away by the caravans that trade here, and deal likewise in slaves and other merchandizes. The Suz, and other inferior rivers, drive a vast number of sugar mills, as well as for grinding of corn, &c. and the indigo, which grows wild in all the low grounds, without art or culture, is of a most vivid colour, and is made and exported in great quantities. The warmth of the climate, joined to the richness of the soil and plenty of water, makes the harvest very forward, it seldom beginning later than the month of May. The inhabitants, who are mostly Berebers, are very industrious, and many of them live in towns, and are wealthy, and much more polite than those in Fez and Morocco.

Cape Aguer. THE two most remarkable capes are those of Aguer and Nan, or Non; the former on the north-west of the mouth of the Suz, near which the Portuguese built the town of its name, which was at first taken by the famed Diego Lopez de Segueria, who made afterwards a memorable voyage into the East Indies. This adventurer finding the town to have a convenient harbour, famous for its fishery, built a stout fort to defend it. Soon after which Emanuel king of Portugal, having bought it of him, added several other fortifications to the old ones, and put a strong garrison into it. But they were afterwards driven from it by Mohammed, the youngest of the two Sharifs, who became soon after emperor of Morocco and Fez, as will be seen in a subsequent section. The other, about seven miles more south on the same coast, was called Non by the Portuguese, by whom it was imagined the Ne plus ultra, beyond which none had as yet ventured to sail.

Messa. THE cities of this province are not very considerable, either for strength, bigness, or beauty. MESSA is situated on the river Suz, where it discharges itself into the sea, and at the foot of mount Atlas. It is divided into three distinct quarters, about a mile distant from each other, and each inclosed within its own walls. The inhabitants cultivate the lands about it, which are greatly fertilized by the overflowing of the Suz; though, whenever it fails to do so, as it often doth, they are obliged to live mostly upon dates, which are here much coarser than in other parts of Africa. As that river forms no haven, they have but little commerce abroad. The shore before it being flat and shallow, it frequently happens that great whales are cast upon it; and there stands a mosk between the town and the sea, the beams, girders, &c. of which are made of the bones of that fish; which induces the people to believe this to be the place where Jonah was cast on shore. Some ambergris is likewise found on this shore, which is sold very cheap; the Moors looking upon it as no better than the excrements of a whale, or of another fish which they call ambracan.

Tessut. ON the same river, and about three or four miles from Messa, stands Tessut, Tecent, or Techent, and, like it, divided into three parts, but much larger, and more populous. In the heart of them is erected a stately mosk, through which a branch of the river runs. The plain a on which the town is seated, is spacious, and fruitful in corn, barley, pulse, sugar, and variety of fruits. The town is supposed to contain 4000 families, most of them industrious and in good case. The sugar manufactory flourishes, and the finest Morocco leather is dressed here, and exported in great quantities.

TARUDANT, though not a large place, is in a flourishing condition, and carries on a great Tarudant. commerce with the Berebers, who resort to its markets, and are wealthy. Its buildings are handsome, and the adjacent plains fertile. It was once the residence of its own princes, who adorned it with sumptuous edifices, and is now that of the governors of the province, and its inhabitants are reckoned courteous and polite.

b TEDSI hath about 5000 inhabitants; the sugar manufacture is their chief wealth and em- Tedsi. ployment. The great mosk is the residence of the Alfakis, whose chief is sole judge in all religious matters. Its market on Mondays is resorted to by merchants from many parts of Barbary and Negroland, besides the Araûs and Moors. The traffick consists in leather, cattle, Commerce. horses, linen, and woollen cloths, sugar, wax, honey, butter, and a great variety of iron tools. The Jews are numerous and rich, and the people much cried up for their singular courteousness to strangers. The Sharif keeps a governor in it, with 400 horse, to protect the commerce, which is one of the richest on that side of the Atlas. It was formerly a little commonwealth, governed by six of its chief inhabitants, who were chosen and changed every six months; but was afterwards subdued to the yoke of the Benimerini, and since to that of the Sharifs.

c TAGOST, or Tagoast, the largest city in the province, was built by the natives on a spa- Tagost. cious and fertile plain, and surrounded with walls now decayed. It is computed to have about 8000 families, of which about 400 are Jews; the rest, who are Mehammedans, preserve nevertheless, a kind of veneration for the great St. Austin, whom they affirm to have been born there. It enjoys two markets in the week, to which the Arabs and Moors resort with their commodities, and the negroes to buy cloaths. Gared was built by Sharif Abd'alla, who was still reigning in Marmol's time, but is only worth notice for its many sugar mills, and its leather manufacture, the exportation of which into Europe alone, is said to bring in to the Sharif 34,000 l. yearly *. Thus much may suffice for the geography of this empire, and of its three principal provinces or kingdoms. We have now only to speak of that of Taphilet, once d a kingdom of itself, though no very considerable one for any thing; but now become subject to the two emperors, ever since the reduction of its capital of the same name, by Sharif Muley Hamet.

THIS kingdom, which hath its name from its capital, situate on a river of the same, is a Kingdom of long tract of dry and barren ground, running almost east and west, being bounded on the Tapuilet, north by Fez and Tremecen, on the south by the Sahrah, or desert, on the east by Segelmessa, sandy and barren. and the country of the Berebers, and on the west by Morocco and Suz. The extent of it, including the provinces of Itata, Darba, Sakrab, and Towet, is of a prodigious extent, and too variously computed for us to adjust the difference, considering the little knowlege that can be had from the helps now extant of those parts. The country is, for the most part, so sandy e and hot, that it scarce produces any thing of either corn or fruit; the only place where they can sow any barley is along the banks of the rivers, and even there it grows with great difficulty, and but in small quantities, through the violent heat and parching drought that reign through all these regions the greatest part of the year; so that the Alcaides and persons of distinction are only able to purchase it, the common people being so poor, that they are forced to live mostly upon dates and camels flesh, both which are here in great plenty. Water is likewise so very scarce here, except where they live near some river, that they are forced to save that which falls from the clouds in winter, to serve them the whole year. What grows f in greatest plenty, and without art or culture, is their indigo, which, however, yields a more vivid and lasting blue than that which is cultivated with so much care and labour in the American plantations, and brings a very good profit to the inhabitants *. They have likewise abundance of ostriches, of a prodigious size, and good to eat; camels, which carry vast burthens through these barren deserts, and dromedaries (R), exceedingly swift, and chiefly used for

(R) We took notice, a little higher, of a particular excellency of these creatures, as their inhuman owners style it, that they will travel with their heavy burden, without food or drink, till they are quite emaciated, and sink under a tenth part of its weight (18). Those of Taphilet will do almost the same, and differ only from a camel in that they have but two bunches upon their backs, one larger than the other, and are more finely shaped. And we much question whether a circumstance, which we are told by a judicious author, concerning their young ones, be not chiefly owing to the hard use they are put to; viz. that after they are newly foaled for expedition, they commonly travelling 120, or more miles, in one day, and with little a sustenance or refreshment. The chief commerce of the Taphilets and Itatans, besides the indigo above-mentioned, consists in their dates, and in a sort of leather, made of the hides of a creature they call Dantos, or Lantos, which come from Numidia, and are here fabricated into excellent shields *. They likewise make a sort of striped silk of various colours, much used by the Moors and negroes, and also fine cassocks and caps for the men, veils for the women, curious carpets, and other such ornaments. Most of the dates that are brought into Europe come from Taphilet, the emperor not permitting them to be exported from any other place of his dominions, and they are reckoned the best that grow in his whole empire. We are told moreover, that the fine leather that is made here is tanned with the stones of that fruit.

Governed by young Sharifs. Taphilet has always been put under the government of one or other of the emperor's sons, b not so much, perhaps, on account of its having been formerly under its own kings, or Cheyks, as because Muley Ishmael and other Sharifs were natives of it; though it is the least coveted by those young princes of any in Morocco. They entertain here commonly about 4000 troops, mostly horse, to keep the people, who are chiefly Berebers, or Arabs brought hither by the Sharifs, in subjection.

THE emperor, among his other titles, takes that of lord of Taphilet and Darba, and often permits the prince, whom he sends thither governor, to take that of king of Taphilet. And it is likely that the boundaries of this tributary kingdom, which are so variously fixed, extend only as far as these governors think it worth their while to send their troops to levy the usual tribute; but what that amounts to is beyond our power to tell. c

Situation.

THE city of Taphilet, the capital of this kingdom, is situate upon a river of its name, and hath a stout castle, the common residence of the young Sharifs. It is supposed to have been built by the old Berebers, and is inhabited by about 2000 of them, who are distinguished by the name of Fitelis, and are industrious and rich in date-trees, camels, horses, and other cattle. And it is chiefly here that the leather, silk, and linen manufactures, lately mentioned, are carried on. Taphilet hath a large concourse, and may be stiled the rendezvous of merchants, not only from Barbary and Africa, but even from Europe. The people are affable and civil to strangers, but the Arabs extremely addicted to superstition, and several kinds of witchcrafts; some of the most notorious may be seen in the margin (S). Other towns worth our notice we find not in this kingdom, nor any thing except the river of its name, which descends from the d land of Sagara, upon mount Atlas, and directs its course from north-west to south-east; and, after having watered the city and plain of Taphilet, and received, among others, the Segora and Haded, loses itself in the lands of the desert of Darba. Between Taphilet and Darba is a high road, which crosses part of mount Atlas, through which the caravans go to and fro with their merchandizes.

UNDER the kingdom of Taphilet is included the province of Gefula, or Guzula, perhaps a corruption of the antient name of Gætulia *, part of which, if not all, the Sharifs have found means to bring under their obedience. This large territory hath Taphilet on the east, Morocco they will be motionless for a long while, and as in a deep sleep, sometimes about eight days, notwithstanding their running with such incredible swiftness, when they are come to their full strength (19).

(S) This weakness is not confined to the Arabs of this city, but extends to all the Arab tribes throughout this vast tract, and beyond, and hath communicated itself even to the Berebers. They are not only strict observers of the Mohammedan law, and scrupulous in their usual ablutions before prayer, five times a day, and in their dress and eating, but will not touch a bit of flesh, unless the creature hath been killed by one of their sect, which is done in the following manner. The butcher, turning the throat of it towards Mecca, speaks these words: O God, behold this victim which I am going to slay, and grant that we may eat the flesh of it to thy glory. They are no less scrupulous in freeing the flesh from any the least remains of the blood.

They pretend to be the only true observers of the Koran; which they say is but a sequel of the law of Jesus Christ, who ordained even the very dress they were to wear. They have therefore neither gold nor silver among them, wear neither linen nor silk, but wrap up their bodies in a woollen cloth, two or three times round, leaving the arms and legs uncovered. This they call a

In their morning prayers, after the usual washing of their feet up to the knees, and their hands to the elbows, they turn their faces towards the sun-rising, and sitting themselves down on the ground, call upon Cidy Mohammed, their prophet, and afterwards on Cidy Bellbeck, by whom they mean St. Austin, and some other of their saints, among whom they number Cidy Nayssa, which is the name they give to Jesus Christ, whom they believe to have been born of a pure virgin, and conceived by the breath of God; but acknowledge only one person in the Godhead.

With respect to their more ridiculous superstitions, we shall only say in general, that they pay a singular regard to a sort of pretended conjurers and charm-mongers, without whose advice they undertake not any thing of moment, and are by them furnished with amulets, and other pretended preservatives against sickness, fire, water, and other accidents; and these they religiously wear about them, sleeping and waking, and place a greater confidence in them than in their prayers, or other acts of religion. In all which juggling tricks, one may discover a strange medley of astrological and other conjuring cant and superstitious trash, not worth any farther notice (20).

a on the north, Suz on the west, and Darba on the south. Its extent and boundaries are too vague for us to ascertain; neither is there any thing worth our notice in it, except the few following particulars, with which we shall close this section.

THE country is mostly dry and barren, the inhabitants poor and brutish, and the best part of them employed either in the iron or copper mines of the country, or in the fabricature of those metals into all manner of utensils used in Barbary; and these they exchange for horses, linen and woollen cloths, spices, and such other commodities as they want, either by carrying them into other parts of Barbary, or by the frequent fairs they hold in their plains, or in their large towns (for they have no cities), some of which contain 1000 houses, or more. Here is one fair in particular, which is kept in a large plain, and lasts two months, and which is resorted to by strangers from most parts of Barbary and Negroland. During the whole time the Gesulans, though naturally brutish, seem to lose their savage temper, and to shew an uncommon courtesies to all comers; insomuch, that, though these commonly amount to about 10,000 at least, they are all maintained, during their stay, at the public charge, with their servants and cattle; there being persons appointed on purpose to dress their victuals, and furnish them with all other conveniencies, all which is done without tumult or disturbance; to prevent which, as well as quarrelling, fighting, thieving, and such-like disorders, there is always a sufficient number of soldiers under the command of two captains, who immediately seize and punish the offenders; and, if a thief, he is immediately put to death on the spot, and his flesh is thrown to the dogs. One remarkable custom is here established, and religiously kept, that let them be at war with whom they will, they observe a truce three days in the week with all strangers, for the encouragement of their commerce; and the same is likewise done during the two months of the above-mentioned fair.

THE inhabitants of this province are said to be so numerous, that they are able to bring above 60,000 into the field. Their weapons are the scymitar, dagger, spear, and short gun; which last they are supposed to have taken up since their becoming subject to the Sharifs, whom they serve as foot-guards, armed with that and their broad sword. Their dress is only a short striped linen or woollen jacket, with half-sleeves, over which they throw a kind of long coat or gown of coarse woollen cloth, and under which hangs either a dagger or a short two-edged sword. Some suppose them to have no religion at all, at least not that of Mohammed, not so much on account of their ferocity, but because they chuse to begin their great fair on the birth-day of that pretended prophet. They have neither gallows, wheels, nor crosses; but every capital offender is immediately pierced with darts, and his carcase thrown to the dogs.

THEIR country produces very little corn, but plenty of barley, dates, good pasture, and variety of cattle. The Portuguese had once made themselves masters of part of Gesula, and brought it under tribute, but they soon recovered their freedom again, and held it till the Sharifs subdued them; which second loss seems to have been owing to their frequent hostilities against them, and their often plundering their metropolis. But since their reduction, we are told, they have continued very faithful to them, though rather under the name of allies, than subjects and tributaries<sup>2</sup>.

S E C T. II.

f THERE is not, perhaps, under the cope of heaven, a more despotic and tyrannical government than this, especially since the Sharifs have made themselves masters of it; though it was not much better even before that time. Religion, laws, antient customs, and inbred prejudices, all conspire to render the monarch absolute and arbitrary, and to confirm the subjects in the most abject and miserable state of slavery. The former is not only allowed to have an uncontrollable property and power over the lives and fortunes of the latter, but, in a great measure, even over their consciences too; inasmuch as he is the only person who, as successor of Mohammed, sets up for the principal interpreter of the Koran, and appoints all the judges under him, of whom those of Morocco and Fez are the chief, whose business is to explain and dispense all matters relating to their religion; and, being his creatures and dependants, dare not steer otherwise than as he directs (A). Whenever, therefore, any of his laws

(A) This is not, however, to be stretched so far as to say that the *Moor*s in general are very strict and zealous observers. For in such cases both priests and laity will dare to blame and condemn laws are once enacted by him, and proclaimed by his governors in all places of his dominions, as it is commonly done, that none may plead ignorance, they are every-where received with an implicit and religious submission. On the other hand, the subjects are bred up with a notion, that those that die in the execution of his command, are intitled to an immediate admittance into paradise; and those that have the honour to die by his hand, to a still greater degree of happiness in it. After this we need not wonder at finding so much cruelty, oppression, and tyranny, on the one side, and so much submission, passiveness, and misery, on the other.

A strange notion about their kings.

Negroes, why become so powerful.

THIS latter, however, extends no farther than the Moors; for as to the Arabs, the subjection and tribute they pay to those tyrants was always involuntary, and altogether forced; and as for the negroes, their zeal and attachment is owing merely to the great sway and power which they had gained in the government during the last reign, both on account of their being better soldiers than the Moors, but more especially out of a particular regard which Muley Ishmael had for them, on account of his mother being a negro; so that, being now grown in a manner too strong to be suppressed, their loyalty and affection to those monarchs, whom they strive to imitate in all their vices, must be supposed to rise and fall, according to the favour and encouragement they receive from them. And they are now the only ones to whom those tyrants intrust their persons, their treasure, and their concubines, and whom they raise to the highest posts of authority and trust (B), and whom they suffer, not to say encourage, by their own example, to tyrannize and oppress their native, as well as their most faithful and submissive subjects<sup>a</sup>.

Kings sole heirs of all their subjects.

BUT we shall, perhaps, find less reason to wonder at this connivance, if we consider, that, sooner or later, all the extortions of those blood-suckers come in course into their own treasury, either by the heavy fines they impose upon them upon any complaint preferred against them, or upon any other, whether real or pretended, mal-administrations, or by seizing on all their ill-gotten wealth at their deaths. For the emperors here have found means to establish another branch of despotism, which renders them still more powerful and formidable to their subjects; viz. their making themselves their sole heirs, and, in virtue of that, seizing upon all their effects, and making only such provision for their families as they think proper; and often, on some frivolous pretence, leaving them destitute of any, according to the liking or dislike they bear to the deceased; so that, upon the whole, they are the only makers, judges, and interpreters, and, in many instances likewise, the executioners, of their own laws, which have no other limits than their own arbitrary will. To preserve, however, some specious shew or shadow of justice, they allow their Mufti a kind of superiority in spirituals, and a sort of liberty to the meanest subject to summon them before his tribunal. But the danger which such an attempt would bring upon a plaintiff, perhaps no less than death and destruction, is of itself sufficient to deter any man from it; especially considering the little probability there is that the judges of it would run the risk of declaring themselves against a monarch whose creatures they are, and on whom their lives and fortunes so absolutely depend<sup>b</sup>.

Their will the only law.

The titles of the emperors of Morocco.

THE titles which the emperors of Morocco assume, are those of Most Glorious, Mighty, and Noble Emperor of Afric, King of Fez and Morocco, Taphilet, Suz, Darha, and all the Algarbe, and its territories in Afric; Grand Sbarif (or, as others write it, Xarif, that is, successor, or vicegerent) of the great prophet Mohammed, &c.

His ministers ecclesiastical, civil, and military.

THE judges, or magistrates, that act immediately under him, are, as hath been already hinted, either spiritual or temporal, or rather ecclesiastic and military. The Mufti and the demn a prince, though not openly, much less make it a pretence for rebelling against him. Witness the reign of that monster of cruelty, oppression, drunkenness, and debauchery, Muley Hamet Dabibly, who, though he lived in open contempt of the Koran, and encouraged it in all his ministers (1), insomuch that he preferred pork, so strictly forbidden by their law, and so detested by all Mohammedans, to all other flesh, except a roasted fox, which was his beloved dish; yet was never disturbed by any opposition, except what was raised by his brother Muley Abd'al Mulek, who, being older than he, had the fairer title to the crown, and with it all the opposite virtues to his brother's vices. But though these advantages procured him the good wishes of all the Moors, yet it was not without great difficulty that he wrenched the sceptre from him; nor was it long before that tyrant was recalled and re-enthroned by his subjects, in spite of all the opposition his brother could make against it, as shall be shewn in a subsequent section (2).

(B) These negroes, ever since their adhering so closely to Muley Ishmael, have been in high request with his successors, and make the main branch of the soldiery, both of horse and foot. They are brought so young out of Guiney, that they quickly lose the memory of it; and having no relations or friends, nor dependance, but on the emperor's favour, are the more ready to obey his orders in all things. They are at first brought up to be foot soldiers, and after so many years service in it, or sooner, if their behaviour deserve it, are advanced to the cavalry, which is a great honour in that country. They are taught little else except the exercise of arms, and to obey the emperor's orders; and, by the readiest compliance with his views, politics, and inclination, advance themselves to the highest posts under him (3).

- a Kadis are judges of all religious and civil affairs; and the Bashas, governors, Alcaldes, and other military officers, of those that concern the state or the army. All of them the most obsequious creatures and slaves of their prince, and no less the rapacious tyrants of his subjects, and from whom neither justice nor favour can be obtained, but by mere dint of money, and extortionate bribery, from the highest to the lowest. Neither can it, indeed, be otherwise, in such an arbitrary government, where the highest posts must not only be bought of the prince, at a most extravagant price, and kept only by as exorbitant a tribute, which is yearly paid to him, but where no one is sure to continue longer than he can bribe some of the courtiers to insinuate to the monarch that he pays to the utmost of his power, and much beyond what was expected from him. Add to this, that those Bashas, governors, &c. are obliged to keep their agents and spies in constant pay at court, to prevent their being supplanted by higher bidders, flanderers, or other artful underminers <sup>c</sup>.

FROM what hath been said under this head, it may be reasonably concluded, that this branch of the imperial revenue must be very considerable, though there is no possibility to make any other conjecture of its real amount, than that it must be an immense one. Another considerable branch is the piratical trade, which brings the greater income into his treasury, as he is not at any expence either for fitting of corsair vessels out, or maintaining their men, and yet hath the tenth of all the cargo, and of all the captives, besides which he appropriates to himself all the rest of them, by paying the captors fifty crowns per head; by which means he engrosses all the slaves to his own service and advantage. This article is, indeed, a very considerable addition to his revenue, not only as he sells their ransom at a very high rate, but likewise as he hath the profit of all their labour, without allowing them any other maintenance than a little bread and oil; nor any other assistance, when sick, than what medicines a Spanish convent, which he tolerates there, gives them gratis; and which, nevertheless, is forced to pay him an annual present for that toleration, besides furnishing the court with medicines, and the slaves with lodging and diet when they are not able to work. Another branch of his revenue consists in the tenth part of all cattle, corn, fruits, honey, wax, hides, rice, and other products of the earth, which is exacted of the Arabs and Berebers, as well as of the natives; and these are levied, or rather farmed, by the Bashas, governors, Alcaldes, &c. with all possible severity. The Jews and Christians likewise pay an income, or capitation, the former of six crowns per head; on all males from fifteen years and upwards, besides other arbitrary imposts, fines, &c. that on the Christians, for the liberty of trading in his dominions, rises and falls according to their number, and the commerce they drive <sup>d</sup>; but which, whatever it may bring yearly into his coffers, is yet detrimental to trade in general, seeing it discourages great numbers from settling there, notwithstanding the artful invitations which the emperors and their ministers make use of to invite them to it; for, besides those arbitrary exactions, there is still another great hardship attending them; viz. that they cannot leave the country without forfeiting all their debts and effects to the crown. The duties on all imports and exports, of which we shall speak under a subsequent article, is another branch of his income, the amount of which, communibus annis, no author hath yet given us any account of; only consul Hatfield hath computed the whole yearly revenue, including ordinaries and extraordinaries, to amount to 500 quintals of silver, each quintal, or 100 lb. weight, valued at somewhat above 330 l. sterling; so that the whole amounts to no more, according to him, than 165,000 l. a small revenue, indeed, for so large an empire, if the calculation may be depended upon <sup>e</sup>. But St. Olan, tho' he doth not pretend so much as to guess at the yearly amount of it, doth in general represent it as so considerable, that Muley Ishmael was reckoned to have amassed out of it a treasure in gold and silver of about 50 effective millions, but whether of crowns or livres he doth not tell us <sup>f</sup>, nor how he came by his knowledge of it; because that politic prince, even by his own confession, not only caused all his riches to be buried in sundry places under ground, his gold and silver to be melted into great lumps, and laid in the same privacy under ground, but likewise all those whom he intrusted with the secret to be as privately murdered. However that be, we shall, upon the whole, have the less cause to wonder at these exorbitant exactions which he extorts from Christian princes and states, whenever they are obliged either to seek his alliance, or to obtain some redress in favour of their trading subjects; much less at the shameful delays, insults, extortions, indignities, and injustice, which their ambassadors must be content to put up with, to obtain the least favour from their rapacious ministers; of which we need not a more flagrant instance than the strange treatment which Mr. Russel met with at that rapacious court <sup>g</sup>.

navy inconsiderable, for want of ports, timber, and tackle.

THE navy of this empire hath been always inconsiderable; neither is the number of their ships fixed, but rises or sinks according to the present emergency. In St. Olan's time it consisted of no more than twelve sail, one half of which belonged to the emperor, and the other to private subjects; most of them in bad plight, carrying at the most 18 or 20 cannon, and about 200 men, poorly armed and accoutred<sup>g</sup>. In Mr. Braithwait's time their whole naval force consisted only of two ships of 20 guns each, the biggest not above 200 tons, a French brigantine they had lately taken, and a few row vessels; and yet with these, well filled with men, they sailed out of Sallee and Mamora, and made a great number of prizes. And it is a constant maxim with them, if they find, in a ship of a nation with whom they are at peace, a man of a different nation, to make a lawful prize of her. And it is a singular happiness for Christian traders that the Morocco dominions do not afford one tolerable good harbour; that of Sallee, which is by far the best, being almost dry at low water: besides a very inconvenient bar, of which we have already taken notice (C), which prevents ships of any burthen from entering<sup>h</sup>; for if they had better ports, it might be an inducement to them to make a greater figure at sea, and become a greater annoyance. Another want they labour under, besides that of timber trees for building of ships, is that of tackle to rigg them with, and with which, as well as powder and shot, they are furnished by England and Holland. And such is their prowess at sea, that, about 34 years ago, a single small English frigate of 20 guns, with an active commander, by taking some of their ships, and running others on shore, had struck such terror among them, that the name of captain Delgarno, like that of other formidable warriors, was used by the Mamora and Sallee women to still their peevish children<sup>i</sup>. And, if so, what might not six ships of the like force do, were they stationed at Gibraltar, and kept in such readiness, that there might be always two clean upon their coasts, and off their harbours, to be relieved by two others who should successively take their stations; by which means they might always have our ships in their sight? Might not this prove the most effectual method to frighten that rapacious and barbarian court into better manners, and more equitable terms?

Land forces,
how levied
and maintained.

THE land forces would, indeed, make a much greater figure, were they not dispersed in small numbers throughout this large empire, or were they better disciplined and accoutred than they mostly are. We have already hinted, that the greatest part of their renegadoes are forced to lift amongst the foot, and sent to distant parts to garrison castles and forts on the frontiers. Their pay is only 20 Blankits, that is 40 pence, per month, and a small allowance of flour. However they are commanded by an Alcaide of their own, that is, one who is a renegado, and hath but a small allowance. Those whom our author saw at Fez were drunken profligate fellows, half-naked and half-starved<sup>k</sup>. The Moors are not much better paid, or equipped; but the choicest troops, both of horse and foot, are the negroes, who, being brought here from Guiney very young, and trained up for the army, commonly make the best soldiers, and are most relied on, as having signalized themselves upon several occasions, particularly at the sieges of Oran and Ceuta, of which we shall speak in the sequel. These are computed to amount in all, horse and foot, to about 40,000, and the Moors pretty near as many (D). He might, indeed, easily increase that number in a war against the Christians,

(C) This bar, joined to the shallowness of the harbour, hath induced the late Mr. Braithwait to propose a method whereby it might be intirely stopped up, as well as that of Mamora, and both rendered unfit for any service; which would very much distress their trade, and humble that proud and faithless people (4). The misfortune is, that the Christian powers are diverted from exerting their art and strength against those piratical nations, lest their suppression should prove an overbalancing advantage to any other state but their own. And it is chiefly owing to this narrow piece of policy that the late Muley Ismael was suffered, with a couple of ships, of twenty guns each, and a few row-barks, to keep the streights mouth locked up, as well as the liberty they have ever since, till very lately, enjoyed, of carrying on their piratical trade with such success, to the great detriment of the European commerce, and of reducing some thousands of Christians to the most miserable state of slavery.

(D) These forces, however, are neither raised, paid, nor armed, at his expence, but, upon any concerted expedition, are sent to him by the Alcaides, every one of which is to furnish his particular quota, according to the extent or capacity of his government; every town and village under him being obliged to maintain a proportionable number to their bigness, to be ready to march, upon the first warning, ready armed; of whom those who are picked out to serve in the horse are furnished with horses, which they are obliged to maintain, as well as themselves, out of the allowance they receive from their town or village, and both horse and foot are thereby exempted from taxes during the war. They only oblige the married to serve, and let the unmarried, and those who have no settled home, go free. In urgent exigencies, they can press a greater number of the former than the usual quota, and take two out of three brothers; but these generally come armed with only a sword, or lance, and some of them only with a staff (5).

- a wherein they come more voluntarily, than when it happens to be against any of the Mokāmedian princes. But how to arm one quarter of them would be very difficult, his armory being Arsenal poorly furnished scarcely sufficient to furnish above 10,000 with firelocks and scymitars, besides 150 pieces of cannon, part of which were taken in the Spanish Capitana, and the rest were brought from the fortrefs of Larrach, when the Spaniards were driven out of it: all which are there laid up, as well as his treasure, for the use of that son whom he designs for his successor, against any of his contending brethren, or any other competitor. For he that can make himself master of these two repositories, is, in a great measure, sure to gain the crown<sup>1</sup>; which being neither wholly elective nor hereditary, commonly falls to the share of the strongest and best provided with those two main sinews of war, especially if he hath had the address to make himself beloved or esteemed by the negroes, who, as was hinted before, are the sole guards of the king's person, palace, treasure, wives, concubines, and whole family, and who have the government of the most considerable provinces and cities in the empire, next to the princes of the blood<sup>m</sup>.
- b loved or esteemed by the negroes, who, as was hinted before, are the sole guards of the king's person, palace, treasure, wives, concubines, and whole family, and who have the government of the most considerable provinces and cities in the empire, next to the princes of the blood<sup>m</sup>.

THERE is little or no foreign commerce here, but what is carried on either by the Jews or Christians. The Moors neither understand it, nor have any trading vessels of their own; so that the whole navigation is carried on by European ships, but chiefly English and French. But the want of convenient harbours on the one hand, and the exorbitant duties laid on all imports and exports, to say nothing of many other frauds and exactions, with which the foreign merchants are oppressed, is such an obstruction to it, that it is not the fourth part so extensive as it would otherwise be.

THE chief exports are copper, tin, wool, hides, honey, wax, dates, raisins, almonds, olives, indigo, gum-arabic, sandric, cordovans, ostrich feathers, elephants teeth, and fine mats; as for corn, none is suffered to be exported, that being expressly forbidden by their Koran, though the Tunisians and Algerines usually dispense with it.

- THE usual imports are cloths, linen, lead, iron in bars, hard-ware, arms, bullets, and gun-powder; all which paid a duty of 10, but now only 8, per cent.<sup>n</sup>; besides which, the ships trading to these dominions pay one barrel of gun-powder for entrance, with twelve for lading and anchorage, and twelve more to the captain of the port. But vessels sailing to or from Gibraltar pay but half of that duty, by a former indulgence, granted by the late Muley Ismael, who had a particular regard for the English above all other Europeans. English and French consulage is eight dollars; and every French and Spanish ship pays three more to the hospital, or convent, of Spanish friars, founded there for the benefit of Christian slaves. It is a politic maxim among the Moors of this empire, and might be universally observed every-where, to trade with any ship that comes into their ports, though belonging to a state at war with them, and trade with them for all such commodities as they have occasion for. They will even permit their consuls and merchants to live with them in the same security as if they were at peace with them<sup>o</sup>.

- BUT they have another which is as detrimental as that is beneficial; viz. to cheat all the strangers they can, both in weight and measure, particularly in their silver coin, which, besides its wear, is commonly clipped or lessened by the Jews; so that, if a man doth not carry a pair of scales to weigh, as well as a good pair of eyes to examine, what he receives, he is sure to be cheated.

- BUT besides their commerce by sea, they carry on a very considerable one by land by their caravans, which set out twice a year from Fez to Mecca and Medina, and carry variety of their woollen manufactures, some of which are exceedingly fine and beautiful, besides cochineal, indigo, ostrich feathers, and Morocco skins; in return for which they bring silks, muslins, and variety of drugs<sup>p</sup> (E). They likewise send large caravans into Guiney, consisting of many thousand camels, which the length of the way, and the difficulty of the passage, through deserts void of provisions and water, render absolutely necessary, every other camel being loaded with those necessaries. (E) This branch of trade from Mecca might be easily put a stop to by England, by our transporting silks from Turkey to Barbary by sea; and the emperor would most probably encourage it, for the sake of the duty of 10 per cent. on goods imported on English bottoms, as it would likewise prevent many of his subjects going to Mecca, where the Turkish government, which is much milder than his, invites many of those traders to settle themselves, as under the least tyranny of the two (6).

THE coin of this empire is of three sorts; the lowest of which, called a Fluce, is a small piece of copper, somewhat less than our farthing, twenty of which make a Blankit, another small coin of silver, of the value of about two-pence English. This last, for want of being milled, is so liable to be clipped by the Jews, and, being most in use, grows so very thin, that, if one does not take care to weigh them, one is sure to be a loser by them. For though both Jews and Moors will strive hard to put them off; yet, if they be light, they will refuse to take them, except by weight, in order to be melted again. For those Jews are both melters and coiners, and get considerably by both. They likewise exchange good money for bad; for which, besides the payment of the difference, they extort an extravagant premium. This makes it very troublesome and chargeable in marketing, because, if one of these pieces be but cracked, it will be refused; and yet most large payments are made in that coin, gold being both scarce and kept up.

THE gold coin is the ducat, not unlike that of Hungary, worth about nine shillings sterling, three of which make a moidore, and are generally so changed. Merchants accounts are kept by ounces, each of which contains four Blankits, and four of which make a ducat account, or, as they style it, a Metical. But, in payments to the government, they will take no less than seventeen and a half for a gold ducat. These three last ounces and ducats, or Meticals, are imaginary. As for the three real species above-mentioned, the Mohammedan religion not permitting them to bear the prince's or any other effigy, they are only stamped with some Arabic characters. As for foreign coin, whether gold or silver, it is valued according to its weight, and as if it was to be melted; and the Jews make a considerable profit not only in the exchange of it, but in filing, lessening, and even debasing it, which makes it dangerous to take any from them without the scales or the touchstone.

WE have already said something of their learning, in speaking of the university of Fez; and all that we can add to it is, that it is in a great measure wholly confined to their priests and doctors of their law. As for the rest, they think themselves learned enough if they can but read, write, and cast accounts; and even these are much neglected, even by their princes and nobles, many of whom, like the late emperor Muley Ishmael, can neither read nor write. Though this seems to be a degeneracy of no longer standing, perhaps, than since their falling under the subjection of the Sharifs, and quite opposite to the proverbial saying of theirs, A horse, a woman, and a book; which expressed their three predominant inclinations. The two former of which they retain as much as ever, no nation being more expert and dexterous in all kinds of horsemanship, nor more addicted to women than they. But at present their appetite for learning, for which they were so famed heretofore (F), seems wholly extinguished among them in every respect, except, perhaps, in the great regard they still pay to their doctors and professors. They are likewise much addicted to astrology, and place great confidence in charms, magic, and other superstitious trash. They have no physicians except quacks, who deal much in simples, amulets, and other pretended conjurings. Their surgeons are not much better; which gives the renegadoes an opportunity to set up for physicians and surgeons, when they can pretend to nothing better.

THEY have regular schools in all their cities and towns, and teach children to read, write, and cast accounts; and all the books they are taught are some short catechisms of their faith, and last of all the Koran. And when a boy hath once gone through this last, he is handsomely dressed, and set upon a horse and led in triumph through the city by the rest of the school-boys. The children never receive any chastisement, either at school or at home, but on the soles of their feet, with a small rod or flat rule. All other punishments of them, especially some in use amongst us, are abhorred by them.

THEIR martial skill and discipline, notwithstanding their continual wars at home and abroad, and the care which the late Sharifs have taken to breed their negro troops to arms from their

(F) We have formerly shewn, that these countries, barbarous as they were called by the Romans, were not without their arts and sciences, at the time they were conquered by them (7). Since which, both the Moors and Arabians, especially the latter, have rendered them still more considerable by the branches of learning they cultivated among them, such as philosophy, astronomy, physic, history, &c. as well as by the many learned authors they have produced, such as Abu'lfaragius, Algarral, Albumazar, Maimonides, Abu'lfagar, Avicenna,

Averrhoes, and a great many others, whom we have had occasion to mention through the course of this Modern History (8). So that this great decay of learning among them can hardly be ascribed to any other cause than to the many long and dreadful wars, vicissitudes, and devastations, they have since undergone, and to the tyrannical government they still groan under. Those very causes having every-where, and in all ages, produced the same effects (9).

- a infancy, is still amazingly rude and imperfect in every respect, excepting, perhaps, their dexterity in riding and horsemanship; and even in this they rather shew an unusual agility than any military skill, their horses being now rather remarkable for their docility and fleetness than for true martial exploits; and yet, in antient times, the Mauritanian cavalry was reckoned of all others the most formidable. The foot is still worse disciplined, and worse armed and accoutred. When they engage the enemy, their method is to place the horse on the two wings, and the foot in the center, which extends itself in the form of a crescent; and, where the ground will allow it, never consists of above two ranks, which are the more easily broke by the horse, whenever these can come to attack them, because the foot have neither discipline nor order to prevent their breaking in upon them; and what is still worse, b stand in such dread of them, that 500 foot will be put to flight by 50 horsemen. They make but a poor figure at best, either in marching, encamping, or fighting; and the only mark of courage they shew, is when they are going to engage the enemy; at which time they begin the onset with a loud shouting, which is followed with some short ejaculatory prayer for victory. The cavalry which is nearest to the emperor, and chiefly consists of negroes, is armed with guns, pistols, and scymitars; and that which is farthest from him only with muskets and lances. The infantry is variously armed, some with guns, others with bows, slings, short pikes, clubs, and broad-swords. With these weapons they engage the enemy, especially Christians, rather with a kind of enthusiastic fury than like a well-disciplined army; but if they meet with a brave opposition, or an unexpected repulse, they are the more easily put to the rout; and when so, are with great difficulty rallied again, if at all, especially if the enemy be of the same religion with them; in which case, they usually engage them with an ill-will, and will fight no longer when they think themselves in danger of being killed, or when they can see a way of saving themselves by flight<sup>w</sup>. As to the Arabs, or Berebers, they are seldom called in as auxiliaries, because, being under a kind of forced subjection, they cannot be safely trusted by either side; but what is required of them is, that they furnish the emperor's troops with provisions of corn, barley, meat, butter, oil, honey, &c. under pain of military execution, where-ever they encamp. They are very numerous, and for the most part brave and stout, and fond of liberty, and would soon shake off the irksome yoke, if they were not kept under by oppressive taxes, and the want of good arms. But as they are all of the Mohammedan religion, the Sharifs, when at war with any Christian powers, will venture to oblige them to send a certain quota to fight under their banner; at which time they will furnish them with fire and other arms, and even with horses; all which they strip them of again, as soon as the campaign is over, before they are suffered to return to their own homes<sup>x</sup>.

- We have already hinted that the established religion throughout this empire, both among Moors and Arabs, is that of Mohammed, of which, and its four principal sects, a full account hath been given in a former volume<sup>y</sup>. These are strict followers of that of Melech, whose extravagant and superstitious doctrines they have adopted, and without the belief of which they think a Mohammedan cannot be saved. We shall have further occasion to mention some of those strange tenets in a subsequent chapter, as they are still more strenuously held at Algiers, Tunis, Tafilet, and other parts of Barbary, where we shall speak more fully of them; c all that we shall observe concerning them here is, that, of all others, those of Morocco and Fez are not only the most zealous sticklers for them, but have introduced several others, equally impertinent and ridiculous, and of which they are no less strict observers; such as sending on certain days variety of victuals to be placed on the tombs of their deceased relations; their burying gold, silver, and jewels, and other conveniencies, with them, that they may live the more at their ease in the other world; the digging their graves narrow at the top and broad at the bottom, to give the deceased more room, and greater facility to gather up his bones at the resurrection: on which account, and to prevent any mixture or collusion, they never inter two persons in one grave. They pay a great veneration to those sepulchres, embellish them with tomb-stones, cupolas, and other ornaments, and forbid all Christians, even ambassadors, to approach them. Every Friday, which is their sabbath, those sepulchres, which are commonly out of town, are crowded with men and women, in a blue dress, which is the colour for their mourning; but mostly by the latter, who are allowed to repair thither, to pay their tribute of tears and prayers for the dead; and by marabouts, who commonly have their cells in that neighbourhood, and, for a little money, join in their devotions with seeming zeal and fervency, this being a considerable branch of their trade. They all ply here with their beads in their hands, and repeat a certain number of passages out of the Koran, more or less, according to the generosity of their devotees<sup>z</sup>.

Christians.*

THEY profess a more than common abhorrence against all Christians, and breed up their children to the same. The usual name they call them by is that of dogs; and they seldom make mention of any without tacking some hearty curse to it. The very ambassadors themselves are not exempt from their insults and curses as they go along the streets, and are often pelted with stones and dirt by the populace <sup>a</sup>.

Strange regard to Mecca pilgrims;

*extends even
to horses, &c.*

THEY not only pay a great veneration to their marabouts, an idle pack of priests, who live and thrive on the folly of the superstitious laity, as they do at Algiers, Tunis, &c. but to those who have made their pilgrimage to Mecca, whom they style Hedges, or saints, and allow them several considerable privileges. But what is still more singular, the very camels and horses that have been there are esteemed so holy, that they are exempted from future service, well fed and kept, and when they die are allowed the same kind of burial as they do to their nearest relations (G). <sup>b</sup>

how punished.*

THEIR worship in their mosks is much the same as we have already described in other parts of the Moslem dominions. They enter them bare-footed, and behave with great decency and seeming devotion. If a man be convicted of having absented himself from them during eight days, he is, for the first fault, rendered incapable of being a witness in any court; is mulcted for the second, and burnt as a heretic for the third. As for the women, they being looked upon as only created for procreation, and apt to inspire men with impure thoughts at their devotions, they are not permitted to enter those places, but pray at home, or at the sepulchres lately mentioned <sup>b</sup>. They allow salvation for all, of what nation or religion soever, that die before they are fifteen years of age; but to none beyond it, unless to the Moslems of their own sect. And those females of other religions that die virgins under the age above-mentioned, are reserved to make up the compliment of seventy females which every male will be intitled to in paradise. They reckon ideots, madmen, and pretended forcerers and charm-mongers, among their saints of the first class, and build chapels to them after their deaths, which are visited with great devotion; and those places, as well as the sepulchres of their Hedges, or Mecca pilgrims, whether men, camels, or horses, are allowed sanctuaries for all crimes, except treason <sup>c</sup>.

them.*

Sepulchres esteemed sanctuaries.

*Games of ha-
den.*

The Koran forbidding all games of hazard, that prohibition is so strictly observed in these dominions, that the people of all ranks content themselves with playing at chess, draughts, and other such like games, and express an utter abhorrence for cards, dice, &c. If any person hath lost his money at any game, and complains of it to the Kadi, he will order it immediately to be restored to him, and the winner to be bastinadoed or fined. The same punishment is assigned to all those that are caught playing at any chance game, or for any money, except a mere trifle by way of diversion. They suffer neither Jews nor Christians to enter into their mosks, or to have any carnal conversation with their women; and if any of them are found guilty of either, they must either turn Mohammedans, or be burned or impaled alive. They have one settled maxim among them, which is religiously observed by all, from the highest to the lowest; viz. not to keep faith with infidels; in consequence of which they make no conscience to lye, forswear, and violate the most solemn engagements. For which shameful practice one of their Talbes, or priests, did not scruple to give this reason to the French ambassador, that they would soon become slaves to the false religion and idolatry of the Christians, if they were, like them, as great ones to their engagements with them <sup>d</sup>.

palliated.*

Wretched character of the court and people.

*Strict ob-

But whatever their motives be for it, one may safely affirm, that there is hardly a more rapacious or faithless court and ministry than that of Morocco, nor a more cheating and perfidious people than the subjects of that empire. They verify a proverb, current among them, that given vinegar is sweeter than bought honey. To close up this article of their religion, they are exact observers of the superstitious part of their law, beyond all other Mohammedans in Barbary, and especially of their Ramadan, or lent, which is kept with such strictness, that they will not, during that whole month, taste one drop of coffee, or a whiff of tobacco, from two hours before sun-rising till after it is quite set; much less will they touch any other victuals or refreshment. Their very children are so enured to the same abstinence, <sup>e</sup> <sup>f</sup>

(G) These sanctified beasts are easily distinguished by the beads and other relics and ornaments about their necks, which are commonly some verses out of the Koran, upon parchment or paper, and sewn in a piece of rich silk or brocade. If their owners are not in a capacity of keeping them, they procure them a maintenance from the revenue of the mosk or parish they belong to; and there never want some devotees, who take a singular pleasure in visiting and feeding them.

We are told, that Muley Ismael, who was a very strict Mohammedan, in the first audience he gave the French ambassador, had one of those horses led before that he rode on. It was sumptuously clad, and, among other marks of distinction, had a young Christian slave to hold up his tail with one hand, and with the other a pot to receive his excrements, and a napkin to wipe him clean (10).

a that it becomes natural to them ; their very corfairs, though the basest villians under the sun, will keep this long fast on ship-board ; and if a renegado is found to neglect it, as they often do, he is punished with 100 or 200 bastinadoes on the soles of his feet. Strange infatuation this, to imagine that a regular repetition of praying, washing, fasting, &c. shall atone for the vilest frauds, oppressions, cruelty, perjury, and the most immoral and unnatural vices, and the violation of all moral rectitude and virtue <sup>c</sup> !

THEIR punishments are much the same as those we have already seen in other parts of Barbary, except with regard to such as flow from the arbitrary sentence of their monarchs ; such as sawing in sunder, either length or cross-wise, burning by slow fires, and others which they seem to delight in, but which are a shame and abhorrence to human nature ; especially considering how often the most cruel of them fall upon the innocent, and are the mere and sudden effects of jealousy, revenge, detraction, and often of drunkenness or disappointment. The renegadoes are here likewise punished with fire, but with some additional severity, they being stripped quite naked, and anointed all over with tallow, and having a chain fastened about their loins, are dragged from prison to the place of execution, and there burned. Jews who debase the coin, or wrong the king, and slaves that attempt to run away, are likewise punished with greater severity here than in any other parts of Barbary, though inhumanly enough every-where <sup>f</sup>.

THE dress, customs, marriages, burials, food, drink, baths, houses, &c. having nothing particularly worth notice, we shall refer our readers to the general account we shall give of them in a subsequent chapter. Only one custom we cannot pass by, which seems to be peculiar to them, is, that it is reckoned so shameful a thing for a man to make water in a standing posture, that those that are found guilty of it are excluded from being evidence in any trial. A strange custom among the men ;

Whether this be to prevent any drop of their urine from falling upon their cloaths, which is esteemed a legal defilement, or upon any other account, we cannot determine ; only we are assured by most writers that they are very careful to squat down, like the females, whenever they have occasion to empty their bladder <sup>e</sup>. The women have likewise a strange superstitious custom when in labour, which is, to send to the school for five little boys, four of whom another among the women. are employed in holding the four corners of a cloth, in each of which is an egg tied, and running with it through the streets, singing some prayers alternately ; upon which the Moors come out of their houses, with bottles or pitchers full of water, which they throw into the middle of the cloth ; by which means they expect to be more easily and quickly delivered.

THE language of this country is, without all peradventure, one of the most extensive in the whole world ; namely, the Arabesk, or modern Arabic, which is here spoken not only in towns and cities, but in all the villages, adowards, tents, and mountains, of this empire ; nay, those western Barbary Moors are understood all over the Turkish dominions ; the reason of which may be their frequent pilgrimages to Mecca, from this and other parts of Barbary ; by which means that language is so naturally kept up, that Turks, Moors, Algerines, Tunisians, Tripolitans, Fezans, and Moroccans, understand one another perfectly well <sup>h</sup>. What that language is, and what affinity it hath with the antient Arabic, Hebrew, and other eastern tongues, the reader may see in the history we have already given of the antient and modern Arabic, and in other learned authors quoted by us there <sup>i</sup>.

HITHERTO we have mentioned little relating to the religion, manners, &c. of the Moors Some laudable of this empire ; but that we may not be thought partial in exposing only the worst part of customs among them. them, we shall now, in justice to them, acquaint our readers with what we find to be most commendable among them. And first, they cannot be too much admired for the great regard they pay to the name of God ; that great abhorrence which they bear to the impious custom, so much in vogue among Christians, of swearing upon the most trivial subjects, which the greatest aggravated resentment cannot provoke them to ; much less to blasphemous and indecent expressions of him, not having so much as a word in their language to express Aversion to swearing and fighting. blasphemy by. Neither do they suffer their quarrels and contests with each other ever to transport them so far as to come to blows, much less to stab and murder one another, as is too common in ours and other Christian countries. They never kill but in war ; their religion allowing of no pardon for murder : and it is with the utmost reluctance that they engage in battle against those that are of their own religion.

THEIR respect and obedience to their parents, superiors, and even of a younger brother to Respect to an elder, is no less exemplary and praise-worthy ; before whom they neither dare to sit or parents. speak without being bid. They are extremely jealous of the honour of their wives, and impatient of the least blemish or suspicion that is cast upon it. We likewise took notice, at the beginning of this section, of their extraordinary loyalty to their princes, even to the most brutish and abandoned of them ; and we may add to it here, their singular zeal and bravery in defence of their country, though the small property they enjoy in it one would hardly think a worth the tenth part of the trouble and hazard they go through to preserve it. They are moreover very moderate in their eating; and as for their drinking, wine and other intoxicating liquors are forbidden by their law. And though this prohibition is perhaps the least observed by them, many even of their great men indulging themselves in drinking them privately, yet in general those persons, of whatever rank, that abstain from them, and regale themselves only with such liquors as sherbet, coffee, and such sober beverage, are the most esteemed. And even in their licensed houses for wine, brandy, &c. if any Mohammedan is proved to have drank to excess of these, not only he, but the retailer, is severely punished, either by fine or bastinado, and the Kadi's officers come and stave all the vessels. They have indeed a much better succedaneum at hand upon such occasions; viz. their opium, which, b moderately used, hath all the invigorating, cheering, and healing qualities of the noblest wines, without any of their pernicious effects.

THEIR visits are commonly short, lasting no longer than the business which occasions them requires; and the visited only treats his visitor with coffee or sherbet, and a pipe of tobacco, unless on particular occasions. The women have their particular apartments, where they receive their female visitors, and from which the husbands are excluded. We have already mentioned their forbidding of all games of chance, or playing at any other, except for a regale of coffee, sherbet, or other such small refreshment. But what must they think of our suffering men and women of all ranks, ages, and conditions, to murder their time, waste their fortunes, ruin their families, neglect their own and the public welfare, in those very c games which are moreover rendered more dishonourable and destructive, by the base and scandalous abuses that are suffered to reign impunely, at almost all those places of resort? Lastly, when any person is convicted in any of these states of Barbary of a capital crime, he is conducted to the place of execution by two or three officers, without any retinue, or any other crowd of spectators, than a few unruly boys. But what must they think, were they to see the crowds and tumults that attend our most common executions, to see so many myriads neglect their own affairs, hire seats on scaffolds, raised at an extraordinary charge, run the risk of breaking their limbs or necks, to behold some uncommon criminal put to death, and, with as much avidity as they would behold a coronation, triumphant cavalcade, or magnificent spectacle, behold, at their ease, the distresses, dying agonies, and destruction, of an unfortunate person, whom either his crimes, misfortunes, or perhaps his enemies, have brought to d an untimely end?

WITH respect to the policy of the government, they have one maxim, which we have lately hinted at, and which several eminent civilians have wished was universally observed; which is, that though they are at war with almost all the Christians, except the English, and even when they have been at war with us, they nevertheless permit our consuls and merchants to reside in their ports unmolested, and will trade with any vessel that comes bound to their ports, of what nation soever, for what commodities they stand in need of, and suffer every trader to live with them in as much security as in time of peace. It is, indeed, the emperor's interest to suffer his subjects to carry on a piratical war with as many Christian nations as they e can, because it brings him a considerable income, without putting him to any charge to fit out ships; for besides the tenth of all the cargoes of the prizes, he hath, as we hinted before, all the captives to himself; which still adds to his wealth, as well as to his grandeur, by the excessive price he puts upon their ransom, and the profit he makes of their labour, without allowing them any thing but a small pittance of bread and oil. But as the foreign commerce is likewise a considerable branch of his revenue, it is no bad policy in him to preserve and encourage it for the sake of the large duty which he lays on all imports and exports; especially as this last is a great promoter of the inland trade, by caravans, all which help to increase his revenue; whilst the subjects of Christian princes, though at war with him, find their account in making use of this liberty and encouragement of trading thus unmolested in his dominions. f

Another political maxim which the emperors of Morocco are obliged to observe, is, at any rate, to keep in friendship with the states of Tunis, Tripoli, and Algiers, but more particularly with the latter, not only as the most powerful and warlike, as they have formerly found to their cost, as will be seen more fully in their history, but as being their strongest barrier against the Ottoman Porte, and, on the other hand, screen them from any suspicion from that jealous court. The necessity of this policy will be best understood from their history, which we are now going to give.

- a THIS empire, as well as the rest of the states of Barbary, having continued about four centuries under the Roman yoke, from their first conquest by J. Cæsar, to the declension of the Roman empire <sup>a</sup>, fell immediately under that of the Goths, who, as we have formerly seen, crossed over from Spain, and made an easy conquest of all those provinces, whose inhabitants rather chose to submit to them than make their captivity harder by fighting for their old oppressors <sup>b</sup>. This new government lasted only till about the year 600, when the Saracens, a nation no less furious than the Vandals, tyrannized over them in their turn, till they were driven out by the Arabians, who, besides their natural ferocity, burning with a fiery zeal to propagate their Mohammedism every-where by force of arms, over-ran this whole country among the rest <sup>c</sup>, and obliged them to submit themselves to their religion, as well as government. By their quick success Christianity was banished out of Africa, which, from that fatal epocha, took a quite different face, and was divided into variety of kingdoms under divers princes, who governed their new subjects with wisdom and mildness; yet, by their frequent dissensions and hostilities against each other, caused those strange alterations and incidents of which we have already spoken in some former chapters <sup>d</sup>, and raised at length the family of the Almoravides to the sovereignty <sup>e</sup>. Yusef, the second monarch of that line, was the person who built the city of Morocco, and conquered the kingdom of Fez, and the Moorish dominions in Spain; all which, together with the sovereignty, were lost by his grandson Albo Hali, the same who caused the works of Avicenna to be compiled by a set of Arabian doctors, in the form we now see them. This prince having been defeated and killed in Spain, the crown passed to the Mohadids, or Almohedes, by the defeat and tragical end of his son Abraham. It had not continued in it above three generations before Mohammed, the son of Al Mansur, a prince no less worthy of the crown than his father, lost the famous battle of Sierra Morena, in which 200,000 of his Moors were slain, which caused likewise the loss of several Spanish conquests, which Alphonso X. retook from him immediately after.
- b MOHAMMED died soon after, and left several sons, whose mutual feuds ended in a bloody war, during which the viceroys of Fez, Tunis, and Tremecen, found means to shake off the yoke, and strengthen themselves so well in their respective governments, that none of his descendants could afterwards reduce them. One of the princes of the royal blood of Tremecen having put to death Cezed, al. Ceyed, one of Mohammed's grandsons, and defeated all the Almohedes, gave his government a kind of new form, and settled himself at the head of it: soon after which Abd'allah, of the family of the Merini, having made himself master of the kingdom of Morocco and of that of Fez, intailed these two crowns on his own family. Some of his successors, having chosen the latter for their royal residence, contented themselves with sending their viceroys to the former; who, by their cruel extortions, almost unpeopled that great metropolis. These Merini, or Beni-merini, having been outed in their turn by the Oatazes, or, as they are called by others, Beni Oatazes; who, by their ill conduct and government, joined to the wars which Don Manuel king of Portugal had been successfully waging against the Moors for a considerable number of years (A), gave a long wished-for handle to the old Sharif Hafsen and his sons to drive them from the throne, and by the most unheard of artifices, dissimulation, and treachery, to make themselves masters of it; and these are they who have kept themselves upon it ever since <sup>e</sup>.

(A) That prince was at this time possessed of most of the strong ports of this empire, both on the Mediterranean and Atlantic ocean; viz. Ceuta, Tangier, Arzilla, Alcassarzeguer, Azamora, Mazagan, Saffi, Cape Aguer, and the castle of Erguen; in all which he kept very strong garrisons both of horse and foot, and a sufficient quantity of cannon, and other warlike stores. He kept, besides his Christian troops, about 16,000 horse, and near 200,000 foot in his pay, who were either Berbers or Arabs, and natural enemies to the Moors; by which means he had kept them in continual awe, and gained many signal victories over them: whilst these, being daily weakened by intestine wars, gave him an opportunity of becoming more and more powerful; and he was actually by this time become by far the most formidable prince in all Barbary. This was the distracted state of the country, when the Sharifs above-mentioned laid the first plan with their politic father for bringing it under their yoke (1).

THIS is the sum and substance of the revolutions which have happened in this part of Barbary, from the expulsion of the Vandals out of Afric, to the time in which the Sharifs began to lay the foundation of this new empire; an attempt so deeply laid, and so strenuously as well as successfully pursued, that a curious reader will hardly think it inconsistent with our designed brevity to be acquainted with their original, and the various means which those consummate politicians made use of to accomplish it.

Of the empire of Morocco, founded by Hascen, and his three sons.

HASCEN, or, as others call him, Hassan and Hassen, who pretended to be of the race of the Sharifs, a title affected by the descendants of Mohammed, was a native of the city of Tigummedet, in the province of Dhara, and first projector of this plan, had already acquired such a reputation for wisdom, learning, and sanctity, whilst this country was torn in pieces by intestine jars, and a bloody war against the Portuguese, that he was looked upon as the oracle of his time. He had three sons grown up to manhood, viz. Abdelquibir, Hammed, and Mohammed, whom, to raise to the same degree of esteem and confidence, he sent on a pilgrimage to Mecca; during which they behaved with such circumspection and seeming piety, that, upon their return, the people came in crowds to kiss the hem of their garments. Both Hascen and they pretended to strange ecstatic visions and revelations, and an extraordinary zeal for the Mohammedan law, and as such were looked upon as sent by heaven to be the defenders of it. The two youngest of them the old Sharif, who moved all this scene as it were behind the curtain, sent to Mohammed Dalaz king of Fez, where they so far insinuated themselves with that credulous prince, that he immediately raised Hammed, the elder of the two, to the professor's chair, and intrusted the youngest with the education of his sons; soon after which they as easily obtained from him the government of the provinces of Sus, Morocco, Hea, Tremecen, and Ducata. His brother Muley Nacer, a person of much deeper discernment than he, and who could better penetrate into their sinister views, tried, indeed, by all proper means, to alarm him against putting so great a confidence in these two artful hypocrites, rather than in his own tried peers and officers. All his judicious representations proved in vain, and the two brothers hastened their departure to the province of Ducata, in the kingdom of Morocco, where they had a good number of friends; and where, without having ever made any trial of their martial genius, they attempted at once the siege of Saffi, then in the hands of, and strongly guarded by, the Portuguese. Finding the place too strong for them, they proceeded to the cape Aguer, in the kingdom of Sus, where they made some successful inroads against the Portuguese, in that and some other provinces; by which means, as well as by their affected sanctity and zeal against those enemies of their law, and the strict discipline they maintained among their troops, they gained so far the esteem and confidence of the Moors, that when they were just upon the point of disbanding their troops, for want of proper remittances from the court, the people immediately agreed to pay them the tenths of all their income, to help to maintain them. Among others, the inhabitants of Tarudant and Fedfi signalized their attachment to them, by chusing old Hascen, their father, for their chief, and assigning him a regiment of 500 horse, with a proportionable stipend, to enable him to defend them from the frequent incursions of the Arabs, by whom these and other cities were greatly impoverished, and in some measure unpeopled. In the first of these places Mohammed, the most active and enterprising of all his sons, having built the fortress of Saragza, and obtained a new commission and supply, led his forces against the city of Mezoar, whose inhabitants had sided with the Portuguese, and made himself master soon after both of that and the whole province of Dhara, then in their possession<sup>f</sup>. These successes raised their reputation to such a height, that not only the king of Fez and his subjects, but all the Moors in general, congratulated themselves upon it, and began to entertain the greatest prospects from three such successful, wise, and zealous warriors. Muley Nacer alone, who penetrated through their perfidious views, was the only one who secretly bewailed the evils which he was unable to prevent; whilst those consummate hypocrites, under pretence of assisting the other provinces against the Christians, made themselves masters, in a short time, of those of Hea, Ducata, and Tremecen: the city of Tednett, capital of Hea, was the only one that ventured to oppose them, but was quickly forced to submit; and, being the place which the traitor Mohammed had pitched upon for his residence, he immediately caused it to be well fortified, built himself a sumptuous palace in it, and took upon himself the title of prince of Hea.

In the mean while the continual inroads which he made against the Berebers and Arabs in the Portuguese service, obliged Yajay Ben Taful, one of their tributary princes, to call in Nugno Fernandes, governor of Safi, to his assistance; and these two having formed a small army of 400 Spanish horse, 3000 Moors, and 8000 Arabs, of foot, marched directly to Tednett, in hopes to surprize that place. But Mohammed had timely intelligence of their coming; and trusting more to his fortune than his forces, went out to meet them at the head of 4000 horse; and was scarcely got three miles out of the city, before he saw the enemy's vanguard

- a commanded by Fujay, who, without waiting for the rest, fell immediately upon him, and put his troops to flight, and him after them. Being thus unexpectedly repulsed, and not daring to return into Tednett for fear of being besieged in it, he saw himself obliged to abandon that city to his pursuers, who immediately entered it; but found that the inhabitants, who were wholly devoted to Sharif Mobammed, had also forsaken it, and had betaken themselves to the adjacent mountains; and, having with ease reduced all the adjacent country, returned to their respective homes. They had not been gone long before Mobammed, in order to repair his Retakes Ted- loss, sent for his brother Hammed, who joined him at the head of a powerful army: and nett. these two, taking the advantage of an uproar that had been raised in Tednett, easily got possession of it again.
- b To this high pitch of power and reputation were the Sharifs grown up, when Hascen their A. D. 1516. father died; about which time the Portuguese were besieging the city of Anega; upon which the three brothers, his sons, marched with a powerful succour to its relief. A bloody fight Old Hascen dies. ensued, in which Abdelquibir, the eldest of them, but the least active and warlike, was slain; but Mobammed and Hammed gained the victory, and took Lopez Barriga, the Portuguese Mohammed commander, prisoner, and with him a good number of other officers of the same nation. defeats the Portuguese. Some years after this, they formed the design of making themselves masters of the city of Morocco, which, with only a small territory about it, belonged to a prince of Cyd Heneti, named Nazer Buxentuf; and, to avoid the length and uncertainty of a siege, agreed, if possible, to win the place by treachery. Buxentuf was easily captivated by their flattery and Takes Mo- vast promises, and received them into it with all the marks of honour. They soon insinuated rocco. themselves into the esteem and confidence of the inhabitants, by the same artful treachery; and no sooner found them firmly devoted to them, than they got Buxentuf to be poisoned at Treachery to a hunting match, without being in the least suspected of it. Hammed found no difficulty to Buxentuf. get himself proclaimed king in his stead by the inhabitants, in prejudice to the deceased's children; upon whom he, however, to avoid all suspicion, bestowed some considerable lands and governments in the remote provinces. But not thinking himself yet sufficiently strong to Embassy to the pull off the mask, he thought fit to send a sumptuous embassy to the king of Fez, accom- king of Fez. panied with vast presents, and the assurances of an intire submission, and a yearly tribute; which met with a ready acceptance from that weak prince<sup>e</sup>.
- d It was not long, however, before an opportunity offered itself to the two brothers, which at once enabled them to take off the disguise, and to render themselves more powerful than ever. Two considerable Adouars of the Arabs, in the province of Ducata, were at war with Treachery to each other, and both had applied to them for assistance, and received a promise from them. the Arabs. Hammed and Mobammed marched accordingly out of Morocco at the head of a powerful army; at the sight of which the two Arabian chiefs fell furiously on each other, in full confidence that the Sharifs were come to succour them; but, to their great surprize, instead of assisting either side, they saw them stand only as unconcerned spectators, till, their forces on both sides being nearly exhausted, they immediately rushed upon them, and cut all the remainder in pieces; and, seizing upon all their arms, horses, and warlike stores, returned to Morocco in a
- e kind of triumph. Immediately after this open piece of treachery, Hammed, resolving to give Hammed's to the Fezian monarch to understand that he did not design to continue his tribute and submission the king of any longer, contented himself with sending him twelve of the very worst horses and camels Fez. he had lately gained (B), together with some plausible excuses for it; by which that monarch began to be sensible of his own weakness when it was too late. He expressed his resentment in some severe menaces, which he sent to him; but his treacherous vassal, who knew that this was all he could do against him, regarded them accordingly. Mobammed Oataz died soon Who dies of after of grief, as it is supposed, and was succeeded by his son Hammed Oataz; who, having grief. been educated under Mobammed, the youngest of the three Sharifs, whether he retained any real regard for him on that account, or, which is more probable, for want of sufficient power to punish
- f the perfidy of his elder brother, let him know, that he would be contented with a small yearly tribute from him. This ill-timed condescension easily convinced Hammed that he had A. (B) The tribute which Hammed had engaged to pay to that monarch, ever since he was become master of Morocco, was the fifth part of all the horses, camels, prisoners, arms, and ammunition, that he took in war (2); so that the sending upon this occasion, where he had carried off such a vast plunder of all sorts, only six lean camels, and as many horses, could hardly be designed as any other than an avowed insult on that generous, tho' weak monarch; but which the treacherous Sharif knew was out of his power to revenge.

as a friend, he would always preserve a grateful remembrance of the favours which he had received from his father and him; but that, if he went about to obstruct him in the wars which he was waging against the Christians, he could expect nothing less than some grievous punishment from God and his prophet, for his impiety; and that, as for himself, he neither wanted courage nor strength to repel force by force <sup>a</sup>.

ALL this while his brother Mohammed, whom he had made governor of the kingdom of Sus, had been fortifying and embellishing the city of Tarudant, the metropolis of it: but having lately made an unfortunate attempt against the Portuguese at Capo Aguer, which had obliged him to abandon Tarudant, the king of Fez, provoked at the insolence and success of the two brothers, resolved to lay siege to their capital of Morocco; but being stoutly repulsed by the garrison, was forced as shamefully to raise it; of which Hammed having timely notice, pursued him with such speed, that he cut the greatest part of his rear in pieces, and obliged the province of Escure to pay him the tribute which they were wont to pay to the Fezian kings. He did the same by several other provinces, whilst Oataz was employed in quelling a rebellion a brother of his had raised against him; which he had no sooner done, than he raised a more powerful army than his first was, with full resolution to exterminate, if possible, the two Sharifs and their forces, and marched at the head of them to the banks of the River of the Negroes, near the town of Buacaba, where the enemy was already posted. Here the two armies met; and though that of the Fezians was by much the stronger, yet they continued three whole days, one on one side the river, and the other on the other, without any hostile motion. At length Oataz, having given the command of his vanguard to his son Mohammed, who had under him Abdala Zoboibi, the refugee king of Granada, who had been driven out of his dominions by the Spaniards, and that of the main army to his brother-in-law Muley Dris, or Idris, and reserved to himself that of the rear, which consisted of the noblest and bravest persons of his kingdom, Zoboibi immediately crossed the river, and stood firm with his troops, to facilitate the coming over of the cavalry. The two Sharifs, who had divided their forces into two bodies, thought it a proper time to fall upon him; which they did with such fury, that they drove him back into the river, poured whole showers of arrows and musquet-shot upon them, and the rest of the king's forces, who, being thus intangled with each other, could neither come over nor fight. The king, who beheld this from the opposite shore at the head of the rear, did what he could to encourage them; but not being able to prevent their betaking themselves to a shameful flight, was forced to flee after them, leaving all his cannon, tents, baggage, and wives, behind. His son and the Granadan king lost their lives; and the victorious Sharifs, marching across a branch of mount Atlas, with all their immense booty, went and besieged Taflet with the artillery they had taken from the Fezian monarch, and in a few days made themselves masters of that capital, and its large territory: from thence they spread their conquest over all those mountainous parts, and obliged the inhabitants to become their tributaries; by which they prevented that unfortunate prince receiving any farther assistance from those parts. This obliged him, both by way of reprisal, and in order to support the shattered remains of his army, to send them in two bodies to raise contributions in the province of Sus: but here also they were repelled by the superior forces of Mohammed.

THIS last, flushed with his success, resolved soon after to take the strong fortrefs of Aguer, situate on the cape of its name <sup>i</sup>, which was kept by a strong Portuguese garrison; and, after a stout defence on both sides, made himself master of it, but lost 16,000 men before it; in revenge of which he put the whole garrison to the sword, except the brave Mont Roy, the governor of it, to whom he gave a kind reception, rather on account of his beautiful daughter Donna Mencia, than of his valour or merit (C).

THE reduction of this place soon injected a terror among all the Moors and Arabs of those parts; insomuch, that those that were in alliance or under tribute to the king of Portugal came over to the conqueror; and that prince, finding that the towns which he held on the

(C) This young lady, no less admirable for her virtue than her beauty, having rejected, with scorn, all the caresses and offers of the enamoured Mohammed, and even his promise of marriage to her, was just upon the point to be delivered up to the brutish lust of his Moors by the exasperated conqueror. The horror of such a dreadful doom soon determined her to capitulate, and to consent to the marriage, upon condition that she should be allowed the free exercise of her religion, and be regarded as his lawful wife.

Mohammed made no scruple to consent to these conditions, and married her accordingly. But his other wives, exasperated at the preference which he shewed to the young Portuguese lady above them, found means to poison her in her first pregnancy: soon after which, to shew his grief and tender regard for her, he restored her father to his liberty, and sent him home laden with presents (3).

a Atlantic, cost him more to keep than they were worth, ordered them to be forthwith dismantled and abandoned. By this means our young Sharif easily became master of Saffi, Arzilla, Azamor, and Alcassar-ceguir; after which he made no longer scruple to take the royal title and ensigns, and to reckon himself as more than on a level with his brother Hammed, whom he now exceeded as much in power, as he had all along in valour and policy. This behaviour failed not to cause a most dangerous rupture between them; which, in spite of all the remonstrances of Cid Arrabal, an Alfaki of great sense and probity (D), ended in an open war<sup>1</sup>.

MOHAMMED, however, wisely forbore all kind of hostilities, till he was attacked by his brother; and till then contented himself with apprising the great officers of his army of Hammed's treachery and ingratitude; and giving them such an account of his own actions and behaviour, as he knew would most effectually incline them to his side; and, putting his hand to his beard, assured them, that they should see, in a few days, that haughty and perfidious Hammed vanquished and made his prisoner.

ACCORDINGLY, having sent part of his army before, under the command of one of his best officers, to secure a pass on the south side of mount Atlas, leading from Tarudant to Morocco, Hammed, who had been apprised of it, marched his army on the opposite side. He had given the command of his vanguard to Muley Nacer, his second son; who, being overtaken in a narrow defile by Harran the son of Mohammed, a prince already experienced in war, a bloody skirmish soon ensued, which was followed by an engagement of both armies, in which that of Hammed was defeated, with the loss of 8000 men, and himself and Bubanzen, another of his sons, were taken prisoners, as he had foretold. Upon this overthrow, Muley Zidan, another of his sons, who had happily escaped, and thrown himself, with the small remains of his army, into the city of Morocco, proposed at first, in a kind of despair, to apply to Charles V. for assistance; but was dissuaded from it by his friends, as such a step would have rendered him odious to all the Africans; and might, perhaps, engage them to join all their forces against him. At length, by the strenuous interposition of his own daughter, who was then married to prince Harran, Mohammed's eldest son, and of some of the greatest men on both sides, a partition treaty was concluded between the two brothers, in which it was agreed, that Mohammed should possess the kingdom of Sus, and all provinces on the south side of mount Atlas, together with Numidia and Libya, and be paid one half of the vast treasure, which Hascen, their father, had left to them; and that Harran, his eldest son, should be declared heir to both kingdoms, and after him Muley Zidan, according to their father's last will. Hammed, being set at liberty in virtue of this treaty, had no sooner reached his capital of Morocco, than he absolutely refused to ratify it, as prejudicial to his eldest son, and began to make great preparations for renewing the war. Mohammed did not give him time to do it, but marched directly with his army towards Morocco, and was met by his brother's forces at Quehera, about seven or eight miles short of that capital. Both armies engaged with unusual fierceness; but whilst that of Hammed was employed in disengaging the royal standard, which had accidentally intangled itself in a thicket, Mohammed charged them with such surprising speed, that he put them to the rout, and pursued them all the remainder of that day, and the following night, and found himself on the next morning within sight of Morocco. He immediately summoned it to surrender, and a report to be spread, that Hammed had been killed at the last action; upon hearing of which, Gibani, who was left governor of it, afraid to incur the displeasure of the conqueror, delivered it up to him, together with all the garrison, arms, treasury, and seraglio, of his brother. Mohammed, upon this occasion, shewed an extraordinary moderation, and forbore laying his hands either on his treasury, or on the effects of the inhabitants; but this did not hinder the fearful Hammed from mistrusting him; and, instead of endeavouring to treat with him, he sent his two sons to the king of Fez, to beg his assistance against his brother. Oataz, who thought this a fair opportunity to recover some of his lost provinces, readily engaged to send him a powerful succour, with all possible expedition; but Mohammed, who foresaw how prejudicial such an alliance might prove to them both, chose rather to persuade him to come to a new composition, and easily brought him to agree to break off his alliance with the Fezian king.

(D) This brave officer, who was a sincere friend to them both, having represented to them the imminent detriment which this rupture would infallibly bring to their common interest, as well as to that of their religion, had so far succeeded, as to bring the two parties to an interview. But, upon their first mutual embracing, Hammed, the strongest of the two, taking fast hold of him, threw him flat upon the ground. Mohammed, no less nimble and active than his brother was strong, soon recovered himself; and, having upbraided him of his perfidy, in the severest terms, went away full of anger and resentment; and with a full resolution never more to be reconciled to him, but to let the fortune of war decide the difference between them (4).

IN this second interview, which was under a large pavilion, where Mohammed was seated on a stately throne, the vanquished Hammed was conducted by his two nephews, and stood some time before his brother, in a kind of gloomy mournful silence, to give him an opportunity to break it first. Mohammed, after a short demur, taking him by the hand, caused him to sit down by him, and made him a most pathetic speech, intermixed with severe reproaches, and brotherly affection; wherein he told him, among other things, that he must blame his own unnatural perfidy to a faithful and affectionate brother, if Providence had now delivered him up to the mercy of the man whom he had lately treated as a mortal enemy, and would, if he had got him into his power, have used with the utmost cruelty. “But,” added he, “though I have great reason to be offended at your ungrateful behaviour; yet I cannot forbear looking upon you as my brother, as well as my prisoner, and as such am willing to give you an opportunity of repairing the injuries you have done me, and retrieving your honour and royalty. Restore but to me your brotherly affection and confidence, and I will promise to restore to you your own dominions, and with them my zeal and allegiance; and will be content to obey you in the quality of your grand vazier. One thing only I must beg of you, that you will retire with your whole household for some time to the province of Taffilet, that I may acquit myself of my promise to the inhabitants of your metropolis, and free them from the dread they are in of your extreme resentment, for having so easily opened their gates to me. As for the wrong you complain to be done to your children, in yielding the succession of the kingdom to mine, according to our father’s last will, you may assure yourself, that, as soon as you and I join forces, and act in concert together for the interest of our religion, we shall not want for new conquests sufficient to make up that loss to them; and that I shall make it my chief glory, to give them fresh opportunities of displaying their merit, and advancing their fortune.” Hammed seemed deeply affected with this speech; and only answered it by some feigned excuses on his past behaviour, and promises of a more conformable one for the future; and, on the next morning, departed with his retinue and family to the kingdom of Taffilet<sup>m</sup>. Mohammed, having thus far succeeded in all his views, began now to think on some pretence for declaring war against the king of Fez, whom he looked upon as not only an enemy, but as an eclipser of his glory, on account of his boasted long series of royal ancestors. He therefore sent to demand of him the restitution of the province of Tedla, which belonged to the kingdom of Morocco, of which he was now possessed; and had no sooner received his absolute denial, than he raised a powerful force, and laid siege to the castle on the frontiers of Fez, but was quickly forced to raise it; partly by the bravery of Onzar, who commanded it, and partly on account of the approach of the Fezian army; who, with Oataz at their head, were in full march against him. It consisted of 30,000 men, among whom were the chief nobility of his kingdom, Velles and Dubdu; besides some Arabian Cheyks at the head of their troops; 800 Turks, commanded by a Persian; and 1000 archers on horseback, who came and joined the body of his army.

MOHAMMED’s army consisted of 18,000 choice troops, and 1200 archers; nevertheless, trusting partly to his own good fortune, and partly to the inconstancy of the Arabs and Fezians, marched by slow journies towards him; and had the pleasure to hear, from day to day, that the Fezian army continued to decrease, either by the desertion of his own subjects, or the retreat of some of his allies. This obliged that prince to engage him as soon as he could; which Mohammed perceiving, only reminded his troops of the great consequence of this present action; which, if crowned with victory, would infallibly open a way to them for the reduction of all Barbary; and, as he was leading them to the onset, he farther assured them, that not a man of them should fall, except a negro; and that the king of Fez would be taken prisoner; all which, he told them, he knew by his skill in the magic art. The two armies met; and Mohammed, having given express orders to his, not to stir till the signal was given, Oataz gave the same to his own; but the former only waited till the hot sun, which shone too full against them, was declined far enough to do the same to the enemy; and then gave the signal for the onset. Both sides engaged with equal ardor, till Mohammed’s center, where he commanded, opening to the right and left, discovered a battery of cannon, which he had concealed there behind the ranks; which, as soon as it began to play, spread such an universal panic among the Fezians, that they betook themselves to flight. The king himself was hurried away by his own officers after them; but in his flight had the misfortune, wounded as he already was, to fall off his horse, and to be taken prisoner, and brought bound to Mohammed. The first interview of those two rivals having something singular in it, we shall content ourselves with giving our readers the substance of it in the margin (E), to avoid interrupting the main thread of the history.

a AFTER this victory, Mohammed, by the consent of his royal prisoner, marched his army directly to Fez, where they both supposed the inhabitants would readily yield him the province of Mequinez, as a ransom for their king. They were got within two leagues of that metropolis, when they received news, that the Fezians, to whom Muley Nacer, one of the king's sons, had fled immediately after the battle, had raised him to the crown, on condition that he should surrender it to his father, as soon as he had regained his liberty. Oataz thereupon sent his son orders, that Mequinez should be surrendered to the Sharif, as the only ransom he would accept of; to whom Nacer answered, that he was ready to comply with it; but required a longer time to dispose the council, and others concerned in it, to an agreement. This he did only to gain time, till he could make himself master of the Honguy; and, by that means, hinder the Sharif's retreat, himself designing to surprise his camp in the night. Mohammed, who had notice of his design time enough to prevent it, marched, with the utmost speed and fury, quite to the walls of the capital; where, having seized upon 200 burghers, who were walking along the walls of it without suspicion or fear, he caused them to be strangled in his sight. Then, taking his two royal prisoners with him, he caused them to be led in chains to Morocco; and sent his two sons Harran and Abdel Cader, with a powerful army, to ravage all the territories about Fez.

Mohammed's cruelty to the Fezians.

MULEY NACER, wisely foreseeing that the longer he delayed his father's ransom, the more difficulty he should find to content an enemy, who daily gained ground of him, fell immediately on a negotiation with his two sons, and soon after put them in possession of Mequinez; but their father, who pretended to know nothing of this new treaty, absolutely refused to ratify it, unless Oataz engaged to surrender the city of Fez to him, whenever he should think fit to demand it of him; to which harsh article the unfortunate monarch was forced to agree, though it gave his enemy a specious pretence of renewing the war against him, whenever he pleased. Oataz, having upon these hard terms obtained his liberty, returned directly to his own capital, where his sons, upon his arrival, readily surrendered the crown to him.

Oataz ransomed on hard terms;

" your tutor inclines me rather to give you, as I was wont formerly to do, some useful lessons, rather of tenderness than resentment. You cannot, indeed, be blamed for any thing, but the neglect of punishing a great variety of atrocious crimes, which your subjects impudently commit in your metropolis, once so famed for religion and learning, but now the sink of impiety and every kind of vice. But since it is so, that you had not the courage to make use of the authority which God had intrusted you with, to suppress these enormities; if you see yourself now deprived of all your royalty, do not imagine me to be the author of it, but think rather, that it is God himself, who hath fought on my side against you; and that your defeat is wholly his own work.

" Great kings are seldom able to see truth, but through mists and clouds, or to receive the wholesome counsels that are given to them, till some misfortunes oblige them to open their eyes. It is, therefore, to render you more obedient to his voice, that he hath brought you to this low estate; and now enjoins you, by my mouth, to restore religion, arts and sciences, to their antient splendor; by punishing those who are enemies to them, and whom you have hitherto tolerated within your own dominions. As for me, do not think that I will take any advantage of your present ill fortune; for, tho' I have just cause to resent the assistance which you offered to my brother against me, yet I know as well how to forgive, as to revenge, an injury, when I have just cause to do it. Be therefore of good courage, and depend upon it, that it will not be long ere you are restored to your dominions."

Thus far the subtle Sharif, whom Oataz heard with as much patience, as the excessive heat of the day, the smart of his wounds, and the insolence of the speaker, would permit him. But, as soon as he had the liberty to speak, he made him a most noble reply, in terms to this effect. " Tho' few victors make so moderate a use of their victory as you do, yet I can hardly believe that you took up arms against me merely to give me this lesson. However, since you give it me as a matter, I will receive it rather as a disciple than a prisoner;

" and, in hopes that my answer may prove as useful to you, as you think your advice is to me, I shall readily own, that many abuses and irregularities may be introduced in a state which it is not in the power of a monarch to foresee, or redress. But, granting that those you charge me with were ever so great and enormous, and entirely owing to my neglect of suppressing them, doth it belong to such a man as you to take the punishment of my misconduct upon yourself? You, whom my father, at my request, had raised from the vile employment of a schoolmaster, to the height of credit and fortune to which you are arrived, upon the ruins of our family? Is it for you, upon whom I have heaped the greatest favours, to repay me now with the blackest ingratitude; and this, under the specious cloak of virtue and religion? But to avoid saying any thing, that may expose the unparalleled dissimulation you are so great a master of, to those that hear us, be persuaded rather, that Providence hath now delivered me up into your power, to try what use you will make of your victory, and whether, after you have violated the most solemn treaties, and broke the most sacred ties of allegiance and gratitude, your heart can be capable of relenting. And, since you have gone so far to make me sensible of my duty, let us now see how well you can perform your own; and whether you can perceive how far the inconstancy of fortune hath made us stand in need of each other. As for your complaint of my assisting your brother against you, I disdain to justify an action so laudable in itself; and which ought only to make you sensible, how ready I should have been to have done the same by you, had you been in his case." This answer, severe and mortifying as it was, was received by the artful Sharif with a smiling countenance. But, to avoid all further replies on either side, he ordered the king, out of a pretended regard to his wounds, to be conducted into a stately tent next to his own; where he had the mortification to hear, that Abn' Onzar, to whom he had committed the government of the fortress of Fixtela, was come to deliver the keys of it to his competitor (5).

Lays siege to Fez.

MOHAMMED had no sooner taken possession of the country of Mequinez, than he came back to demand the surrender of the city of Fez, according to the late treaty; to which Oataz, in the utmost perplexity, answered, that it was out of his power to oblige the inhabitants, scarcely recovered out of their fright, at the dreadful slaughter he had lately made of them, to open their gates, or suffer him to enter into their city; upon which refusal, the impatient Sharif ordered his two sons to join him with a powerful army, and came and incamped before the place<sup>a</sup>.

Hammed sends a succour to it.

In the mean time his brother Hammed, having broke his promise a second time, had sent a powerful succour to the Fezian king, under the command of his eldest son Muley Zidan. The two armies met, and a long and desperate engagement ensued; in which, though neither party could claim the victory, yet Zidan gave such marks of his valour and conduct, that the Fezian king began to look upon him as the chief prop of his crown. But this unfortunately raised such a spirit of jealousy between his own sons and that brave young hero, that he retired soon after, in great discontent, to Taffilet, where his father still resided. This did not hinder Mohammed from carrying on the siege of Fez; and though it advanced so slowly, that he had already lain near two years before it, yet was he not discouraged from pursuing it with a surprising assiduity. At length the inhabitants, quite exhausted and tired with the length of it, as well as the want of victuals, found means to treat privately with the Sharif; and, on some advantageous considerations, agreed to deliver up the old city to him. The king, who was in the new city, and had some intelligence, or at least suspicion, of this treacherous negotiation, ordered his general, named Bubanzon, to make a sally, with his cavalry, and endeavour to surprise the besiegers camp in the night; but the Fezians immediately acquainted the Sharif with it; who caused two ambushes to be laid so closely for him, that he was repulsed with great loss; and with only twelve of his men recovered the city, whilst the rest made the best of their way towards Velez.<sup>b</sup>

The inhabitants betray it to Mohammed.

At length Mohammed, having made himself sure of the inhabitants, approached nearer to the walls, and caused a breach to be made, at which he entered sword in hand, and was received with demonstrations of joy by the treacherous citizens, before the king, who was still in New Fez, had any notice of it. He came out, however, time enough to stop his progress; and might, in all likelihood, have repulsed him, if his troops had had no other enemy than he. But, whilst both sides were hotly engaged in the streets, one side crying out, Long live the Sharif, and the other, Long live the Merini, at length a new outcry was heard above the rest, Long live the man that gives us bread; upon which, men and women got up to the top of the houses, and threw such volleys of stones on the king's forces, as obliged him and them to retire to the new city; upon which Mohammed returned to his camp. Bubanzon, seeing the enemy master of Old Fez, advised the king to fly with him to Velez, and try to obtain some succour from the Christian princes, who were now highly concerned to put a stop to the Sharif's career; but as that could not be done, without abandoning his mother, wife, and family, to the mercy of an exasperated enemy, he rather chose to send Lela Mahabib, the old queen, in the guise of a suppliant to him, to obtain, by her prayers and tears, the best conditions she could for herself and her unfortunate son; or, at least, that he might assign him such a maintenance as was suitable to his dignity, and in such a part of his new dominions, as he should think fit. The tyrant at last agreed to it, upon condition that her son abandoned the city to him, and departed out of it, with his whole family, within three days; which being complied with, he ordered the king to Morocco, and his two sons to Tarudant; threw a strong garrison into the city, and, having taken possession of the royal palace, obliged the king's daughter to marry him; which was done with great solemnity, in order to make himself some colour of a title to that great metropolis, and to the greatest part of the Fezian kingdom, which he was now possessed of.<sup>c</sup>

A bloody skirmish between Oataz and him.

Oataz forced to sue for a maintenance.

Mohammed grants it, and sends him to Morocco.

Sends his brother to the desert of Zahara.

HE was no sooner settled in that capital, than he sent orders to his brother Hammed to leave Taffilet, and retire to Tagoret, or the country of Taguira, in the desert of Zahara; who, to regain, if possible, his confidence, sent him his four sons as hostages. But Mohammed sent him back the two eldest, with the same orders, and married the other two to two of his own daughters; and, having thus so far put it out of his power to hurt him, ordered his own son Abderram, or Habdarraman, to take the government of Taffilet, in Hammed's room. Not long after Mohammed sent his three other sons Harran, Abdelcader, and Abdalla, to take the city of Tremecen, which surrendered to them almost upon the first summons. Harran gave the government of it to Abdalla, intending to surprise that of Oran; but was taken ill before he could come near the place, returned to Fez, and died there. This we may look upon as the beginning of his misfortunes, as he had been so surprisingly successful hitherto, as well as his sons who had fought under him; but was now bereaved of that whom he designed<sup>d</sup>

- a for his successor, not only on account of his primogeniture, but much more of his conduct and bravery. Not long after his death, a rumour being spread that the Algerines were coming, with a powerful force, to retake the city of Tremecen, Mohammed sent his next son thither, with a strong reinforcement; and, at the same time, dispatched an express to Habdarraman, then at Taphilet, to join his brother with another body. This last obeyed; but a misunderstanding happening between them (F), the former suspecting nothing of the treachery of the latter, but depending upon his being bravely seconded by him, engaged the enemy with his usual valour; but, to his great surprize, Habdarraman, instead of coming to his assistance, stood only as an idle spectator, and saw him fight like a person who was resolved to conquer or die, till he was actually killed, and his brother Abdalla dangerously wounded in the arm. Bahami, Habdarraman's treachery to his brother;
- b the son of the brave Abdelcader, seeing his father and uncle in such imminent danger, went and inquired of Habdarraman, why he did not second them with his forces? but received no other answer from him, than a blow with his back-sword across his arm: upon which he went and complained of him to his grandfather; who, to punish his perfidy, caused him to be privately poisoned, as is supposed, for he died about a month after. By this time Mohammed, worn out with old age and the fatigues of war, and his late ill success, and more with grief for the death of his two sons, had contracted such a strange moroseness, and brutish jealousy, that he caused the unhappy king of Fez and his son to be strangled, merely on suspicion that they had encouraged an insurrection in the province of Derenderen, tho' his own exactions and tyranny were the most probable causes of it; which made those brave mountaineers fight with such fury and intrepidity against his son Abdalla, that he could not, with all his forces, valour, or policy, reduce them to their obedience. The old Sharif, provoked that his son should meet with so many bloody repulses, resolved to march himself against them, but had no better success; and was forced to return, without any other achievement than plundering some few of their villages at the bottom of the mountain. The king of Fez, and his son, strangled by Mohammed.
- c In the mean time the sad catastrophe of the Fezian king had reached the ears of the noble Bubanzon; who, ever since that monarch had declined his advice of asking assistance from the Christian powers against the incroaching Sharifs, had retired to the Pennon of Velez. This old minister, who was himself of the royal blood, tried in vain to engage the emperor Charles V. and other Christian princes, to restore him to the Fezian crown, promising them to become tributary to them, and to deliver up the Pennon above-mentioned into their hands.
- d Mohammed, who was thoroughly acquainted with every step he took, was no less industrious in breaking all his measures, the last of which was a treaty he had made with the king of Portugal, which, instead of answering his sanguine hopes, served only to hasten his ruin. He returned to Africa with the small assistance which he had obtained from that monarch; and no sooner landed his forces at the port of Albuzomas, than he was forced to defend himself against the neighbouring inhabitants, who had taken up arms against him; and, which was still worse, whilst he was engaged against them, Salba Rais, governor of Algiers under Soltan Soleyman, attacked his forces at sea, towards sun-set, and continued fighting them all that night. On the next day, Bubanzon expostulated with him for falling thus upon him, whilst he was waging war against the Sharif, their common enemy; but was answered, that he was justly punished for begging help of the Christians, instead of applying to Soleyman, who had send Sinan, his admiral, with a powerful fleet, to fight against them, and was ready to restore him to his lost dominions. It is not improbable, that the Algerine Rais had some private instructions for what he did and said, either from Zidan or the Porte; however that be, it made such an impression on Bubanzon, that he was easily persuaded to join forces with him against the Christians; upon which they both together began to advance towards Fez, whilst the old Sharif was taken up in reducing the revolted Derenderians. As soon as he heard of the danger that threatened his capital, he made all the haste he could towards it at the head of his army; and, advancing towards Tezan, on the frontiers of Tremecen, continued there 50 whole days, expecting the Algerine Rais; who, on his side, was advancing by slow marches, in order to avoid his cavalry, which was sent to range along these roads, and gain an opportunity of increasing his forces as he went. But having one day fallen accidentally on Mohammed's rear Mohammed marches to secure Fez;

(F) Abdelcader and Habdarraman, who were born of different mothers, and always entertained an emulous jealousy against each other, which increased at this juncture, on the following occasion. The former, as being the elder of the two, and whose horse was already quite fatigued, desired of the latter to exchange 2000 of his, which were quite fresh, for an equal number of his own, which he at first absolutely refused; but, at the desire of Abdalla, the other brother, agreed to it with some difficulty. He carried his resentment so far, however, that he would not be present at the battle; and, by thus sacrificing his brother to the enemy, became the just victim of his own perfidy (6).

defeated and forced into Fez. guard, commanded by his son Abdalla, a desperate fight ensued, in which the young Sharif <sup>a</sup> was totally routed, lost all his artillery and ammunition, and was forced to march night and day to reach the city of Fez. But Salha Rais, a few days after this defeat, encamping his army along the banks of the Cebu, or Cebro, soon obliged him to take the field again, to prevent the surrender of a city (G), in which he knew he had so few real friends, and his competitor so many <sup>q</sup>. Mohammed therefore was, much against his will, obliged to sally out against him, which he did only at the head of 8000 men; but suspecting the Turkish captain of his guard of holding an intelligence with Salha Rais, he caused his head to be cut off before he ventured farther; after which he sent the Rais word, that he came with full intent to engage him. His whole army consisted of 80,000 horse, 8000 of which he sent to oppose his passage over the river; but they were so briskly cannonaded from the other side, that they <sup>b</sup> were forced to retire, and shelter themselves behind a rising ground; upon which he immediately crossed the river; and, having cast up in haste a slight intrenchment, ordered his army to continue in arms all that night. On the next day both sides prepared for the engagement; in which the Rais at the first gained an advantageous post, which Mohammed had been possessed of, and which proved a kind of omen or prelude to his victory. The Turks, resenting the strangling of their captain, and seeing a body of renegadoes placed before them, lost all patience, threw down the Sharif's standard, and fell on the renegadoes and what other troops stood before them; whilst the Fezian troops, disconcerted at the fire of the enemy's artillery, betook themselves to flight; upon which all those, who were in prince Bubanzon's interest, forsook the Sharif, and came over to him. Mohammed thereupon immediately ordered his son Abdalla to go and force himself, if possible, into Old Fez; which he, with some difficulty, did; and, causing the artillery of the ramparts to fire upon the enemy, made the Rais suspect that the inhabitants were resolved to hold out against him. He complained bitterly of it to Bubanzon, who had assured him that they were all in his interest; upon which that prince, in a fury, took 500 Janissaries with him, broke one of the city gates open, and entered the place sword in hand, which obliged Abdalla to retire into New Fez, where his father was already got. They soon discovered how impossible it would be to hold it out against the victorious Rais; and being resolved to abandon it out of hand, Mohammed ordered his wives and household to get on horseback, and take with them their most valuable effects; and arming himself only with a sword and shield, hastened with them to a place of safety, whilst Budcar, <sup>d</sup> one of his captains, guarded the gate, to prevent his being pursued.

Salha Rais's treachery to Bubanzon. BUHANZON thought now of nothing but of being proclaimed king of Fez, and put in possession of the vast treasure which Mohammed had been forced to leave behind. But the treacherous Rais, under pretence of his being too great a favourite of the Christians; for whose help he had gone a begging so long, caused him to be thrown into a prison, set prince Meroui upon the throne, and seized upon the Sharif's treasure. This strange behaviour, joined to a report that he had murdered prince Bubanzon, raised such a tumult in the city, that he was obliged to produce him to the people, and settle him upon the throne; but, in revenge, sent a man after Mohammed, under pretence of treating with him about some female prisoners of distinction, but in reality to invite him to return, and to promise him his assistance. <sup>e</sup> Finding, however, that he was now too far engaged in another war to accept of his offer, he obliged the inhabitants to pay him a fine of an ounce of silver per head, and returned to Algiers laden with an immense spoil <sup>r</sup>.

Pennon of Velez and Mequinez taken. BUHANZON, being thus settled on the Fezian throne, sent his son Mohammed to demand the restitution of the Pennon of Velez, with which the Sharif's governor immediately complied. Neither was this the only place of consequence which that prince took from him; Abdalla being obliged to abandon Mequinez, to join his father, now engaged in a new war, that city fell immediately after into his possession.

MOHAMMED had at this time two enemies to struggle against under his present ill fortune; viz. Bubanzon, now on the Fezian throne; and, what grated him still more, his brother <sup>f</sup> Hammed; who being informed of all that had passed, and thinking it now a proper time to revenge himself of him, had found means to get out of his desert, and to make himself master of Taphilet. He lost no time in deliberating, but sent immediately his son Abdalla,

(G) The city of Fez, which, as we have shewn before (6), is situate upon the Cebu, hath, from time immemorial, enjoyed this singular privilege, that it can surrender itself to an enemy, as soon as they are advanced within half a mile of its walls, if the king doth not send another army, or is not strong enough to oppose them.

Every monarch, at his coronation, is obliged to ratify this privilege to the Fezians; which, it is supposed, was granted to them by some of its founders, who thought it unreasonable that so considerable a place should be lost, out of an ill-timed fidelity to a prince who was not in a condition to defend it (7).

a at the head of a strong army, against the former, whilst he led another in person against the latter. His son no sooner advanced towards Fez, than Bubanzon sent his two sons, Muley Nacer and Mohammed, against him, at the head of a numerous host : but these two young princes, through an emulous jealousy, refusing to engage the Sharif jointly, Mohammed was rash enough to engage the enemy without him, in hopes of securing to himself the sole honour of the victory, and was quickly put to the rout : whilst Nacer, more cautious than he, chose rather to retire to Fez, than to hazard the loss of his forces by a second engagement, which he easily foresaw would only yield his antagonist the glory of a double victory. However, this did not discourage their father from making a fresh attempt ; who sallying out at the head of those very troops, before Abdalla could put his own in order of battle, fell so unexpectedly upon him, that he put him to a shameful flight, and pursued him to the very walls of Morocco. It happened luckily for the old Sharif, who then held his brother Hammed closely besieged in Taphilet, that he heard the news of his son's victory before he did that of his defeat and flight ; which gave him an opportunity to give out, that Bubanzon, after a total overthrow, had been obliged to refuge himself in the Pennon of Velez, whence he would be quickly dislodged, and sent a second time a begging for help from his old Christian friends. For this so alarmed Hammed's dread of his brother's resentment, that he immediately sent his two sons to implore his mercy ; and, upon his promise of it, surrendered himself into his hands, and was sent by him into a Turkish monastery, where he was ordered to be kept confined for the rest of his life. Mohammed, having thus easily recovered the city of Taphilet, left a strong garrison in it ; and taking his two nephews, Nacer and Sidan, with him, hastened with all speed towards Fez ; but, in his way, caused the two young princes to be butchered, to prevent their raising any commotions in favour of their father, or of themselves*.

Bubanzon defeated and killed.

In the mean time Bubanzon, flushed with his late victory, would not let him come too near his capital ; but went to meet him at some distance, fully resolved and prepared to give him battle. His son Mohammed, who commanded his van-guard, consisting of 9000 Arabs, made a great slaughter among that of the Sharif, who, coming speedily to their assistance, obliged him to retire. Upon which Bubanzon, who knew that his all depended on the success of this engagement, advanced with his other son Muley Nacer, and charged the enemy with no less conduct than bravery ; but having received a dangerous wound in his thigh, which had laid him flat on the ground, his troops, who supposed him to have been killed, betook themselves to flight ; Nacer was the only one who stood his ground for some time ; but finding himself overpowered, was at length forced, with a few straggling soldiers which he rallied, to betake himself to the adjacent mountains. He was quickly followed thither by his brother Mohammed, who seeing their father dead, had immediately retired into Fez ; but, fearing lest the inhabitants should betray him to the enemy, had abandoned the place, and fled to the mountains ; upon which Mohammed entered the city in triumph.

The two unfortunate princes found no better resource than to retire to Mequinez, and thence to Sallee, where embarking in an European merchantman, they were taken by a corsair, commanded by a renegado of Bretany, in full sight of the Spanish coasts. Mohammed stayed not long at Fez, being resolved to go and suppress the mountaineers of Derenderen, who had already given him so much trouble ; and, leaving Abdalla with a strong garrison in that metropolis, marched directly to Morocco, whence he sent a sufficient force against these revolvers ; and having in a great measure reduced them, and nothing now to apprehend from any side, he invited his brother Hammed and his whole family to his capital ; and then gave himself up to his old nuptial delights (H). He was again soon satiated with them ; and putting himself at the head of 12,000 Turks, of which his guard consisted, besides a great corps of cavalry, he marched directly from Tarudant to Sus, which proved the most unfortunate expedition he ever took.

By this time Hascen, or Hassan, the son of the celebrated pirate Barbarossa, the late tyrant of Algiers (of whom we shall speak more fully in a subsequent chapter) had succeeded him in that kingdom, and was in constant fear of being invaded by the old Sharif, and in no condition to make head against him, resolved, at any rate, to rid himself of so dreaded an enemy.

The Algerine governor hires a ruffian to assassinate the old Sharif.

(H) The old Sharif, no less uxorious than warlike and ambitious, was accustomed to add every year a new wife to his old ones, and to indulge himself in dalliance with them, whenever fortune favoured him with a vacation from his martial toils. He had now, according to custom, cast his affections upon a beautiful young damsel at Tarudant, with whom he intended to solace himself, being now free from any apprehension from his brother, whom he kept in some measure prisoner in his capital of Morocco. But whether his removing now to Sus was only designed as a journey of pleasure with his new bride, or, which is more probable from the escort that followed him, to quell some new revolt, our authors have not told us (8).

Mohammed
and his sons murdered at Morocco.

He had in his service a Turk of his own name, every way qualified for any base exploit; and this desperado he engages, by a large sum, and larger promises, to undertake to assassinate him at all adventures; and engaged to pay his surviving family a considerable pension, in case he perished in the attempt. Fraught with these hopes, the wretch hastens to Fez, where he pretended to Abdalla to have received some ill treatment from the Algerine governor. The young Sharif, who never looked upon the Turks but as a set of treacherous villains, without admitting him to his presence, bid him go to his father, who put greater confidence in them, and would readily take him under his protection. He was accordingly received by the old Sharif with singular favour; and in a little while made captain of his guard; which made so deep an impression upon the villainous assassin, that it was a long time before he could prevail upon himself to perpetrate the horrid deed on so generous a benefactor, or to contrive a way to execute it without suspicion or danger. At length, as they were on their march from Tarudant towards Sus, he discovered such a general murmuring and discontent among the Turkish guard, on account of their pay being withheld from them above a year, as left him no room to doubt of his easily engaging a sufficient number of them into his perfidious design, by the prospect of the Sharif's treasure, which he promised to share amongst them, and to secure them a safe retreat in Tremecen. The place they pitched upon for the execution of their plot was the Streight of Bibona, which crosses part of Mount Atlas. Mohammed was then sitting at his tent door in the cool of the evening, attended by a few guards, and a favourite renegado, where Hascen and his assassins presented themselves before him, as it were to pay their obedience to him, when the renegado, perceiving the foremost of them to draw their scymitars, cry'd out, Treason, and called to the Sharif to run for his life. He did so; but in his hasty flight fell upon his face; upon which Hascen, who was got close to him, cut him across the hand; and the rest falling upon him, pierced him through with their swords, and left him weltering in blood, with his Portuguese renegado, who had defended him to the last, expiring by his side. Such was the tragical end of that great warrior and wicked tyrant, who, under the specious cloak of religion, had raised himself to the summit of power and grandeur, by the blackest treason and basest ingratitude. Hascen had no sooner perpetrated the horrid deed, than he caused it to be proclaimed through the camp, that they had assassinated the tyrant; and without meeting with the least opposition either from those troops, or, which is still more surprising, from any of the Sharif's sons, seized upon his treasure, wives, and children; and promised his protection to as many of his forces as would come over to him. He thence marched to Tarudant, and made himself master of the town and castle, and all the treasure he found in them, the young Sharif, who commanded in it, being fled at his first approach. This young prince had some time caused a renegado Jew to be imprisoned for debt, or rather for having found him too dangerous and enterprising a fellow. Him Hascen soon released, and made him chief judge of the city; and he, in return for the favour, advised him to fortify himself in that place, till he had received the reinforcement which had been promised from the governor of Algiers; which, if he had done, might have greatly embarrassed the measures of the new Sharif. But whether this gave him a mistrust of his fidelity, or his guilt made him apprehend the arrival of some forces from Morocco and Fez, instead of following his advice, he suddenly abandoned the place, and, marching through all the most desert parts of the country, strove to reach the city of Tremecen with all his ill-gotten treasure. The Jew, on the other hand, to reingratiate himself with the new Sharif, and maintain himself in his new post, sent immediate notice of his flight to that son of his who had lately fled at his approach; upon which he got together all the Arabs and Berebers in that neighbourhood, and went at their head in pursuit of them with all imaginable speed. They were fortunate enough to overtake the traitor, and all his accomplices, and cut them all in pieces, except five, whom they took prisoners; and recovered all the treasures and young princes whom they had carried off, and brought them safe back to Tarudant. The first thing which the young Sharif did after his return, was to drive all that he suspected of disaffection out of that city; after which he readily surrendered it to Abdalla, as the immediate successor of Mohammed. In the mean time the news of the old Sharif's assassination having reached the city of Morocco, Hali ben Budchar, then grand vazier and governor of it, fearing lest any insurrection should be raised in favour of Sharif Hammed, whom his brother had left prisoner with him, caused him, and seven of his sons and grandsons, to be murdered, without Abdalla's orders or knowledge; so that these two rival brothers, who had so long contended for the empire, were cut off within a very short space of time from each other by a violent death, and left Abdalla in the quiet possession of it. We have dwelt the longer on the reign of that prince, as he was the founder of the new monarchy, in order to shew our readers by what means, and variety of events, he arrived at this excessive height of power and grandeur. Several of those that followed it, having little a elle worth notice, but the bloody wars that happened between the competitors to the succession, and the oppression and misery beneath which their subjects groaned under each of them, we shall, for that reason, forbear to enlarge upon, till we come to that remarkable one of Muley Isbmael, the first of this dynasty whose reign hath made any considerable figure in the history of that empire.

To return to that of Abdalla; the officious cruelty of Budchar on so many young princes, did not go long unpunished. Among those whom that prime minister caused to be cut off were two sons, whom Zidan, Hammed's eldest son, had by Meriam, Abdalla's beloved sister; at which that princess was so grievously affected, that her resentment soon furnished her with the most effectual means to ruin the murderer. She began with infusing some jealous fears Their death se-
b against that designing minister into her brother's mind, as if he had butchered those young werely re- princes with no other view than to deprive his son, then a minor, of the succession, in order venged.
to raise his brother to the throne after his death. The Sharif being impatient to have some farther proof of it, she immediately devised a stratagem, which failed not to convince him of it. She took the opportunity of Abdalla's sickness to debar every one from coming to see Princess's Me-
him. Among the rest, the vazier Hali was very frequent and importunate in his visits; but riam's strata- being still denied access to him, and suspecting him to be really dead, he took the liberty to gem against the tell her, that there was an absolute necessity of his being satisfied on that point, seeing every grand vazier.
thing was kept in such suspense, that no matter, how important soever, could be determined without it. The princess thinking it now a proper time to spring her mine, went in to her
c brother, and, with his consent, throwing a covering over his face, called in the prime minister, and told him the king was indeed dead; and asked him what was proper to be done in such a juncture. Upon which Hali, throwing off the disguise, told her boldly, that he thought the king's son by far too young to succeed his father; that the state required an intrepid governor, who was capable to hold the reins of it with his own hands, in order to quell the troubles that might arise, punish the crimes which Abdalla had connived at, and recompense the services which he had overlooked; that he could see none fitter to restore the peace of it than his brother: and that, notwithstanding his great obligations to the late king, he should be the very first who should oppose the succession of his son in favour of that prince. He was going on, when the king, no longer able to contain himself, uncovered his face, d and, shaking the stick on which he leaned at him, asked him, whether it was thus that he requited the signal favours he had heaped upon him? adding to it the most severe reproaches and dreadful threatnings; insomuch that the vazier, confounded and terrified beyond measure, Who runs ran home with all the speed he could; and having disguised himself in a woman's apparel, away in a wo-

(I) Abdalla was excessively given to wine and women; and when he had once subdued his enemies around, and secured himself from any further attempts from his brother, he gave himself up intirely to drinking and debauchery. He was seldom sober, but most frequently drunk; and when so, indulged himself in the most flagrant acts of injustice, cruelty, and lewdness; insomuch that he scrupled not, among other modest women, whom he forced to submit to his brutish lusts, to debauch his own sister Lela Meriam, though he had above 200 wives and concubines in his seraglio. He was of a brown complexion, middle size, but fat and corpulent towards the latter part of his life, homely and unpolished (9).

(K) According to Marmol, who was there in his time, his dominions reached, north and south, from the Streights of Gibraltar to the frontier of Benay Negroes, on the furthest parts of the kingdom of Sus; and, east and west, from the Atlantic Ocean to the kingdom of Tremecen; which tract included the provinces we mentioned at the beginning of this chapter (10): to which we may add some other cantons which he held in Numidia and Libya, as far south as to Tagaost, which is reckoned eight days journey from the nearest frontiers of Sus, and to Tegurarin and Tequia on the confines of Guiney, countries which are inhabited by several warlike nations (11).

tained fourteen large provinces; among which those of Sus and Dbura furnished him yearly with 15,000 horse, the kingdom of Morocco with 25,000, and that of Fez 15,000, besides 5,000 more which belonged to his life-guard; the whole amounting to 60,000: he also kept a good number of harquebusiers, both of foot and horse, in his garrisons, particularly in the city of Fez, which he made his residence. The Berebers and Arabs were obliged not only to pay him a constant tribute of corn, barley, dates, and other product, but likewise a certain quota of forces, whom he only maintained during the war, and, after that was ended, dismissed them to their respective Adowars. He built several stately palaces at Fez and Morocco, together with some public buildings, particularly a spacious college, consisting of 400 halls, or schools, for teaching the Koran. His successors, who are still possessors of this large empire, have ever since trod in the same track of politics, and maintained the same maxims of arbitrary government, which Mohammed his father, as founder of that monarchy, had settled among them; except, perhaps, that all his successors, that have hitherto reigned, have exceeded him in their oppressions and extortions, cruelty and perfidy.

ABDALLA was succeeded by Muley Mohammed, surnamed the Negro, because he was born of a negro woman; who had no sooner got possession of the crown, than he caused one, some say two, of his brothers to be seized and beheaded, and the third, who was still young, to be closely confined, and kept prisoner. But being himself dethroned by his uncle Muley Moluch, al. Melech, was forced to flee to Sebastian king of Portugal, who sailed into Africa with a powerful fleet and army; but being a prince of more courage than conduct, was defeated and killed at the famous battle of Alcassar: Muley Mohammed was likewise slain in it, or, as others say, was drowned in his cowardly flight in endeavouring to cross a river <sup>w</sup>.

MULEY MOLUCH, or, as others call him, Abdel Melech, who fought against the Portuguese king at the battle, being then very ill of some grievous disease, was brought to the field of battle in his litter; and having tried, in spite of his illness, or rather of nature, to assist at it on horseback, was soon exhausted to such a degree, that he was forced to be brought back to his litter, where he expired almost as soon as he was seated in it <sup>x</sup>. Some say that his illness was caused by a dose of poison which a Granadan Alcayde had given him. However that be, he shewed to the last more concern for the victory than his life, commanding those about him to conceal his death, in order to save his troops; insomuch that his brother Muley Hammed was so thunder-struck, when, coming to the side of the litter to speak with him, he found him quite breathless and cold, that he could not refrain himself from tears and grievous outcries, if they were not rather owing to the sudden joy he conceived <sup>y</sup> at the prospect of raising himself to the throne, as he actually did immediately after the battle; and was acknowledged by all the officers of his army, and soon after by the provinces of the empire. After this he put himself at the head of an army of 60,000 horse, and a great multitude of his tributary Arabians; and taking his eldest son Muley Cheyk, he made his four brothers that were with him, viz. Bal Hascen, Bouffers, Sidan or Zidan, Axin or Haxyn, together with all the Alcaydes and the whole army, take the usual oaths to him; and then proceeded to the conquest of the kingdoms of Gago and Tombut. He had already signalized himself by several victories, and almost reduced those kingdoms, when Muley Nacer, his nephew, and the son of Muley Moluch, returning from Spain, where he had been detained seventeen years, that is, ever since his father's death, being now flushed with the promise of a considerable assistance from Philip II. came over, and, having raised an army of mountaineers, renegadoes, and other disbanded troops, in the neighbourhood of Fez, drew a considerable party over to his side. Against him Muley Hammed sent his son, at the head of a powerful force, who engaged and defeated him. Nacer being dangerously wounded, was put to flight, and left his camp, arms, and baggage behind. After this victory Hammed reigned peaceably and happily, being a great lover and encourager of learning (L), and highly respected by his subjects, and died on the 29th day of August 1603, not without suspicion of having been poisoned by his son Sidan, after a reign of twenty-six years <sup>z</sup>.

(L) This prince is said to have been a good proficient in the mathematics, and especially in astronomy. His wars and conquests in the two great kingdoms above-mentioned made it, in a great measure, necessary; because there is no other way to cross these vast sandy deserts but by the compass, and astronomical observations; for which he always carried with him a handsome apparatus of them. He took no less care to make himself amends for the cost and pains of conquering these two kingdoms; from one of which he brought thirty mules loaded with gold dust, and from the other sixty quintals (or one hundred weight) of the same (12).

a But immediately after this the empire was torn into so many factions, that, in less than six weeks, there were no less than three kings proclaimed, besides Sidan, who, though the youngest of all, had caused himself to be crowned on the very day on which his father died. The other three brothers, equally contending for the throne, were at length overcome, after a great many bloody wars, which he was forced to sustain against them, and more especially against Muley Chayk, his eldest brother, a prince of great valour and conduct, highly esteemed by the subjects and soldiery, and who had, besides, procured a considerable assistance from Spain. So that it was not till after a great deal of bloodshed, and many considerable losses, both by sea and land (M), that he got the better of him, and was enabled to restore the peace of the state. But a gang of pirates, who had settled themselves at Sallee, a famed port in the kingdom of Fez<sup>a</sup>, soon disturbed it afresh, by the frequent outrages and depredations they committed within the inland provinces: to suppress which, he sent a splendid embassy to king Charles I. of England, to desire him to send him some ships, ammunition, &c. who readily complied with his request. Zidan soon afterwards made himself master of Sallee, destroyed all the pirates he could come at, and, in return for the king's timely assistance, sent him 300 Christian slaves as a present. After this he reigned very peaceably all the remaining part of his life, except that he was often pestered by the Alarbs, or Arabs, of the province of Morocco, his inveterate enemies, who had once forced him to abandon his capital to escape their fury. But having at length overcome some of them, and gained others by treaty and presents, he returned to Morocco, and there continued in peace till the year 1630, in which he died<sup>b</sup>.

c He was succeeded by his eldest son Muley Abdelmelech, a prince who soon became odious to all his subjects, on account of his drunkenness, cruelty, and other vices; insomuch that the Fezians invited a younger brother of his, named Hammed, to come and reign over them; but finding him no less tyrannical and cruel, they dethroned and imprisoned him. Abdelmelech was likewise opposed by two others of his brethren: but they were so slow in their preparations, that they gave him time enough to be before-hand with them, and to put them to the rout. He had hardly reigned four years in his debaucheries, before a Christian slave, whom he designed to have castrated, entered his tent, he being then in the field, in the month of December, and finding him asleep, and drowned in wine, shot him dead with a pistol<sup>c</sup> (N).

d He was succeeded by his brother Muley Elwaly, or Elqralid Elgwaly, called, by the Dutch relations and the Provencials, Muley Lowely, whom he had condemned to lose his eyes a little before; but his being assassinated prevented the execution; for, on the contrary, and above all expectation, he was fetched out of prison to ascend the throne. He was a prince of so sweet and affable a temper, that he quickly gained the love of all his subjects. He began his reign with the enlargement of several prisoners of state, and raising the pay of his officers and soldiery. Among the prisoners which he had released was an Andalusian Alcaide, named Mohammed Zarroy, who was ingrateful enough, presently after, to join with prince Semen, a brother of Elwaly, in a rebellion against him; but being defeated and taken, the former was beheaded, and the latter strangled. After which Elwaly reigned peaceably the remainder of his life, and died in the 12th year of his reign. It was from him that monsieur Sanfon, the

(M) Amongst these losses there was one considerable one; namely, that of 3000 Arabic volumes on physic, philosophy, and divinity, which the Spaniards took from him at sea; which he regretted the more as they fell into such hands. This sea-fight happened in the year 1611, the year after his competitor had delivered up the important fortrefs of Arach, or Larach, to the count St. Germain, the Spanish commander, who was sent to his assistance by Philip III. of Spain (13).

(N) Abdelmelech is reckoned the first who took the title of Emperor of Morocco, Fez, Sus, Taphilet, &c. He pretended to a great deal of religion. He ordered an universal mourning for his father, insomuch that the subjects were obliged to have their very shirts dyed blue, which is their colour for it. He was very fond of Christian slaves that turned renegadoes, and put more confidence in them than in his own Moors. But he was no less cruel and inhuman to those who refused to turn Mohammedans, and made it his chief diversion to have them devoured by some fierce lions, which he kept for that purpose, and sometimes would hack them in pieces with his own scymitar.

The French ambassador having made pressing complaints of this to the Porte, and of his being still more inhuman to the French slaves than to those of other nations; and being answered, that the king his master's arms were long enough to do himself justice, Abdelmelech resented it to such a degree, that he swore by Mohammed he would destroy the first ambassador that came to him from the court. By good fortune monsieur Sanfon, herald at arms, who was sent thither in that quality, had notice given him, by a French renegado, of a noble family, who advised him to appear only as a private merchant. He was, however, sent for, and strictly questioned by the king, who had an executioner ready in the next chamber to dispatch him; but he had the address, or rather good fortune, to avert the danger, and got off unhurt (14).

Muley Hammed Cheyk.

HE was succeeded by his brother Muley Hammed Cheyk, the last surviving son of Sidan, a prince so strongly given to women, that he seldom stirred out of his seraglio, or troubled himself with any affairs of state, but let a few rapacious favourites govern the realm; which gave the Alarbs, or Arabs, about Morocco, the irreconcilable enemies of the Sharifs, a fair opportunity of besieging him in that capital, of which they easily made themselves masters; and having murdered him, elected Crumel Hack, one of their princes, to reign in his stead; which he did for some few years, and was succeeded by Sharif Muley, king of Taphilet.

Murdered by the Arabs. Muley Sharif, king of Taphilet.

This last, being soon after at war with Sidi Omar, prince of Illech, had the misfortune to be defeated and taken prisoner. During his tedious, rigorous confinement, he begot two sons <sup>b</sup> on an ugly negro, whom Omar had sent him; the eldest of whom, named Muley Archy, succeeded him in the kingdom of Taphilet; during whose short reign nothing considerable happened, except that, having drank to excess, and riding furiously on an unruly horse, he fractured his skull in a grove of orange trees. Upon his death, Hammed, one of his nephews, then basha of Morocco, caused himself to be proclaimed king, whilst his brother took the same bold step at Taphilet. But Muley Ishmael, the other son of Muley Sharif, and brother of Muley Archy, found means to overcome those two competitors, and, in a short time, to wrench both kingdoms from them, and to raise himself to an higher pitch of power, wealth, and grandeur, than any of his predecessors had ever attained to.

Muley Ishmael's reign. A. D. 1672.

MULEY ISHMAEL, so famed throughout Europe as well as Afric, for his policy and cruelty, <sup>c</sup> and what must seem most strange, if not a downright contradiction, his zeal and strict observance of his religion (O), began his reign in the year 1672: but excepting the two victories which he gained over his nephews, lived more like a private man than a king; and took up his residence at Mequinez, which was then no more than a castle, situate about twelve leagues from Fez, but in one of the most delightful and rich spots in all Barbary, where he at first spent his time in cultivating the adjacent lands; and being no less fond of money than agriculture, applied himself likewise to commerce. The charming situation of Mequinez soon made him resolve to make it not only his chief residence, but the metropolis of his kingdom; and, in order to that, he adorned it with many sumptuous buildings; some of which he would again <sup>d</sup> cause to be pulled down, and rebuilt in some other place; insomuch that it is reported, that if they were all now standing, they would make a contiguous street that would reach quite to Fez.

A great builder.

But his pretence for building and pulling down in that extravagant manner was, he used to say, to keep his subjects employed: For, added he, if I keep a bag full of rats, they'll eat their way through, if I do not keep it in constant motion. And sure it is, that in this, and all other respects, he treated them no better than as so many vermin, whose lives and all were at his arbitrary disposal; insomuch that he made it even a piece of diversion to shoot or behead them, to shew his dexterity: and as for the rest, he loaded them with such taxes and labour, and other oppressions, that their state was much more to be pitied than that of those whom he sent out of the world. So intent was he in heaping up riches, which his fordidness would not permit him to enjoy, that though he was ever levying some new taxes or imposts on the people, yet would he be at no expence in maintaining either his household or his army, but <sup>e</sup> obliged his Moorish soldiery to serve him, without allowing them either pay, cloathing, arms, or victuals.

A. D. 1675. Barbarity to his Moors.

He gave a signal instance of this unnatural barbarity to them not many years after his accession to the throne; when, having ordered them to join his son Muley Sidan, to go and retake the city of Morocco, which Muley Mohammed, another of his sons, had made himself master of, upon their officers applying to him for a stipend to maintain them, he gave them this brutal answer; Do you see, ye MOORISH DOGS, any other of my mules, camels, or

(O) His strictness was such, during his whole reign, that he would never drink any wine or strong liquor. He observed the Ramadan, or Mahomedan lent, four whole months (15) every year, and with a more than ordinary abstinence. He was no less scrupulous an observer of the usual washings, public prayers, and other branches of his law; and never undertook any thing of moment without prostrating himself a good while upon the ground, and praying for the divine direction and assistance, fully satisfied that Mohammed would obtain it from heaven: so that whatever was the result of his devotions, he firmly believed it to be the immediate direction of that prophet.

always shewed himself very ready and easy of access, he was very rigid and impartial, yet would sometimes run into some wild extravagancies; of which the following instance may serve for a taste. A poor farmer of the Berebers race having complained to him, that some of his negroes, whom by the way he was noted for keeping at short allowance, had stolen from him a yoke of oxen, which were his sole dependance, he ordered his whole negro guard to pass before him, and shot every one whom the farmer accused. But asking him afterwards what amends he could make him for the loss of so many stout negroes, and the man being at a loss what to answer, he made him undergo the same fate with the robbers (16).

a other beasts belonging to my empire, ask me for any maintenance? Do they not take it where they can find it, without troubling me about it? Go, march with all speed whither I send you; and do you maintain yourselves as they do. This was, indeed, the most effectual way to set both officers and soldiers a plundering all that came in their way. This, and many other such acts of oppression, the effects of his insatiable avarice, occasioned a general decay of trade, misery and poverty among his subjects, a most shameful corruption among his ministers, and an universal deluge of injustice and oppression throughout every province in his dominions (P).

b HE was no less cruel and tyrannical to his wives and concubines; of which he kept no less than 3000 of the former, and 5000 of the latter rank; and among whom he was looked upon as such a monster of inhumanity, that it was with the greatest dread they approached him; and not without just cause, seeing they often were made the victims of his ill-humour. Some of them he caused to be punished for the least word or action that displeased him, in a most barbarous and shameful manner, by his eunuchs and slaves; others to be strangled, or otherwise dispatched, for the least fault, such as plucking off an orange, or other fruit in his garden. His very children, for some of whom he had an uncommon fondness, were, nevertheless, so much the objects of his jealousy and mistrust, that the least apprehension made the father degenerate into a tyrant; insomuch that those who were his greatest favourites, had the greatest cause to dread him. This was the real picture of Muley Ismael, upon which we have dwelt the longer, as it cannot but be looked upon as the most surprising of all, to find c that a person of his hateful character, and detested tyranny, did yet keep himself on his throne during the long space of fifty-five years, in a country where rebellions, dethronements, and assassinations of princes, were so very frequent, without meeting with any disturbance from his oppressed subjects, or his jealous neighbours, or indeed from any quarter but from his own son Muley Mohammed, the most beloved of all his children, who openly having attempted to wrench the crown from him, fell an unhappy victim of his ambition and his resentment. Barbarity to his wives and children. Long reign.

d THIS prince was born of a beautiful Georgian slave, brought up in the Christian religion, and whose superior charms to all his other wives soon ingrossed his father's affection, as he himself did by the beauty of his person and mind; so that he only had a royal education given him, whilst the rest of his brethren were brought up in the most profound ignorance: but it was this partial fondness that occasioned his ruin. Laila Ajakab, a fat negro woman, since stiled Sultana Sidana, or Sultana Queen, who had a great ascendancy over Muley Ismael, beheld with such inward dread and jealousy the preference which he gave to this favourite above her own eldest son, named Sidan, that she resolved to ruin both the mother and the son as soon as possible. The first she quickly accomplished by a false accusation of infidelity, for which that jealous monarch caused her to be put to death, though he was soon after undeceived, and highly grieved at his credulity and precipitation. But Laila had still a more dangerous victim to sacrifice to her fear; and Mohammed, who was become a greater favourite of the king, on account of his innocent mother's untimely death, as well as for all his other good qualities, made her look upon him as a formidable rival to her son Sidan, a loose, cruel, and profligate prince, and hated by all that knew him. The king could not but be sensible of her hatred to him; and, in order to put it out of her power to raise any fresh cabals against him, ordered him a sum of 15 quintals, or 100 weight of silver, and to go and take upon him the care and superintendency of his old seraglio at Taphilet (Q), where he had not Muley Mohammed, his favourite son, envied by the Sultana. His mother put to death.

(P) As it was a constant custom with this rapacious monarch to make every thing subservient to his avarice, so, whenever any complaint of theft, fraud, or injustice, came before him, his sentence always was, first, that strict restitution should be made to the amount of the wrong, not indeed to the plaintiff, who in that case reaped no other advantage than the pleasure of seeing the offender punished, but to himself, to whom alone he pretended the satisfaction was due. But this did not excuse the offender from an additional fine, such as he pleased to impose upon him. Sometimes, especially if the accused was supposed to be in good circumstances, he would condemn him to some severe punishment, merely to oblige him to buy it off at the dearest rate. And it was with him such a crime for a man to be rich, that the bare name, or suspicion of it, hath cost the life of a great number of his subjects; which was always followed with a confiscation of their all into his own treasury (17).

(Q) Muley Ismael kept there an old seraglio, to which he used to send all his cast-off wives, with all their children, whenever he took it in his head to fresh-colony his new one at Mequinez. The government of it was usually given to some favourite officer, or prince of the blood, together with a sufficient annual revenue, or maintenance, for all that were sent thither. But a complaint having been sent to court, that the present governor abused his trust, and sunk the money into his pockets, and suffered those ladies to want their usual allowance, he sent this favourite son with his quintals of silver to take the care of it upon him. It fell out soon after, that the two brothers, being obliged to assist at a public ceremony, had this dreadful contest about the precedence, in which several of their retinue were killed on both sides, which obliged the king to have them both brought in chains before him (18).

been long, before a very dangerous rupture happened between him and another brother, named Maimon, who was then governor of that city, a very debauched prince, about precedency, which occasioned a bloody rencounter to ensue, and they were both ordered to court in chains, by the express order of their father, from whom, upon their first approach, they received a short but very severe reprimand (R). They were next ordered to plead their cause before him, which they did in such a manner, that Maimon, whom some of the king's brothers did then accuse of sundry heinous crimes, was sent with disgrace to Tezami, a castle about nine miles from Taphilet: but, upon his departure, he told the king, that nothing grieved him so much as that that Christian, meaning Mohammed, should get the better of him. This raised a fresh contest between them, which grew to such a height, that he at first ordered a scymitar to be given to each of them, that they might have an opportunity to shew which was the better man; but, at the earnest intreaty of some of the nobles that were present, he ordered the scymitars to be exchanged for a couple of cudgels, which they plied against each other with such fury, that they were both quickly covered over with their own blood. The king in vain commanded them to leave off; but Mohammed, without regarding it, continued his blows; upon which the king took Maimon's cudgel, and struck him with it; which so enraged him, that he seized Maimon by the collar, threw him upon the ground, and stamped his foot on him; for which his father was going to pierce him with his spear; but recalling himself, he was contented with giving him a slight blow with it, and, upbraiding him with his Christian blood, bid him go and eat swine's flesh with them. It was not long, however, before his tenderness got the better of his resentment; so that, to make him amends for his harsh words, he offered him the government of Taphilet, which he refused for that of Fez, where he was better beloved. He had not long enjoyed the happiness of it, before the king sent him orders to go to that of Taphilet; to excuse himself from which he pretended to be very ill, and forced to keep his bed; upon which the king immediately dispatched the doctor belonging to the Christian religion to him. The young prince tried in vain several ways to avoid being seen by him, and, when forced to it, to prevail upon him to impose upon his father. The old gentleman, on his return, told him honestly, that his son was quite cured before he could find out his distemper. Mohammed was immediately sent for to court, and severely reprimanded for his disobedience and pretended sickness; and yet was easily excused from going to Taphilet, and sent to Montigara, along with his own brother Muley Sharif, whom he dearly loved, and with whom he continued five years in that place with all possible content. But at the end of that time, a sedition being raised in the kingdom of Suz by the governor of Tarudant, Muley Ishmael, who had caused him to be beheaded for it, ordered that favourite son of his to go and take the government of it, as being the most considerable in the whole empire; which he thankfully obeyed, and quickly restored peace to that remote province. But his success and preferment failed not to awaken the jealousy of queen Laila, and to make her look upon him as the person designed for the successor, and who, in that case, would infallibly revenge his mother's death on her and her son; to prevent which, and bring on that dreaded rival's ruin the more effectually, she took the advantage of the king's absence, who was then at the siege of Oran, procured a letter to be counterfeited under his hand and seal, and sent it to Mohammed, wherein he was expressly ordered to put an old venerable Arabian Cheyk, whom the king highly esteemed for his signal services, to immediate death; which he accordingly did, and sent the same courier back to acquaint the king with it. The express arrived at the court of Mequinez soon after the king's return; and much about the same time came the sons of the deceased Cheyk, who were come to make their complaints to him: at which he was so highly provoked, that he ordered his son to repair to him with all speed. He did so; and, upon his arrival, found his father in the greatest fury, and attended with the Cheyk's children all in tears. The first question he asked him was, in an angry tone, Art thou Sharif? To which he, rightly judging at the cause, readily answered, Thou knowest whether I am or not. I have only executed thy commands, and here they are under thy hand and seal, giving him the forged letter. The king had scarce read it before he got on horseback, and made such speed towards the palace, that every body concluded that he was gone to sacrifice the Sultana. But she found means to appease him by

(R) The reader will not, perhaps, be displeased, if we give him a specimen of that monarch's behaviour and strange rhetoric upon that occasion. They no sooner appeared prostrate before him, than, with a scornful smile, he welcomed them in words to this effect: "Good-morrow, Good-morrow. How do you both do? I am heartily glad to see that you are both still alive, and that neither of you hath lost his life in your last bloody engagement. I easily perceive,

"either that you think yourselves to be without a father, "or forget that I am he. You appear, indeed, as "meek as lambs before me, but out of my sight you "are worse than roaring lions. If, while I am still "alive, you have the boldness to take up arms against "each other, what will you do when I am dead? Let "me therefore hear, without any disguise, the occasion "of this quarrel of yours, that I may apply a speedy "remedy to it."

a some specious pretence ; so that he contented himself with distributing some money among the weeping orphans, and sent them and his son back to Tarudant.

It was now impossible for Mohammed not to perceive, as well as resent, at once the Sultana's treacherous designs against him, as well as the great ascendancy which she had over his father ; from which he could but too plainly conclude, that she would leave no stone unturned till she had wrought his total ruin. All these sad prospects were fully in his mind, as he was returning to his government, when he unhappily met with the Alcayd Cader, on his return from Guiney, who guarded an immense quantity of gold belonging to the king, and seized upon it for his own use, and prevailed upon several of the Alcayd's retinue to follow him to Tarudant. As soon as he was arrived at his government, he sent a letter to his father, conceived in such terms as should plainly indicate his revolt ; and another to the Sultana, full of reproaches and bitter reflexions against her and her son Sidan. All which so exasperated the old king, that he was upon the point of setting aside for a while his intended expedition against Algiers, to suppress this new rebellion before it grew to a head. But his ill fortune made him determine otherwise ; and though his army consisted of above 60,000, and that of the Algerines of no more than 12,000, yet those being by far the better soldiers, totally defeated him, killed a vast number of his men, and forced him to a shameful retreat.

By this time Mohammed had so far increased his army, and so many discontented Alcayds went over to him, especially after his father's defeat, that, though he had neither artillery nor other materials for a siege, yet, trusting in the affections of the people, he marched directly to Morocco, and summoned the governor of it, an old experienced officer, to surrender. He found, however, an opposition there, which he did not expect, and which made him have recourse to the following stratagem, which succeeded to his wishes. He ordered his army to march off, as he had abandoned the siege ; and was scarcely gone a league, when, as he expected, the governor sallied in pursuit of him, at the head of 8000 men, whom he so closely surrounded by the disposition of his own forces, that he either killed or made them all prisoners, and, amongst the latter, the governor, several other Alcayds, particularly Kali Bouchafra, a near relation of the Sultana ; all whom he ordered to be conveyed to Tarudant. After which he entered the city with sword in hand, seized on all the treasure he could find, and gave the plunder of the place to his troops. But hearing, quickly after, that his brother Sidan was coming with a great army to besiege him in it, he immediately marched away to Tarudant with all his rich spoil. Here the artful Alcayd Bouchafra, his prisoner, in order to betray him the more easily to his father, had so far insinuated himself into his favour, that he became privy to all his designs, of which he gave immediate intelligence to the court, and would in all likelihood have ruined all his measures, had not some of his letters been intercepted and brought to Mohammed, who caused them to be openly read in his council, and asked them what the treacherous writer of them deserved ? Bouchafra, who was then present at it, to remove the suspicion from himself, was the first who condemned him to death : upon which the Sharif told him, that he had pronounced sentence against himself, and, by a double stroke of policy, ordered Melech, the late governor of Morocco, to cut his head off (S). Mohammed being now become more powerful than ever, resolved to go and engage his brother Sidan, who was making long marches at the head of a powerful army against him. But when they came to engage, Melech, whom Mohammed had intrusted with the command of his negro troops, either in revenge for the late affront, or to regain the emperor's favour, suffered himself to be surrounded by Sidan's forces, which obliged his brother to betake himself to a shameful flight, after the loss of a great number of his own. The king, as soon as he heard the news of Sidan's victory, ordered him to send all the prisoners to him, who, fearing for Melech, to whom he owed it, earnestly interceded for him ; the same did his wives and children, but all in vain : the king told them, that he forgave him, but the Sultana and her relations never would his cutting Bouchafra's head off. The cruel monarch, instigated by his queen and her relations, and some treacherous Talbs, ordered that faithful and brave officer to be publicly sawn in the middle with the utmost cruelty (T) ; and, in excuse

(S) Melech having displayed so singular a fidelity to the king at the siege of Morocco, it is not unlikely that Mohammed suspected him to be privy to the perfidious steps of Bouchafra ; he, therefore, took this method to gain so valuable a prisoner to his own interest, as he knew it would prove an effectual bar to his being ever forgiven by the king, the cutting off the head of so near a relation to his favourite Sultana. But the sequel will soon shew how much he was out in his politics (19).

(T) To add to the pomp of this dreadful execution, the cruel monarch had obliged the relations and friends of the unfortunate Melech to stay at Mequinez, in hopes of his pardoning him ; and, on the other hand, caused all the numerous family of the Loudays, which was that of the Sultana and Bouchafra, to be present at it, to the amount of several thousands. Between these was the prisoner, led by six stout negroes, who held muskets cocked against him, to the mosk called Gemma

Mohammed besieged in Tarudant. for his extreme barbarity and ingratitude, alleged, that Melech, having proved a traitor to his son Mohammed, as well as to him, he had ordered him to be thus lawed into two parts, that each of them might have one half of his body. In the mean time, Mohammed having reached Tarudant with the shattered remains of his army, the victorious Sidan pursued him thither, and laid close siege to it; but was so often repulsed with great loss, that, despairing to get it by force, he retired to Morocco, where he contrived such a lucky stratagem, as soon put an end to the rebellion, and to the life of its chief author.

A. D. 1706. Mohammed seized in an ambuscade, and carried off prisoner. MOHAMMED had been to visit his camp out of the city on a Friday, which is the Mohammedan sabbath, and, on his return, fell into an ambush of negroes, whom the Alcayd Abdeicary, a creature of Sidan's, had set near the gates to intercept him; at which he immediately cried out, that he was Muley Mohammed: to which they answered, We know thou art; and are ordered by the king to seize thee: and immediately surrounded him on all sides. He made several efforts to break through them, in order to gain the city gate; but finding it shut against him, he fought so desperately among them, that he laid a good number of them wounded at his feet; whilst they, afraid of shedding a Sharif's blood, dared not lift their weapons against him. At length, one of them advised the rest to cut off the legs of his horse; upon which they easily seized on his person, and carried him prisoner to Morocco, whence Sidan caused him to be conveyed to Mequinez, under an escort of 500 horse.

The king meets him with a most dreadful train. THE king, upon the first notice of his coming; whether to avoid the solicitations of his court in favour of his son, or for any other view, set out of Mequinez, attended by 2000 horse and 1000 foot, and waited for him at Beth, the place where he designed to punish him for his revolt, and, to add to the horror of the cavalcade, was preceded by forty Christian slaves, who carried a monstrous copper, with 100 weight of pitch, and the same quantity of oil and tallow, and were followed by six butchers with large knives in their hands, and a cart loaded with wood; which dreadful apparatus filled the city of Mequinez, who had so lately beheld the execution of the unfortunate Melech, with the utmost horror and confusion; but more especially Mohammed's daughter, who, attended with a number of ladies, and others of his friends, came to implore the king's clemency in his behalf. The very Sultana, his bitterest enemy, could so far disguise her hatred as to become one of his intercessors. All these the king received with an affected coldness, and, by way of comfort, told them, that he designed him no other punishment than pouring a little boiling oil upon him. He was a whole day and night without seeing his son, who was arrived at Beth the day before him; but, upon his appearing prostrate before him the day after, the king clapped the point of his spear to his breast; upon which, and seeing the butchers, and the rest of the dreadful apparatus, he cried aloud to him, For God and his prophet's sake, forgive me, I beseech thee. But he, without minding his cries, ordered one of the butchers to hoist him on the cart, and cut off his wrist on the rim of the copper. At which the fellow in a fright protested, that he would lose his life sooner than shed his son's blood: the consequence of which was, that the king cut off his head with his own hand, and ordered another of them to go up and perform the operation, who immediately obeyed. Whilst this was doing, the king called the children of Bouchafra, and bid them look at the hand and foot of that traitor, and, as soon as the execution was performed, asked them, whether they were satisfied? To which they answered, with great submission, in the affirmative. He then cast his eye on his bleeding son, and, in a surly tone, asked him, whether he knew his father now? Then, drawing his sword again, lopped off the executioner's head at one blow. At which his son could not forbear crying

Causes his hand and foot to be cut off;

Kadra, where they made him sit upon a stone, and wait his doom. Here perceiving several of the Talbs, or priests, very pressing for his death, he cried out, Why may I not be brought to the king, and acquaint him with your treason? For the cutting off Bouchafra's head was forced upon me; but you were the treacherous dogs that sent his letters back to Mohammed, which were designed for the king. For they were the persons who, by intercepting Bouchafra's letters, had caused him to be put to death; and it was their fear of his discovery, that made them so urgent with the king to have him haled to execution. This was the reason why he was hurried away to the fatal place with such cruel speed, mounted on a mule, with his hands and body chained, amidst the dreadful cries of his friends, and the shouts of his enemies the Loudays, whilst he alone appeared calm and unconcerned, and rode with a pipe in his mouth. Being arrived at the market-place, he was taken down and stripped; and the Talbs took care to have all the papers that were found about him burnt, for fear of a discovery. Immediately after this, the sawyers laid him flat upon a plank, fastened his hands and feet to it, and were going to begin their work at his scull; but Bouchafra's children, to whom the king had given leave to order the manner of his execution, to make his torments last the longer, commanded them to begin at the other end, which forced the most dreadful outcries from him. When they had proceeded as far as his navel, they were ordered to draw their saw, and begin now at his head, which they did; and, when they had gone through their work, they divided his body into two parts; after which they went to the king with their saw wrapped up in a cloth, who, seeming highly satisfied with what they had done, ordered two ducats to be given to the two journeymen, and four to their master. This was the dreadful reward with which that inhuman monarch recompensed the fidelity of that brave old minister, and may serve to give a lively idea of that detestable court and government (18).

- a out to the spectators, Behold my father's valour, who equally puts to death those who obey his commands, and those that do not. The king only staid to see his arm and leg dipped in the melted pitch to staunch the blood, after which he mounted his horse, and returned to Mequinez; not without leaving express orders with four of his alcaydes, to bring his son alive thither, under pain of death. and to be brought to Mequinez;

- b It is impossible to express the doleful cries, and bitter weeping, with which the news of this execution filled the whole palace, especially the women's apartment; insomuch that the king could find no other means to suppress them, than by threatening immediate death to all who should be heard to weep; and, to shew them that he was in earnest, ordered four of them to be strangled, who had not been able to conceal their grief. Mohammed's daughter was the only one to whom he indulged that liberty, and whom, for that reason he carefully avoided; whilst one of her brothers, being denied that poor relief, threw himself down a high terrass, and died of the fall.

- c TOWARDS the close of the evening Mohammed entered Mequinez, mounted on a mule, with his arm in a scarf, and his leg in a wooden box; and, being arrived at the house appointed for him, received the visits of his friends on the next morning, with a seeming cheerfulness, and was constantly attended by the Christian surgeons; though others affirm, that he would not suffer any to come near him, and that he tore off the plaisters, which his servants put on to staunch the blood<sup>d</sup>: however that be, thirteen days after the amputation, a gangrene having seized upon his wounds, carried him off; and, according to his desire, he was buried without any other ceremony than was used to the poorest Negro (T). where he died of a gangrene.

- d SIDAN was no sooner rid of his rival brother, than he was sent back with his army to reduce the remainder of the revolvers, who were still in arms at Tarudant; and besieged that capital so closely, that, for want of a fresh supply of victuals, above 10,000 of the besieged died of downright famine; and were at length obliged to surrender themselves at discretion. A bloody massacre of them soon ensued, which set the streets of the city streaming with human gore; whilst those, who had the greatest cause to fear his fury, defended themselves to the last breath, to avoid the exquisite tortures which he committed on those who had the misfortune to fall alive into his hands. He had no sooner glutted his cruelty by the most horrid butcheries, and excruciating torments, which he inflicted upon those unfortunates, than he set himself upon satiating his most rapacious avarice, by making a strict search for those great treasures which his brother had laid up there, as well as those of the great alcayde and principal officers, who were come over to him; and which altogether amounted to an immense value, besides the plunder of the city, and of all the adjacent countries. All which dreadful cruelties and depredations injected such an universal terror all over that province, that Moors, Arabs, Berebers, and other inhabitants, fled to the most inaccessible deserts, mountains, and caverns, to avoid him; insomuch that the city of Santa Cruz, tho' at a great distance from it, and very strongly fortified, was abandoned both by the governor and garrison, and none of the inhabitants left in it, but a poor old Moore, and a Jew blind with old age. The very trading vessels, that rode at anchor there, had likewise taken the alarm, and fled, till a proclamation, issued some time after, gave them fresh assurances, that they might safely resume their commerce as formerly, on condition that they paid the usual duties. Sidan commits the cruellest butcheries at Tarudant.

- e IN the mean time his great success, numerous forces, and immense treasure, soon alarmed the old king's jealousy, and made him repent that he had ever intrusted him with so much power. He tried, in vain, all the fair means and stratagems to draw him from Tarudant to Mequinez, or to oblige him to send him some of his forces for the siege of Ceuta. Sidan was never at a loss for some plausible excuse for his non-compliance, which forced him at length to have recourse to artifice. The king grows jealous of his son, who refuses to come to him.

- f HE began with confining himself to his apartment, without being seen by any but the sultana, mother of Sidan; a few days after which a rumour was spread abroad, that he was taken ill of the strangury, of which she sent notice to her son, advising him, as a mother, to draw nearer to Mequinez, with as little noise as he could, as the most effectual means of securing his succession; to which he sent word, that he knew his father too well to trust himself so near him. The king, continuing still invisible, a diversity of opinions was spread abroad, which put the kingdom into confusion, and obliged her to send a second express to acquaint Sundry stratagems tried in vain to bring him to Mequinez.

(T) This he did by way of reproach to his father, by whom, he said, having been treated more like a vile profligate than a prince, he desired his funeral might be agreeable to his treatment when living.

The king, however, caused a stately Mausoleum to be erected over his grave, supported by four marble pillars, and covered with a wooden cupola, painted over with green.

He likewise ordered his favourite brother Muley Sharif, then in his government of Montigara, to bring all the deceased's children to court; on whom he heaped many signal tokens of real tenderness and affection (19).

him, that he must come to her immediately, if he designed to pay his dying father the last filial office ; to this he answered, that, let his father live or die, he would not quit his army. After she had used a great variety of stratagems, which rendered him still more inflexible, and increased the general ferment, she sallied out of the palace in her chariot, attended by her women, eunuchs, and a numerous retinue, one of whom carried the sword before her ; and behaved in such a despotic manner, that the people, who concluded from it the king was dead, and that she designed to seize on the throne, and reign lady paramount, rose up in arms, and forced her to retire, and pursued her to the palace gates. The king had not been out of his apartment during the space of 52 days, when this last uproar happened ; but, as soon as he was informed of it, he immediately shewed himself, to the great surprize of the whole city, which was by that means restored to its usual tranquility. His foes, as well as his friends, made public rejoicings at the news of his pretended recovery ; and even the Christian slaves expressed their joy, by one of the finest and most curious fire-works that had ever been seen in his dominions ; which made him say, that the Christians had a greater affection for him than his own Moors.

NONE of his stratagems having been able to draw his son out of Tarudant, his jealous fears of him rose at length to so great a height, that he resolved to get rid of him at any rate ; and finding that he was grown detested for his continual excesses in drinking, and the horrid murders, rapes, and other unnatural crimes, which he committed in them, not only on his subjects, without distinction of quality, age, or sex, but likewise on his own wives, who lived in constant dread and abhorrence of him, easily prevailed upon these to become his executioners. Accordingly, taking the first opportunity they found him drowned in wine, which he used to be sometimes twice or thrice in a day, they, without difficulty or opposition, smothered him in his bed, and rid the empire of one of the most dangerous tyrants, and monsters of lust, drunkenness, cruelty, and impiety* (U).

MULEY ISHMAEL had not long enjoyed the delightful prospect of a more peaceable reign, by the death of one rebellious son, before it was troubled again by the revolt of another. This last was called Muley Abdelmelech, and had been long ago preferred to the government of Suz, where he had, for some time, assumed the title and state of a king ; but now broke out in an open refusal of the usual tribute and allegiance. The king had immediately recourse to his usual artifices, in order to allure him to court, being now too old and infirm to engage in a civil war with him ; but, to his great grief, found this new rebel as diffident and inflexible as the last ; only with this difference, that he still continued making the most solemn protestations of his filial affection, of his fervent prayers for his life ; and that he never had entertained the least thought of taking up arms against him, as had been falsely represented to him. The king, doubtless, was too sharp sighted and mistrustful to be satisfied with such specious excuses, but yet chose to appear so, rather than come to extremities with him ; but yet took care to give this mortifying proof of his resentment, that he changed the order of succession in favour of his brother Muley Hammed, though two years younger than he. Some people, however, have suspected him to have shewn him this preference, not so much out of dislike to his elder brother, as with a view of obliterating the memory of his own tyrannic and inhuman vices, by appointing for his successor a prince of the most dissolute, vicious, and debauched character. However that be, Muley Ishmael died soon after of extreme old age, which had deprived him of his usual exercise of riding on horseback (V), and was succeeded by Muley Hammed surnamed Deby, or

(U) Our readers will perhaps wonder to find this jealous and exasperated father, after having caused his rebellious son to be so unnaturally dispatched, should so soon after relent so far, as to cause the authoresses of his death to be sacrificed to the furious resentment of the sultana ; and to order the most magnificent obsequies that had been ever seen in his dominions, to be performed to his remains. But it must be remembered, that all this was done in order to pacify his exasperated mother ; who not only had the greatest ascendance over him, but from whose vindictive temper he had every thing to fear, as he was now in his decline : So that, not daring to refuse her any thing, he was forced to deliver up into her hands not only seven of Sidan's wives, who had had a hand in his death, but even the wine-merchants, and others, who had furnished him with those liquors, with which he was wont to intoxicate himself ; all whom she sacrificed to her resentment. She shewed a more uncommon inhumanity against three of the former, whose breasts she ordered to be cut off, and, having forced them to eat them, caused them to be strangled.

He was no less obliging to her in the interment of her son, whose body he caused to be embalmed, and brought from Tarudant to Mequinez, under an escort of 6000 horse (who, by the way, being denied a passage thro' the mountains of Tedela, were obliged to obtain it at the price of 2000 piasters), and to be buried with great pomp in the common sepulchre of the Sharifs. What is still more extraordinary, he caused a stately mosk to be erected over his grave, which was to be ever after a sanctuary for malefactors (20). Here a vile debauched prince, guilty of all manner of vices, cut off in open rebellion against his father, and in a most beastly excess of wine, a liquor forbid by the Mohammedan law, is raised to the dignity of, and prayed to as, a saint after his death, who, in his life-time, was justly detested by all mankind ; and all this to calm and appease an imperious wife, or perhaps to avoid her suspecting the part he bore in his death.

To <sup>fail into all</sup> avoid, however, the odium of such an unnatural conduct, which began to shew itself every- <sup>kings of de-</sup> where, he caused a declaration to be published, by which he promised to exact of his subjects <sup>bauchery;</sup> no other tax than the tenth, allowed by the Mohammedan law, and confirmed all the ministers of the last reign in their respective offices. By this step having, as he imagined, secured him- self from any rebellious attempts, and seeing himself possessed of such an immense treasury, he immediately plunged into all kinds and excesses of debauchery; insomuch that the people be- <sup>into a ferment.</sup> gan to curse his father for pitching upon the very worst of his sons for his successor. This discontent shewed itself still more in the kingdom, and more particularly in the city of Fez; and the people where his deputies having been sent to exact the usual oaths of allegiance, the inhabitants an- <sup>into a ferment.</sup> swered, that the news of the late king's death had afflicted them to such a degree, that it would <sup>into a ferment.</sup> require, at least, some days before they could be in a capacity to deliberate upon so important a matter. This excuse, which was only a pretence in order to gain time, joined to the general ferment, drove him upon a new expedient, which rendered him still more odious to his Moorish subjects; for, growing diffident of them, he began to secure to himself the affections of the Negroes, not only by large donatives, but by intrusting them with the management of his most important affairs; so that an open revolt broke out immediately after in the city Fez <sup>revolts.</sup> of Fez, where they massacred his governor, with about 80 of his head officers, and drove all his Negro soldiers away, in revenge of the great exactions and cruelties they had suffered from him.

e THIS was soon followed by another at Tetuan, where the governor, being forced by the in- <sup>A rebellion at</sup> habitants to abandon the place, caused the magazine of powder to be set on fire, by which <sup>Tetuan.</sup> above 60 houses were reduced to heaps of rubbish, and the rest greatly shattered and en- dangered. In revenge of which the Tetuaners sapped the foundations of the Basha's palace, one of the noblest structures in Barbary, and reduced both it and its magnificent gardens <sup>into</sup> into heaps of ruin and rubbish.

ALL this while the Tetuaners did not pretend to take up arms against the emperor, but against his tyrannic Basha (W); and sent a deputation to court against him, where he was summoned to appear, and articles of reconciliation were drawn up; but he, refusing to sign them, steamed such a stench out of his body, that he was abandoned by all his servants, not one being able to approach him, tho' there was a continual fumigation made of the most aromatic gums, and other perfumes; so that he had not so much as an eunuch or a slave to assist him in his last moments, or to see him breathe his last. The disease of which he died was an inflammation in his bowels, which, turning into a mortification, created that intolerable stench. He had, however, been so far from following the Mohammedan doctrine of predestination, which makes most of its professors despise the help of physic and surgery, that he had been consulting all along the most skilful persons in both about his disease, against which he used to receive great ease from riding and exercise; but quickly sunk under it as soon as that help began to fail him (21).

(W) We must observe here, that the Tetuaners generally take their measures from the Fezians, by reason of their mutual intercourse; but the adjacent mountaineers were the first who took up arms against the rapacious Basha, under the command of the famed Bollifa, an old experienced officer, of an antient family in Andalusia, who held a private intelligence with Tetuan. He began with a powerful descent on the Reefers, who were all kindred, tenants, or friends, of the Basha; who, to revenge the bold attempt, first asked the Tetuaners assistance against those rebels, but was refused, on pretence that it might give them a handle to come and plunder the city during them, took the direct road to Tangier, and they that to Fez. The Fezians, being informed a by these of the success of their stratagem, resolved to follow their example, in hopes to gain time, being otherwise fully resolved to declare for prince Abdelmelech, as soon as they were in a condition to do it. This prince was the king's uterine brother, and by much his most powerful competitor, not only as he was at the head of a potent army, and had the hearts of all the people ; but much more so, as he had just before routed the royal forces commanded by Hali, another brother, whom the king had sent against him ; and who, upon his defeat, was disgraced and confined to his own house. Abdelmelech was, however, guilty upon this juncture of an indiscretion, which was likely to have been fatal to him, not only in the cruel treatment which he shewed towards his Negro prisoners, but in his solemn declaration, that he would not suffer any of them to come near his person, when he was once got master of the throne ; for that not only made them all declare for the king, but likewise resolve to join with any other competitor against him. b

THEY were not long before they made him feel some effects of their resentment. He had, soon after his victory over Hali, made himself master of the city of Morocco, and by that means fixed the affections of the Fezians more firmly in his interest ; when these exasperated Negroes put themselves under the command of Tariffa, an old experienced officer, who immediately put the fatal stratagem in execution against him, which failed not to disconcert all his measures and hopeful prospects ; and, under the appearance of coming to besiege him in that capital, drew him and his army into an ambuscade, from which he did not extricate himself till after the loss of a great part of his forces, and receiving three slight wounds. What was still worse, c a report being studiously spread that he was killed in the action, the Fezians, losing all further hopes of him, made their peace with the king by means of a magnificent present, and a numerous ambassy ; all which was the more readily accepted by that monarch, as he well knew, that his rival brother was still alive, tho' forced to retire out of Morocco into some of the neighbouring deserts. The Tetuaners were no less alarmed and disheartened at the pretended news of his death. We have already seen what a bold stand they made in his favour, tho' under pretence of acting against their rapacious Basha ; to pacify whom the king had sent a new one, named Abdelmelech Busfra, who entered the town about the latter end of July, and was received with great joy by them (X). They soon after altered their note and behaviour, when, Basha-like, he condemned Paiz, their governor, to be seized and hanged, for d obstructing his first orders about repairing the fortifications of the place, but which they all refused to obey ; so that he, from that time, contented himself to go their pace, for which they allowed him an honourable maintenance <sup>h</sup>. In the mean while it is supposed, that the old Basha Hammed had obtained a secret permission from the king, to take a proper opportunity for surprising the city, and seizing upon his old government ; who appeared accordingly at the head of his Reefeers, and attacked the place on that side at which they least expected them ; upon the surprize of which, the citizens all quitted the breast-work, without giving one fire, and made towards the town, which gave an opportunity to the enemy to enter it on all sides. Basha Busfra was one of the first who rode off with his brother and servants. But whilst the Reefeers were busied in plundering the town, the townsmen, now recovered from e their fright, got up to the tops of the houses ; and, with a little danger to themselves, killed them as fast as they were making off with their spoil, and pursued the rest out of the walls.

THEY had no better success against the castle, which the Basha ordered them to attack ; at which he was so enraged, that he caused all the plunder that was brought out of the city to be burned ; which occasioned such a general disorder among them, that instead of making use of the only means left of mastering the town, which was the 16 pieces of cannon left upon the breast-work, which they might have turned against it, there being powder and ball left near it, they ran away without so much as nailing them up. Night coming on, the townsmen their absence : upon which he sent for the troops, which were employed in the blockade of Ceuta, and marched against the mountaineers.

But, before he took the field, he left his brother governor in Tetuan, with a guard of about 500 Negroes to keep the town in awe. But the Tetuaners, instead of paying any regard to him, ordered all the Reefeers to depart the city by such a time, on pain of being treated as enemies. The new governor sent immediately to have the crier apprehended ; a bloody fray immediately ensued, in which, his men being repulsed with loss, he caused the place in which his powder was kept to be set on fire, to prevent the townsmen getting possession of it ; the explosion of which shattered the whole town in so terrible a manner, that the governor, to avoid their resentment, was forced to shelter himself and family in a sanctuary belonging to it (22).

(X) The Tetuaners, after the retreat of their old governor, had chosen one from among themselves, named Paiz, a blacksmith, but a bold intrepid fellow, and a great enemy to the Basha. Some add, that they had likewise appointed Bollifa, mentioned in the last note, to be their Basha. But we are assured, that this last never acted in that quality, though the former, as we shall soon see, shewed himself very active in his. However, it plainly appears, that the townsmen had formed themselves into a small republic, the form and government of which they changed, as often as their fears and jealousies created new distrusts of one another ; but were still waiting for news of Abdelmelech (23).

a men took courage again, and drew them into the town, and barricaded every avenue with them, which frustrated all farther attempts of the Bascha, and obliged him to retire with shame and disgrace, he never once appearing at the head of his dastardly troops during the whole time, but beheld their several repulses and defeats from a neighbouring eminence<sup>1</sup>.

WHILST the Tetuaners were congratulating themselves upon their deliverance, fresh news came from court, which at once damped all their joys, viz. that the king had reinstated Bascha Hammed in his government of Tetuan, and all its other dependencies (Y). A council was immediately called, in which it was unanimously resolved, at all adventures, to obstruct his return; and, in case of the worst, to put their city under the protection of the Spaniards, rather than comply with the king's orders. However, as they were still in the dark about prince Abdelmelech, of whom they had heard nothing for several months, to avoid farther danger, they agreed, that Mr. Russel should accompany their governor Busfra, and ten of their deputies, to court, in order to obtain there, by their rich presents, a revocation of the order made in favour of Bascha Hammed. They set out accordingly; and, at their arrival at Fez, found it closely besieged by the king's forces, where the inhabitants of the old city had murdered several Ludyres (so they call the king's guards), who were the king's relations, and had been sent thither to keep the townsmen in awe; and heard, moreover, that both city and country were in a kind of war, and Moors, as well as Arabs, divided between the two contending brothers. During their stay there, they saw Muley Amstedy, the king's brother and chief favourite, and the grand Mufti of Mequinez, arrive, with new proposals for a reconciliation, which were, however, rejected; and, upon their dismissal, the flag of defiance was again hoisted up, and hostilities renewed. The besiegers plied their batteries against the town with fresh briskness, but with little success, thro' the badness of their artillery, whilst the besieged made frequent sallies upon them with no better fortune, they being still repulsed by the enemy's cavalry. Tired at length with the siege, the Fezians sent deputies to court to treat of peace on such terms as the emperor should please to grant; who, highly pleased with the proposal, sent his son thither again, with some old experienced ministers, who soon terminated that affair to the satisfaction of both sides, and was soon after invested with the title of governor of the place.

WHILST these things were transacting, one of the sultanas and her sister were found guilty of holding a correspondence with Abdelmelech (who still kept himself at a distance at the head of some faithful troops), and were both condemned by the king, the former to be strangled, and the other to be imprisoned for life*. At length Abdelmelech ventured to send some offers of peace to his brother, promising to lay down his arms, on condition that he resigned to him one half of the empire, treasure, horses, arsenals, and magazines, which his father had left behind him at his death. His proposals were rejected by the whole court, though the emperor himself would have gladly accepted of them, that he might the more quietly pursue his drunken and other debauches, in which he had already so far drowned himself, that every day of his life was witness of some of the most flagrant instances of tyranny and cruelty, of lewdness and drunkenness (Z).

THIS excess grew to such a height at length, that neither deputies, alcaides, nor even ambassadors, could get access to him, because he never was in a condition to be seen, which gave birth to the most enormous disorders in his capital. He was even so rash, as to go one morning to the mosk attended by his court, so very drunk, that he fell down flat on the ground, and vomited up a large quantity of wine. His eunuchs quickly carried him out of the mosk to his palace, where some of his wives, and other sultanas of authority, took the liberty to represent to him the sad disasters which his debauches caused, both in his seraglio

(Y) One effectual method, which the politic Bascha made use of, besides a great profusion of presents, to get himself restored to his government, was his insinuating to the king, or rather his prime minister Empsaël, that Bascha Busfra, and the Tetuaners, kept Mr. Russel, the British ambassador, and all the great presents which he brought from his court, from hastening to Mequinez, until they saw what success would attend Abdelmelech's revolt. And it was indeed that single consideration that had detained Mr. Russel so long at Tetuan. This was therefore thought the most likely means to make him hasten his departure to court, as it actually did.

(Z) To give our reader a taste of some of his barbarities, he caused one of his Negroes to be flung from the top of a terrace, for stopping his pipe too hard; and another to be tossed in a blanket till his limbs were dislocated, for not bringing his dogs to him so soon as he expected. Neither did his wives and concubines fare better;

one of whom, on some trifling displeasure, he condemned to have all her teeth drawn out; a few days after which, having forgot his barbarous order, he commanded her to come to him again; and, being told the misery she was in, ordered the tooth-drawer to be served in the same manner, and sent his teeth to her in a box, to comfort her for the loss of her own. He caused two Jewish young women, newly married, to be brought to him, and, having deflowered them, sent them away to their husbands; a few days after which finding that they had been registred as his concubines, and that they cohabited with their husbands, he caused both couples to be murdered. His misfortune was, that, being always affable, loving, and even generous, in his drunken fits, but brutish and cruel when sober, those who were obliged to approach him, had no other way to escape his fury, than by making him drunk as soon as possible, and keeping him so as long as they could (24).

and in the whole empire; he only rewarded their zeal with a severe beating. This treatment so exasperated them, that they made no difficulty to apply to the Mufri, Cadi, and some of the most considerable ministers, and upbraid them with their pusillanimity, and servile ob-servance of a prince so unfit and unworthy to reign. New complaints soon came from other parts of the empire; even the Negroes, who had so much reason to be dissatisfied with his brother Abdelmelech, joined with the Moors and Arabs in a resolution to assist him to dethrone his unworthy brother.

At length, a general assembly of the most considerable alcaides having been convened at Mequinez on the 22d of March, Abdelmelech was declared emperor, and letters were dispatched to hasten him to come and take the reins of government upon him. In the interim they sent circular orders to all the provinces, to send deputies to establish some form of government, till the new king's arrival. But as this could not be done without exasperating all the partisans of the now deposed Muley Debaby, they did not content themselves with a bare protest against the act of that grand assembly, but strove to disannul it by force of arms; and many bloody skirmishes were fought both in Mequinez and other cities, which obliged that grand council to cause Abdelmelech to be proclaimed emperor, and his son to be nominated his vicegerent till he appeared in person.

This expedient effectually quelled all further tumults; and the young regent immediately ordered forty quintals of flat money to be distributed among the principals of the people, and especially among the Negroes; not long after his father arrived, and made his public entrance, amidst the greatest acclamations of joy, on the 10th of April following. This revolution was, in a great measure, owing to the prime minister of the unfortunate Muley Debaby, whose extensive power and influence had determined the great assembly to that resolution; and who, in consequence of it, expected no less than to become the new emperor's sole favourite. But finding himself disappointed from the beginning, had now laid a new plot to reinthronise his old master. Whether this accusation was true, or only raised as a handle for disgracing that treacherous minister, it is not certain; but Abdelmelech made it a pretence for ordering his deposed brother to be deprived of his eyes. This was, however, strenuously opposed by the Talbs, who plainly told him, that that unfortunate prince having no other crime but that of drunkenness, they thought the stripping him of his crown was punishment sufficient, without depriving him of his sight; upon which he contented himself with sending him close prisoner to his old palace of Taphilet.

ABDELMELECH thinking now he had nothing to fear from that quarter, began to shew his natural temper more than he had ever dared to do, in treating his ministers with haughtiness, his Moors with scorn and hard usage, his Negroes with hatred and cruelty, his people with tyranny and oppression, and his christian slaves with uncommon barbarity. For though he was a sober prince, with regard to drinking, wholly abstained from wine, and a strict observer of the Mohammedan law, yet he had a great share of fierceness and cruelty in his looks and temper. He even caused some fathers of the redemption, who had brought large sums, and some rich presents, and were come to treat about the release of christian slaves, to be seized and brought before him, whom having stripp'd of all their effects, he ordered to depart out of his dominions in three days, on pain of being burned alive for having entered them without his permission (A). He had been scarcely three months on the throne, before his cruel usage of the negroes exasperated their whole body against him. They soon formed themselves into an army of above 40,000, some say 80,000 men, horse and foot; out of which they detached a corps of 10,000 to his brother, then at Taphilet, to beg pardon for what they had done against him, and to invite him to resume the imperial dignity. Muley Debaby, who had by that time raised a small army of about 15,000 Moors, put himself at their head, and was soon after joined by the rest of the Negroes. Abdelmelech, greatly surprised to see such a vast army so quickly raised, and making such long marches towards his capital, made what hasty preparations he could for its defence; but being quickly besieged in it, was forced to retire with his garrison into the Alcassare, or royal castle. The city was immediately entered, sword in hand, by the enemy, who had it betrayed to them by the

(A) In order to understand the motive of this arbitrary and unjust proceeding, the reader must know, that the emperor Muley Debaby had, a little before his being dethroned, formed a generous project for releasing a great number of his christian slaves for a certain sum per head; and had actually sent two of every nation upon their parole into their respective countries to transact and forward it. The two Frenchmen accordingly arriving at Fontainbleau, where the court then was, met with such a ready compliance to their request, that they embarked soon after with the missionaries above-mentioned, but had the misfortune to be detained by contrary winds; and, upon their arrival at Sallee, were surprised to find that their good friend Muley Debaby had been deposed, and his brother Abdelmelech raised to the throne. Being, however, unwilling to lose their labour in so charitable a design, they resolved to try their fortunes with the new emperor; who being informed of their arrival and business, before they could make their way to the throne in the usual form, caused them to be seized and brought to court. We have already seen how he treated the old fathers; as for the two young Frenchmen, he ordered them to be immediately loaded with their usual shackles, and to be conveyed to their old mettemor, or prison (25).

- a treachery of about 4000 of his troops. The reader will easily imagine, from the fierceness Mequinez and resentment of these Negroes, what horrid massacre they committed in that capital. As <sup>cruelly plundered.</sup> for Hammed Debaby, his chief employment was to cause as many as fell into his hands, of his brother's partizans, to be nailed alive to the gates of the city, and to expire in the most excruciating torments; and, after he had glutted his resentment, he gave the city to be plundered by his negroes and Moors, which was executed with no less cruelty during the space of three days. Abdelmelech, who, through the treachery of his troops, had been forced to abandon that city to his fury, soon reached that of Fez, but was closely besieged in it by his victorious brother, who, flushed with his late success, and made sensible by his past misfortunes of the danger of his former conduct, had closely pursued him thither, at the head of a formidable army, before he, or the citizens, could have time to make the necessary preparations for a siege. He began with making some general assaults; but being as stoutly repulsed by the garrison, saw himself obliged to besiege it more closely on all sides, to prevent any provision being carried into it. This succeeded much better, insomuch that, in three months, famine obliged them to capitulate; and the emperor insisting on no other terms than their submission, and the delivery of Abdelmelech to him, they readily complied, and brought <sup>Delivered up to his brother.</sup> his brother bound before him. Upon his appearing, every one present, considering the fierceness of the king's temper, expected he would have instantly sacrificed him to his resentment; especially as he was found to have a pistol and dagger concealed under his garment, which carried a very treacherous appearance; but, to their great surprise, he had no sooner told him, that they were no other than he usually carried about him, than he delivered him up to a Basha, to be conducted to Mequinez under a strong guard, and to be kept closely confined in his house, without any further tokens of resentment. Which singular and unexpected mildness made so great an impression upon his people's minds, that all his former debaucheries and cruelties seemed to be quite obliterated by that generous act. Happy had it been for Muley Debaby, if he could as easily have overcome his passion for wine; for this it was that ruined his constitution, and brought upon him such an obstinate dropsy, as all the efforts of his physicians could not overcome. So that having tried in vain a multiplicity of medicines, and finding his end approaching still nearer, he sent orders to have his brother strangled, which was accordingly done; two days, some say five days, after which, he was carried off by his stubborn distemper, on the 29th of March<sup>a</sup>, 1729, or, according to others, 1731<sup>b</sup>, but without foundation. <sup>Strangled. The emperor dies in the same week of a dropsy, 1729.</sup>
- THE throne was no sooner vacant than a number of competitors appeared in arms, among whom was Muley Bouffar, the eldest son of Muley Debaby, who seemed to have much the best pretensions. Notwithstanding which, one of the late Muley Ishmael's wives found means, by the great sway she bore with the grandees, and the vast sums she distributed among the blacks, to turn the election in favour of her son Abdalla, who, till then, had appeared to be a prince of a mild temper, which seldom fails of gaining the people's affections. He was no sooner proclaimed emperor, than Muley Bouffar retired into the kingdom of Suz, fully resolved to dispute the crown with him. On the other hand, Abdalla lost no time to march against him, at the head of a numerous army, and had the good fortune to defeat and take him prisoner, together with a Santoon, who was at the head of his council. Abdalla spared his nephew's life; and, as some add, gave him his liberty; but beheaded his counsellor with his own hand, with this reproof; Let us see now whether thy sanctity can save thee from my hands. After this important victory he went and laid close siege to the city of Fez, which had refused to acknowledge him. It proved an obstinate and bloody one, and lasted full six months; at which he was so exasperated, that he made a full resolution totally to destroy it; and would surely have done so, if some of his better counsellors had not represented to him, that that city had a celebrated Santoon for its founder, who was so revered and prayed to by the whole country, that he could not do it so signal an injury without incurring the hatred and abhorrence of the people, the resentment of the saint, and the curse of the almighty. Soon after this the inhabitants of Suz and Tedla came to pay their homage to him, and with some difficulty escaped his resentment for having been so tardy in it. For he had now no measures to keep any longer with his subjects, and so began by degrees to discover that tyrannic and cruel disposition, which was so natural to him, and which he had hitherto concealed under the disguise of mildness, that it might prove no obstacle to his mounting the throne. But as he was now, in all appearance, so well fixed on it, he made no longer scruple to let them know what they must expect of him, in case their want of fidelity or obedience should render them obnoxious to his displeasure. The first remarkable instance he gave of what he and his partisans styled justice, was one of the highest pieces of inhumanity on a considerable alcaide, who being accused of having refused to pay his yearly quota of tribute, the more effectually to deter others from following his example, he caused him to be brought before him; and, in presence of his whole court, he condemned him to a punishment of his own devising, and such a one as hath been unpractised, and unheard, if not unthought of, in any part of Barbary, or, indeed, in any nation, antient or modern, if we except the old Persian one of boating, from which he probably took the hint, and which we have fully described in a former part of this work<sup>c</sup>. How nearly this new one resembled it, the reader will see in the margin (B). But not to dwell any longer on such scenes of cruelty, which those inhuman tyrants imagine to be the only means of keeping an oppressed, discontented people in subjection, and of which we shall have fresh occasion to speak in the course of this bloody reign, let us now pass on to the arrival of the famed duke of Ripperda into these dominions, after his banishment out of Spain.

Duke Rip-
perda's arrival at Me-
quinez.

THE design of his coming to the court of Mequinez was to engage Muley Abdalla in the blocking up the two strong fortresses of Ceuta and Mellita, in ruining of the Spanish coasts, and in uniting in a league with the other piratical states of Barbary, to transport an army of Moors into Spain, sufficient to undertake the reconquering of that rich and fertile country. His proposal gained credit the more easily with that monarch, as admiral Perez, who in a late reign had been sent ambassador to the British court, and since then to the Hague, had given him and his court a high character of his abilities, and artfully insinuated into them the great apprehensions which the European powers were in on account of his attachment to him; upon which it was unanimously agreed, that his scheme should be put in execution, and that the whole conduct and preparations for the war should be entirely left to his care.

Made a Basba
and great favourite.
Proposes the siege of Ceuta.

RIPPERDA now become a great favourite at court, and raised to the dignity of a Basba, having informed himself the best he could by a faithful spy of his, named Martin, of the state of the Spanish garrisons and fortresses on the Barbary coasts, immediately proposed the opening the trenches before Ceuta; which, when it came to be debated in council, the most experienced officers among the Moors strenuously opposed, on account of the many fruitless attempts that had been already made against that place, as well as the vast expence of blood and treasure which the bare blockade of it had cost their monarchs, who must by this time be sufficiently convinced that it was absolutely impregnable. Ripperda heard them all out with abundance of pleasure, because he well knew that they had not raised any objection which he could not answer, nor any difficulty that he could not remove, as they chiefly sprung from their ignorance of the European ways of carrying on such difficult sieges with success; but when he came to open to them those various and new invented methods of acting offensively and defensively, of which himself was a thorough master, he easily brought them all over to his opinion; and the siege of that place was unanimously agreed to and resolved on without any further delay.

Brings the whole council
to his opinion.

Invigorates
the Moors.

THAT nothing might be wanting to the carrying on of this favourite project, Abdalla nominated that apostate duke to be commander in chief, and raised some other renegadoes to considerable commissions under him. He also assembled a choice body of infantry, consisting of about 10,000 men, at the head of whom Ripperda marched directly to Ceuta, where he directed every thing with such surprising judgment and unwearied industry, as failed not to inspire the rest of the troops with fresh vigour and courage, insomuch that they now no longer deemed this blockade an insurmountable task, which could only end with their deaths, as their language formerly was, but looked upon the carrying of the place as a sure and easy one, under such an experienced commander, whom they looked upon as sent from heaven to free them from thralldom and misery, and to lead them to a plentiful harvest of laurels and wealth, especially as he took great care to shew himself at their head in every expedition.

Mequinez.

As soon as he thought he had sufficiently inspirited his troops, and given the engineers the best rules how to proceed in the siege, he returned to Mequinez, where he was received with the greatest marks of favour and esteem. His design was to solicit that court for a new supply of provisions, ammunition, and artillery. His motion was immediately seconded by admiral Perez, and agreed to by the council; and the arrival of that fresh convoy to the camp so conciliated the hearts and confidence of his Moorish troops to him, that they cried him up as their common father, and the ablest general of the age.

(B) He caused an ox to be brought into the court-yard, and to be beheaded close to the shoulders, and laid open from the breast downwards from end to end. Six men were then ordered to strip the alcayde of all his cloaths, and to lay him at full length in the carcase of the beast, and to be sewn in it, with only his head out to give him air to breathe, and more time to live in the most exquisite misery. The carcase was moreover closely hooped with six iron hoops, made on purpose to keep him in, and to prevent all possibility of his disentangling himself from his dreadful confinement. In this miserable plight they let him continue, till the worms, which bred in the carcase of the ox, had devoured the greatest part of his flesh and intestines, roaring and raging in the most exquisite tortures, without any other comfort than a few handfuls of boiled rice, or cuscusu, which were put from time to time into his mouth, not so much to allay his hunger as to lengthen his misery (26).

a RIPPERDA was now at the summit of credit and happiness, if any share of the latter can fall to the lot of a renegade to his God and country, when all was overcast again by the arrival of his faithful spy Martin, who brought him the unexpected news, that the Spaniards were preparing to transport an army into Africa to retake the city of Auran, or Oran, if not to extend their conquests still farther. The declaration was dated June 6, and contained the reasons which had induced the Spanish monarch to this expedition; for which a sufficient number of ships, men, and arms, was dispatched at the same time; all this Martin gave a full account of to the court of Mequinez.

b ABDALLA, though not a little surprised at the news, was yet glad that he had so able a general as Ripperda to oppose against the famed marquis of Montemar, who commanded the Spanish forces; and as that place was then in the hands of the Algerines, his allies, he wholly committed the defence of it to him. We shall not here anticipate the success of that expedition, of which we are to give a full account in a subsequent chapter; and in which he was forced to yield to the superior valour of the Spanish forces, through the baseness and cowardliness of his own. This unavoidable disgrace, however, was so far from discouraging him from pursuing his old scheme, that the excessive heats of the country had scarcely obliged the Spaniards to quit the field, than he started a double project; the one for the renewing the siege of Ceuta, and the other for the recovery of Auran; both which he represented to the king as practicable and easy, provided he could engage the free Moors, that is, the Algerines, Tuniseens, and Tripolitans, to join heartily and unanimously in it. He found little or no difficulty to engage them all in it; and, in a few days after, his couriers returned with the agreeable news, that they were all in full march to reach the army before Ceuta. Upon which Ripperda immediately set out, and found them accordingly encamped about two leagues short of that place. But here he was likewise informed, that the garrison had received a considerable reinforcement, and was marched out to engage in the open field. This last piece of news would certainly have given him the greatest pleasure, as it did a most wish'd-for opportunity of signalizing himself on so critical a juncture, had he not had too great a cause, from their former behaviour, to mistrust the firmness of his Moorish troops, on which the whole success chiefly depended. To confirm them, therefore, the more in it, he made a long and most pathetic harangue, in which he displayed to them, with his usual rhetoric, the barbarity and tyranny of the Spaniards, all joining together to reduce them to the lowest and most miserable state of slavery, reminding them of what their noble ancestors had suffered from them, and what a deal of blood and treasure it had cost them to repel their ambition and cruelty, and how much now depended upon their valour and firmness at this juncture, desiring of them nothing more than that they would follow his example, who was now going to lead them against their and his own enemies. The Moors, who were no less charmed with his eloquence than inspired by his conduct, behaved on this occasion with unusual bravery and firmness; and though the engagement was long and obstinate, yet, contrary to their wonted custom, they fought boldly hand to hand, rallied several times, whilst their general was in some measure present in every post of danger, not only distributing his commands, but fighting, charging, rallying, and exposing himself every moment to some fresh danger. At length, after a long and bloody action, the Spaniards were totally defeated, and forced to retire to Ceuta in great confusion, after a very great loss of their best forces and officers.

e FLUSHED with this signal victory, the ambitious Basha began to open the trenches in form before Ceuta; and at the same time sent a reinforcement of 30,000 men, under the command of Hali, to assist in the forming the siege of Auran. But unfortunately for him, whilst his troops, elevated with their success, lay carelessly straggling along the trenches, and their advanced guard was at a good distance from the head quarters, the governor thought fit to fall upon them in the dead of the night, at the head of 6000 men, besides 500 pioneers, and several officers of distinction. The design was so well conducted, that the Spaniards quickly drew the Moors out of their trenches, and filled them up, nailed their cannon, plundered their head quarters, and forced Ripperda to flee in his shirt to Tetuan, leaving the greatest part of his infantry to be cut in pieces by the enemy. And a much greater slaughter would have been made among them, had not the cavalry come timely to their rescue, and by charging the enemy with fresh vigour, given an opportunity to some corps of foot to form in the plains behind them, who having repulsed them, happily recovered their posts. However, the engagement lasted near seven hours before the Spaniards retired; so that the great number of the slain, the great booty they took, and the standards and trophies of honour they carried into the place, joined to the great disgrace of the Spanish Basha, who had been the first projector of that siege, wholly quashed that enterprise, and made the Moors glad to lay quiet awhile, without attempting any new one, till towards the latter end of the year, when, having increased their army to above 50,000 men, they resolved upon resuming that of Auran, in which they proved more successful, as we shall shew in the subsequent history of Algiers.

g IN the mean time Abdalla, disappointed and defeated in his favourite design against Ceuta, and other flattering prospects with which Ripperda had raised his ambition, grew more tyrannical and and cruel than ever (C). His oppressions and excesses grew to such a height, that the Alarbs,<sup>a</sup> no longer able to bear them, took up arms against him, and gave him a signal overthrow in a pitched battle near the city of Fez, which he only revenged by acts of the most barbarous nature against the inhabitants of that place. His mother, dreading the consequences of it, tried all ways and means in vain to reclaim him; sometimes by prayers and tears, at others by severe reproaches, and apprising him of his danger. He made no scruple at last to tell her, that his subjects had no other title to their lives than his will; and that it was one of his greatest pleasures to kill them with his own hands. Her frequent remonstrances made him at length so far forget what he owed to her, not only as a parent, but as it was by her intrigues and interest that he obtained the crown, that he resolved to rid himself of her at all adventures: of which having, by good fortune, got timely intelligence, she found no better expedient to<sup>b</sup> escape his unnatural fury, than by pretending a solemn pilgrimage to Mecca; yet he quickly after gave a signal, though little expected, instance of his humanity, even to those Alarbs who had so lately defeated him; for those elated by that victory had ventured to return to the charge; but being totally routed, in their turn, were glad to come and prostrate themselves before him, to the number of 4000, stripped as they were of all their cloaths; which made, it seems, such an impression upon him, that he could not forbear expressing a great resentment, that men should use their enemies in so barbarous a manner, and ordered some comfortable cloaths to be distributed among them. But whether this was owing to the impressions which his mother's remonstrances had made on him, or whatever other cause, it was not long before he was guilty of a much more egregious instance of barbarity against them, at a juncture when<sup>c</sup> he had the greatest cause to court their friendship.

retires.*

THE general of his negroes had, upon some discontent, raised a revolt among his troops, on pretence, whether true or false, that Abdalla had formed a design against his life, and so pathetically expressed the ingratitude of that prince to him, from whom he had received the greatest services, that they all agreed to dethrone him, and to place Muley Hali, the brother of Hammed Dehaby, on the throne. Abdalla, now become as timorous and cowardly as he was before arbitrary and cruel, not knowing which way to turn himself, quickly left the city, with a design to refuge himself among those Alarbs whom he had used with so much clemency. He was then on his way towards them, when he was met with by eight of their deputies, who were sent, as is probably conjectured, to offer their services to him; but taking the advantage<sup>d</sup> of his present distress, began to make some seasonable remonstrances to him on his past conduct: but that prince, whom no misfortunes could restrain from his sanguinary disposition, was so exasperated at the liberty they took with him, that he killed them all with his own hand, though at that time he was destitute of all safe refuge, and was going to put himself under their protection. All this while Muley Hali, at the head of his Negroes, was marching towards Mequinez, and entered that metropolis almost without opposition; but was not a little exasperated, when, instead of finding those treasures in it which he expected, he was told, that Abdalla had taken them away with him. He at first vented his resentment against his mother and the governors, and other officers of the seraglio and city.

stored to the crown.*

ABDALLA, on the other hand, having carried off a vast treasure with him, made use of<sup>e</sup> some part of it to corrupt a great number of those blacks, who had but a little while before shewn no less a readiness to drive him from the throne, and whom Hali was not in a condition to bribe at the same high rate. Abdalla was by their means restored to the crown, by whom he had been deprived of it; and when the negro general upbraided them for their baseness and inconstancy, they only told him, that they did not think Muley Hali a prince worthy of it: and it must be owned, that he had so far besotted himself by the excessive use of an intoxicating drug, called by the Orientalists Archiach, or Archicha, and not unlike the Turkish opium, which, taken moderately, hath an exhilarating, but when to excess, a lethargic quality, that he might justly be looked upon as quite unfit to reign.

ABDALLA had no sooner recovered the crown, than he ran into his old excesses of cruelty.<sup>f</sup> The city of Mequinez was one of the first that felt the dreadful effects of his rage; every individual of whose garrison he caused to be beheaded, and the governor's youngest son to be strangled, whose father, foreseeing the storm, killed himself, after having first cut the throats of his wives and children, to avoid their falling into the brutish hands of that exasperated

(C) He not only punished with death the officers of his army for the least offence, but for the least mistake, or even for no other fault than want of success, though irreproachable in all other respects. But what was still more tyrannic, he carried his inhuman resentments against things of the most innocent nature; of which the following is a most flagrant instance: there is a strange prevailing custom all over Barbary, as well as here, that in their marriages, when the bride proves a virgin, the bride-men and maids carry the insignia of it in triumph through the city; upon which the bridegroom, in a jocular manner, styles himself a king, and imposes some trifling taxes upon his friends, which he exacts under some penalty. But Abdalla was too jealous of the royal title and prerogative to admit of any such harmless imitation of it, and ordered eight of those bridegrooms to be tied to mules tails, and dragged through the streets of the city till they expired (26).

a tyrant. After that dreadful execution, he ordered the city to be plundered, and the citadel to be rased, for having, perhaps much against their will, been forced to receive his competitor within their walls; and having, in all probability, felt the sad effects of his resentment, when he found it stripped of the royal treasure he expected to have found in it. But these are considerations of little weight, even with their best monarchs, in those arbitrary governments, and of still less to such an inhuman tyrant as Abdalla.

In the mean time the general of the negroes, far from being deterred by these butcheries, The negro general raises a fresh revolt. from his first design of absolutely stripping him of the regal power, revived his old complaint of his life being threatened, and of the necessity there was of setting up Sidi, another prince of the royal blood, on the throne, (seeing Muley Hali was unfit for it) in order to rid the empire

b of such a monster of ingratitude and cruelty. He was in hopes, that the present ferment it was then in would induce not only the Negroes, but the Moors likewise, to join with him in it: but to his great surprise found himself deceived; whilst Abdalla, at the first news of it, Betrayed to Abdalla. had recourse to his old stratagem, and found means, by his large donations, not only to reconcile the Negroes to him, but to engage them to deliver up their general alive into his hands: whereupon that unhappy officer, seeing himself thus basely betrayed by his own troops, betook himself to an artifice; which, considering the superstitious devotion of the Moors, he flattered himself could hardly fail of securing, at least, his life. With this view he took sanctuary in a much revered mosque, on account of some great fanton, to whom it was dedicated; and, putting on the cloaths of the saint, suffered himself to be brought before the

c emperor in that venerable disguise. Abdalla, though far from being such a strict devotee as Brought to him in a saint's habit. his father Muley Ismael, yet condescended to kiss the holy robes with a seeming respect;

but ordering them immediately to be taken off, plunged his spear into his bosom, and called Stabbed by him. for a cup to receive some of his blood, with a design to drink it, in token of revenge. But here his prime minister took the liberty of diverting him, by representing to him how much A strange instance of barbarity. such an action was beneath his dignity; and offered to drink it himself, as being a more proper person for such a draught. Abdalla consented to it; and the prime minister, to express his staunch loyalty, condescended to an action, which, compared to that of Atræus, would make him appear the greater monster of inhumanity<sup>f</sup>. His death, however, did not put an end to Abdalla's fears, much less to the ferment that still reigned through the whole empire

d by his oppressions and cruelties. The people had some hopes left that Sidi, who had still a strong party in Fez, might, by some unexpected turn of fortune, wrench the crown from him, especially as a general discontent had spread itself among the Blacks, upon account of their being disappointed of those vast sums which they were made to expect upon the delivery of their general, which were, indeed, so large, that the emperor was not then in a condition to pay, nor, indeed, it seems, even their usual stipends, which yet is all they have to subsist upon. This soon induced them to enter upon a clandestine correspondence with Sidi's party at Fez; of which Abdalla being apprised, he lost no time to try to nip it, if possible, in the bud. So that having mustered up what forces he could get together, he resolved to lay close

e siege to the place. But this not succeeding to his wish, he plied his attacks more briskly and frequently, being determined, as it were, to venture the fate of the whole upon some decisive stroke: but even here he was also unsuccessful, the enemy getting ground of him, whilst his army grew less and less, both by losses and desertion, which obliged him at length to retire. The difficulty was how to do so without exposing himself to the storm that was gathering on all sides against him. In this pressing distress the most expeditious way appeared to him the safest; so that taking his son, mother, and most favourite wives, and whatever treasure he could gather up together, he retired with them to the mountains to wait for more favourable times.

He was no sooner gone than the Fezians sent to invite the negroes to come over to Muley Sidi, assuring them, that he was much more worthy of the crown than his cruel and perfidious competitor; and, what proved a more powerful motive, engaging that he should pay them the 400,000 ducats of Abdalla's arrears. This failed not to bring them all to his side; and Sidi was now looked upon as firmly seated on the throne, having both Moors and negroes in his interest; and long might they have continued so, in all probability, had not his breach of promise, and other irregularities, altogether inconsistent with the character which the Fezians had given of him, occasioned soon after a general disgust, which displayed itself at length in as general a defection. Abdalla did not lose so fair an invitation to appear again in arms in defence of his imperial dignity. He engaged his rival accordingly, at the head of an army gathered up in haste, and had the good fortune to give him a total overthrow. Sidi, who received a dangerous wound in the action, narrowly escaped with his life, and left him master of the field, as well as full possessor, once again, of his tottering state<sup>g</sup>.

The history of Algiers, from its foundation by Barbarossa; and from that down to the present time.

S E C T. I.

Algiers,
whence so called.

THE Algerine kingdom made formerly a considerable part of the Mauritania Tingitana, described in the *ANTIEN*T HISTORY; and stiled also Mauritania Cæsariensis, from the city of Cæsarea, built there by King Juba, in honour of Augustus, who had restored him to his native kingdom<sup>a</sup>. Cluverius is the only author who places this Roman province in Darab, in the Biledulgerid, but without any foundation.

ALGIERS, or Argier, hath its name from its metropolis, the only city of note in the whole kingdom; and called by the Turks Algezair, since then corrupted into Algiers, of which we shall treat farther in its proper place.

How divided by the Ara-
bians.

THIS kingdom was, soon after its conquest by the Arabs, divided into four principal provinces; viz. Tremecen, al. Tlesan, or Telensine; 2. Algiers Proper; 3. Bujeyab, vulgarly Bugia; and 4. Tennez, or Tenes; to which some authors add a 5th; viz. Constantina; all which had their names from their respective capitals. But after Algiers became the metropolis of the kingdom, and Tremecen was become subject to it, the Turks, under whose protection the Algerines had put themselves, divided it into eighteen provinces; viz. 1. Algiers Proper; 2. Tremecen; 3. Tennez; 4. Bujeyab; 5. Angad, or Angued; 6. Beni-Arazid; 7. Miliana; 8. Couco; 9. Labez; 10. Tebeffa; 11. Human-Bar; 12. Haresgol; 13. Oran, or Awran, and Horan; 14. Mostagan; 15. Bona; 16. Sargel; 17. Jigeri, or Gigeri; 18. Constantina. All these are so named from their respective capitals; besides which, some of them have only two or three inconsiderable towns, and others only one<sup>b</sup>.

Its extent.

THE extent of this kingdom from east to west, that is, from the town of Tabarca, on the river Zaine, or ancient Tusca, in 0° 16' west long. from London, to that of Twunt, and the mountains of Trava, 9° 16' east, is variously computed by geographers. Sanfon, who bounds it between the Zaine and the Mulvya, or Mulloia, gives it 900 miles in length; La Croix 720; Luyts 630; but to name no others, according to the latest and best computation, the utmost length of it amounts to no more than 460 miles<sup>c</sup>. They agree somewhat east to west.

Breadth various.

better about its breadth; none of them giving it less than 150 miles where narrowest, and 240 where broadest: but even in this they exceed also the later and more accurate observations. Some parts of it, particularly from Telensin to the sea coast, being hardly above forty miles wide; and near the springs of the Sig-Habra and Shellif about 60, which, in the western part, may be taken at a mean for the extent of what the Arabs call the Tel, or Tillage Land. But from Algiers, eastward, it is considerably broader, particularly under the me-ridians of Bujeyab, or Bugia, and Bona, where it mostly extends itself above 100 miles, especially under that of Jigeri, or Gigeri, in lat. 36° 55', to Luolajah, situate among the mountains of Atlas, in lat. 44° 50'. As to the Algerine dominions beyond the Tel, or more advanced parts of Atlas, they are so uncertain and precarious, that the northern skirts of the Boundaries.

Sabara, or desert, seem to be the properest boundaries on that side. They may, indeed, have still a good number of villages beyond this, in the country of Zaab, which pay some kind of tribute; but they are not worth further notice here. But in the general Algiers is bounded on the north by the Mediterranean, on the east by the river Zaine, which divides it from Tunis; on the west by the Mulvya, and the mountains of Trava, which part it from Morocco; and on the south by the Sabara, or Numidian desert<sup>d</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> THE climate of Algiers is, in most parts of it, so moderate, that they enjoy a constant verdure; the leaves of the trees being neither parched by the summer's heat, nor nipped by the coldness of the winter. They begin to bud in February; in April the fruit appears in its full bigness; and is commonly full ripe in May. The grapes are fit to gather in June; and their peaches, nectarines, figs, olives, nuts, &c. in August, where-ever the soil is suited to them. But this last differs very much, some parts being excessively hot, dry, and barren; and, on that account, lie uncultivated, the inhabitants being generally very negligent of agriculture. Other countries, especially the mountainous parts of Tennez, Bujeyah, and Algiers Proper, are fertile in corn and other grain, and variety of fruits; and others afford plenty of excellent pasturage, especially the northern coasts of Tremecen; whilst the southern side, and those parts at a distance from the sea coasts, are wild and barren, and harbour a great variety of wild creatures, as lions, tigers, buffaloes, wild boars, stags, porcupines, monkeys, ostriches, and other wild fowl, game, &c. on which account they have but very few towns, and those but thinly peopled, in comparison of the provinces nearer the sea; notwithstanding which, some are so advantageously situated for trading with Biledulgerid, and other parts of Negro-land, as to drive a considerable traffick with them <sup>c</sup>.

Wild creatures,

Traffick with the negroes.

THE Algerines, inhabiting along the sea coasts, are a strange mixture of various nations; but for the most part Moors and Morescos, driven thither from Catalonia, Arragon, and other parts of Spain. Here are also great numbers of Turks, besides those belonging to the militia, whom poverty sends hither from the Levant to seek their fortune; to say nothing of the Jews, who swarm along the coasts, and a great number of Christian prisoners taken at sea, and brought hither to be sold for slaves. Other Christians there are also who are free, and traffick with the rest of the inhabitants unmolested. The Berebers are some of the oldest inhabitants of these parts, and are supposed to be descended from the ancient Sabæans, who came hither from Arabia Felix, under the conduct of one of their princes; others believe them to be some of the Canaanites, whom Joshua drove out of Palestine<sup>f</sup>. These are dispersed all over Barbary, and divided into a multitude of tribes, under their respective chiefs (A); most of them inhabit the mountainous parts, some of them range about from place to place, and live in tents, or portable huts, others in scattered villages; and have, nevertheless, kept themselves for the most part from intermixing with other nations. These are reckoned the richest of all, go better clothed, and carry on a much larger traffick of cattle, hides, wax, honey, iron, and other commodities: they have likewise some artificers in that metal, and some manufacturers in the weaving branch<sup>g</sup>. To these we may add the Zwowahs, called by our European authors Azuagues, or Affagars, dispersed likewise all over most parts of Barbary and Numidia; and great numbers of whom inhabit the mountainous parts of Couco, Labez, and other Algerine provinces, and lead a kind of wandering pastoral life. These are very poor, yet stout and warlike, and are taken into the service of the government.

Their way of living, traffick, &c.

The Zwowahs, or Azuagues.

BUT the most numerous of all the inhabitants are the Moors and Arabians, of whom we shall now give a short account. The Moors, so called from their ancient county Mauritania, are of two sorts: those that inhabit the cities and towns, and carry on some commerce, either by land or sea, and under the commission of the Dey, Beys, or Agas, of their respective abodes, bear offices relating to the concerns of their own nation; some follow trades and manufactures; others are farmers, gardeners, graziers, &c. They have houses and lands of their own, and may be stiled the citizens of the Algerine kingdom; many of whom grow rich enough to purchase estates, and have a considerable share in the ships that go cruising abroad<sup>h</sup>.

THE other sort are of the wandering kind, without lands, houses, or patrimony; and in all respects very poor. They are multiplied into a prodigious number of tribes, distinguished either by the names of their chiefs, or the places of their abode, or both. Each of them forms a kind of itinerant village, or adowar, as they term it; each family of which lives in its particular tent, or portable hut. Each adowar hath its Cheyk, or chief, who, in conjunction

(A) The name of Bereber is supposed to have been given to them on account of their settling at first in some desert part. Upon their increasing in process of time, they divided themselves into five tribes, called the Zinhagians, Musamedins, Zenetæ, Hoares, Gomeres; and these having produced 600 families, did also subdivide themselves into a great number of petty tribes; some of whom retained the names of their founders, others added that of the country they lived in; which not only occasioned a confusion among their tribes, but very frequently wars among them (1).

(1) Leo Afr. p. 5. Marmol Afr. l. iii. c. 17. & seq. Dapper, Davity, Morgan, Tassy, &c.

with his assistants, form a sort of petty aristocracy, and govern the whole community with a great equity and tenderness. They live entirely on the produce of such lands as they farm from those we called above the citizens; to whom they pay their rent in kind, whether fruits, herbs, corn, honey, wax, and the like; and the remainder they sell to the neighbouring towns, as opportunity offers. They are particularly skilful in the choice of the most advantageous soil for every season, and no less careful to avoid the neighbourhood of the Turkish troops. Each adowar pays a tax to the Dey, in proportion to the number of its families; for which their Cheyk is answerable to him, and the whole community for each individual. These wanderers being scattered all over this part of Afric, in Morocco, Tunis, Tripoli, &c. where we shall have occasion to speak of them again under those heads, it will not be amiss to give our readers a little further notion of their manners, religion, customs, &c. here once for all, especially as they are for the most part common to them, throughout all the vast tract of ground they possess, and under every government they are tributary to.

Pay tribute to the Dey. Scattered over Afric. Their extreme misery and nastiness. THEIR adowars are a perfect emblem of misery and nastiness; and so poorly furnished are their tents, that a handmill to grind their corn, a few earthen pitchers, wherein they keep their oil, rice, flower, &c. a few mats to sit and lie upon, and a pot or two to boil their rice, are all the household-goods they contain; and yet are big enough to contain two or three families, parents, children, servants, horses, cows, goats, poultry, cats, dogs, &c. only this last creature is obliged to lie out of the tent, to keep guard against the approach of lions, foxes, and other beasts of prey; and to drive away rats, serpents, and other vermin, which are in some parts very numerous and hurtful. The Cheyk's tent is only distinguished from the others by its height, and being pitched in the center of the rest. These huts being supported by two large posts, form a kind of pavilion; the door of which is made of the boughs of trees. The middle is a small square, which divides the apartments of the Moors from those of their beasts; in the center of which is the hearth, upon which they bake their cakes, boil their rice, and other food; and round the sides are spread mats of palm trees, which serve for tables to eat at, and beds to lie upon. The tents are covered with sheeps hides, black, white, speckled, as it happens; and every thing in them is mean, nasty, and loathsome<sup>1</sup>.

Their mean diet. Employment. THEIR diet is chiefly cakes baked on the hearth, rice, pulse, fruits dried and green, milk, &c. They eat little or no flesh, except on some great holidays, because they can turn it into money; and their drink is commonly water; and a little oil and vinegar mixed, to sop their bread in is reckoned a dainty sauce. The men perform all the husbandry work, and go about to sell their corn, fruits, poultry, and other commodities, whilst their women and children take care to feed the cattle, to get in fuel and water, to provide victuals and other necessaries for their family: they likewise keep a vast number of bee-hives under their care, and breed great quantities of silk-worms.

Mean garb of the men; THEIR dress is as mean as their food; that of the men consists only in a haik, or coarse piece of cloth, four or five ells long, which they wrap about their shoulders, and comes down to their ankles; to which they add a cap of the same cloth, or some rag which they twist about their head. The Cheyk's dress is a shirt, and a cloak all of one piece, which comes down to the calf of their leg, and a cowl upon his head (B) of a finer sort of cloth. As to the children, girls as well as boys, they let them go quite naked, till they are about seven or eight years of age, when they tie a rag or two about them, rather for ornament than decency. While they are sucking, their mothers carry them, often two in a bag, tied upon their backs, when they go to fetch water or wood; but they are generally so stout as to begin to walk by that time they are six months old.

Of the women. THE dress of the Moorish women is only a piece of woollen stuff, which covers their bodies from their shoulders down to the knees. They wear their hair braided, and adorned with glass bugles, coral glass, fishes teeth, and other such baubles: the bracelets on their arms and legs are either of horn, wood, ivory, or other such mean stuff; whilst their cheeks, foreheads, arms, and legs, nay, their thighs and fingers ends, are embellished with black spots from their very infancy, which is done by pricking the place with a needle, and rubbing it with some sort of black powder. Their complexion in general is very swarthy; but their constitution robust and lively. They marry very young; the sons at fourteen or fifteen, and their daughters at nine

(B) There are here and there some wealthy Moors that wear such a cloak when they go abroad; and look upon it as so choice an ornament, that they commonly make it serve two or three generations; and so careful are they in preserving it, that if they are caught in a shower, they immediately pull it off, and fold it up, lay it upon some stone, or dry spot, and sit patiently naked upon it till the rain is over, and their skin dry enough to put it on without damaging it. But the generality of them are so poor, that they can hardly afford themselves a haik long enough to cover their knees (2).

a or ten, or even at eight years of age. And as these are commonly very fertile, it is no extraordinary thing to see them suckling of their children at ten or eleven, and sometimes even earlier. Their fertility.

WHEN a young man hath got leave to court a man's daughter, he is to bring the number of horses, cows, sheep, or other cattle agreed upon, to her parents hut, where she, without any reluctance, receives him for her spouse; upon which some of the by-standers asking him what his bride hath cost him, he answers, A virtuous and industrious woman cannot be too dearly bought. After the mutual congratulations are over, the young women of the adowar are invited to the feast; and the bride being set on a horse of the bridegroom's, is led to his tent, with the acclamations of the retinue; and being arrived at the door of it, is offered a mixture of milk and honey to drink, whilst the rest of the company sing her epithalamium, and conclude it with the usual good wishes to the new married couple. The bride then alighting, her companions put a stick into her hand, which she thrusts as far as she can into the ground, saying, that as the stick cannot be removed thence without force, so neither will she quit her husband, unless he forces her from him; upon which, before he admits her into his tent, he delivers up a flock to her, which she leads to some neighbouring pasture, by which she is given to understand, that he expects her to labour, and to take care of the family; and, upon her return, she and her retinue are admitted in: the feast begins and ends with singing, dancing, and other rejoicings till the evening, when the bride is presented to her husband, and the company take their leave. She is afterwards to wear over her face a veil during a whole month, and not to stir out of the tent till that be over; from which time she enters into that province of the family œconomy that is allotted to the rest of the married women, who are here excluded from intermeddling with any public matters; and are so well satisfied with it, that they would be highly displeased with their husbands, if they should offer to communicate any affairs relating to the state to them <sup>k</sup>. Marriages. Women excluded from public affairs.

THESE wandering Moors are generally very stout and warlike, skilful horsemen, and value themselves very highly, notwithstanding their poverty, for not being confined to towns, like the other sort, whom they look upon as tame slaves, always at the mercy of the Turks; so that upon any insult or ill usage received from a Turkish Aga, they immediately return it in a hostile way, till the town Moors, who cannot subsist without being supplied with provisions from them, nor upon a dislike secure themselves from their depredations, have mediated a peace between them. To keep up this martial temper among them, the chiefs of every adowar meet in a circle round their Cheyk every evening, to discuss the public affairs; after which they divert themselves with their usual exercises on horseback; in which they are so dexterous, both in the management of that creature and their graceful posture of sitting, that they can take up any thing from the ground with their lance in full speed. In this exercise they continue till the time is come for retiring. Their usual weapons are a zagay, or short lance, which they always carry in their hand, and a broad cutlass hanging below the left elbow. Men stout and warlike. Dexterous horsemen. Weapons.

THEY are commonly so addicted to robbing, that one cannot travel safely across the country, or at a distance from the towns, without a guard, or at least a marabout, that is, one of their priests or monks, for a safeguard. For, as they look upon themselves as the original proprietors of the country, and not only as dispossessed by the rest of the inhabitants, but reduced by them to the lowest state of poverty, they make no scruple to plunder all they meet with, by way of reprisal. However, notwithstanding their pretence of being the true descendants of the first inhabitants of this country, they differ from the Berebers, who lay a much juster claim to it, in that they have kept themselves from intermixing with any other nations; but the Moors have mixed themselves not only with the descendants of the ancient Africans, but with the several other nations that have conquered it, down to the establishment of the Turks in those dominions<sup>l</sup>. Thus much may suffice with respect to these wandering Moors, so far as they differ from those that are settled in towns. In other cases, such as their language, which is a corrupt Arabic, and their religion, which is a corrupt Mohammedism, they only differ from them, in having adopted a still greater number of superstitions in their faith, one of the most glaring the reader may see in the margin (C): the rest are scarce worth further notice. Great Robbers, and why. Differ from the Berebers.

(C) The Moors, in general, whether of a city or country, as well as the Algerine Turks, have, through the knavery of their marabouts, so disfigured the Mohammedan religion, that a true Mussulman would hardly know it, as we shall have occasion to shew when we come to speak of the present Algerines. But among a vast number of gross and unnatural superstitions they have imbibed from them, the following one is well worth being taken notice of; viz. Their happiness in the next life will be greater or less, according to the number of Christians they have slaughtered in this; so that those have but an indifferent title to any share of it, who have not had the good fortune to dispatch at least one or two before they die. They differ, however, in their opinion about the manner in which this ought to be done; some of them maintaining, that it ought to be only in battle, duel, or in a fair assault; whilst others affirm, that it will avail let it be done by ever so unfair or unjust means, or on what account soever, so it be but done. This, however, in Algiers described.

The Arabians

THE other considerable nation that is scattered through all the provinces, not only of the Algerine dominions, but through all the other parts of Barbary, is that of the Arabians. We have given a full description of these, of their origin, religion, customs, language, &c. both in our Antient and Modern History *. These we are now speaking of are a mixture of a variety of tribes, descended from those Mohammedan Arabians which over-ran this part of Africa; from which being afterwards driven by the Turks, they fled to the mountainous parts of it, to save themselves, their cattle, and effects, where they have enjoyed their liberty ever since; and by their labour and industry have improved those barren and desert lands into pleasant and fruitful territories. These are, like the Moors, divided into a multitude of tribes and little governments, under their respective chiefs, and value themselves highly upon their having preserved their blood untainted by mixture with other nations, and express the utmost contempt for those, who, preferring their ancient habitations in towns and cities, submitted to a foreign yoke, whom they call, therefore, in derision, citizens and courtiers; and as they have intermarried with strangers, they are reputed no better than Moors. The Algerines, indeed, who make no distinction between these two sorts of Arabs any more than they do between the wandering and city Moors, call them all four alike by the common name of Moors; in which inaccuracy they have been followed by many of our Europeans, who seem to make no manner of distinction between the Turks, Moors, and Arabians, of this kingdom, for want of being better acquainted with it.

Erroneously

Subdued by the Turks but in part.

THE Turks, upon their first subduing of this country, knew so little of the mountainous and desert parts of it, that they gave the Arabians an opportunity of seizing upon the passes that lead to the kingdoms of Fez and Tunis; but upon taking a further survey of it, and raising of fortifications on the most advantageous posts, they soon obliged them either to retire or submit; which they could the more easily do, both by the help of their fire arms, and the increase of their forces by the arrival of thousands of Moors and Jews drawn thither from Spain. So that many of these Arabs agreed to become tributary to them, rather than abandon their old habitations; whilst others, scorning a foreign yoke, retired into the more inaccessible parts of the kingdom, and lived free from tribute; and a third part compromised matters with the new conquerors, by a mutual obligation of not molesting each other, as will be seen more fully in the sequel, when we come to speak of the southern government of Algiers, where the greatest part of them are seated. But these two last stand in little or no awe of the Algerine government, who, on account of their martial temper and happy situation, dare not give them any molestation; for as often as any such attempts have been made, either upon their freedom or their effects, either formerly by the Turkish Bashas, or since by any of the Deys, they immediately concealed their corn, and other provisions, in some spacious caves in the rocks, and drew their cattle towards Biledulgerid, or some other inaccessible mountainous parts, where they could not only bid them defiance, but plague them likewise by their frequent incursions. There is still another sort of these Arabians that wander along the banks of their rivers Ziz and Hued-Abra, and some other parts of Algiers. These never give themselves the trouble of tilling their ground, but range from place to place for pasture, and live chiefly upon the plunder, not only of villages and adowars, but towns and cities. The province of Oran is one of the most infested by these plundering desperadoes.

The Algerine
government.

THE Algerines in general do chiefly live on piracy, and are justly looked upon as the most dangerous of all the African corsairs. They are very greedy of gain, which makes them bold and venturous, cruel to those that fall into their hands, especially to Christians, and make no scruple to violate the most sacred ties, whenever they stand in competition with their interest. The coasters are no less savage and inhuman, sparing neither wrecks nor sailors, whether friends or foes; only when the latter happen to be Mohammedans, they will bestow a small viaticum upon them to help them homewards: but as to the ship or cargo, though it belong to the Turks, or to the friends of the state, the Dey has not authority enough among the greatest part of them to save any of it to the owners, except by composition.

The militia de-
ish Bashas.

ALGIERS hath still retained the title of a kingdom, though the government was once dwindled into a downright republic, as we may gather from the title of their ordinances, edicts, and other public acts, which ran in the following terms: "We the great and small members of the mighty and invincible militia of Algiers, and of the whole kingdom." This change was occasioned by the avarice and tyranny of the Bashas, or viceroys, set over them by the Porte, under whose protection they had been so long, that they were become in some mea-

however, is not so wide a comment on Mohammed's doctrine, as the Gazie, or religious war on all infidels, especially the Christians, is one of the most meritorious parts of his religion, as that which intitles his followers to the highest degrees of sensual happiness in his promised Paradise.

- a sure subject to it: till at length the Turkish Janissaries and militia being become powerful enough to suppress the tyrannic sway of those Bashas, and the people almost exhausted by the heavy taxes they laid upon them, the former resolved to depose those petty tyrants, and set up some officers of their own at the head of the realm. The better to succeed in this attempt, the militia sent a deputation of some of their chief members to the Porte, about the beginning of the seventeenth century, to complain of the avarice and oppression of those Bashas, who sunk both the revenue of the state, and the money remitted to it from Constantinople, into their own coffers, which should have been employed in keeping up and paying the soldiery, by which means it was become so weak, that they were in continual danger of being overpowered by the Arabians and Moors, who, if ever so little assisted by any Christian power, would hardly fail of driving all the Turks out of the kingdom. To this they added a representation to the Grand Vizir, shewing how much more honourable, as well as easier and cheaper, it would be for the Grand Signor to permit them to chuse their own Dey from among themselves, whose interest it would then be to see that the revenue of the kingdom was rightly applied in keeping up its forces complete, and well paid, and in supplying all other exigences of the state, without any further charge or trouble to the Porte, than that of allowing them its protection, whilst they, on their part, engaged always to acknowledge the Grand Signors as their sovereigns, and to pay them their usual allegiance and tribute. This last proposal was highly relished by that prime minister, as it would save the Porte some considerable annual sums, prove a means of establishing a better understanding between the two powers than ever, and of keeping the Turkish forces upon a better and more complete footing than their Bashas had done. Upon all which accounts the Soltan was easily persuaded by his minister to agree to it, rather than perhaps to run the risk of a total revolt, and lose the small remains of his authority in that kingdom. By this concession the Janissaries became still more powerful, because the choice of those Deys was wholly invested in them, and they were to chuse them from among themselves. This elective body, called the Douwan, vulgarly Divan, or common council, at first consisted of about 800 militia officers, without whose advice or consent the Dey could do nothing; and, upon some urgent occasions, all the officers that resided in Algiers, amounting to above 1500, were summoned to assist. But since those Deys, who may be compared to the Dutch Stadtholders, are become more powerful and independent, the Douwan is principally composed of thirty Yiah-Bashas, with now-and-then the Mufti and Cadi, upon some emergencies; and, upon the election of a new Dey, the whole soldiery, are then allowed to come and give their votes. All affairs of state are to be determined by that assembly before they pass into a law, or the Dey hath power to put them in execution. But for the last thirty or forty years this assembly is become of so little account, that it is only convened out of formality, and to give an assent to what the Dey and his chief favourites have concerted before-hand; so that in reality the whole power is now lodged in one person, only with this small restriction, if it be any, that the Grand Signor still styles him his viceroy, or Basha, as he doth the people his subjects (D), and challenges to himself the power of approving or disallowing of his election, though it is seldom found that he ventured to disannul it, for fear of losing that shadow of authority he claims over them.

THE Algerine Deys are, as we hinted above, chosen out of the militia; the most inferior of which hath an equal right and title to that dignity with the highest: every bold and aspiring soldier, though taken from the plough or cart, being there considered as heir apparent to the throne; neither need he wait till the present possessor be deprived of it by age or sickness, if he be but able to maintain himself upon it with the same scymitar which he ventured to sheath in his predecessor's bowels. So that, as a reverend and learned traveller says, who resided several years in that kingdom<sup>a</sup>, the supreme command lieth here, as it did in the declension

(D) This plainly appears from the tenor of the letter, sent by the Grand Signor to the Dey Mehemmed, in favour of the Dutch, an. 1719, and particularly from the pompous superscription of it, which ran thus:

“ TO MEHEMMED, DEY and BASHA of Algiers, a prince chosen to enjoy the dignity he is possessed of, who has been preserved by the favour of the Most High; and to the LEARNED MUFTI, and to you the Cadis and Judges excelling in eloquence and equity, and to all others amongst you who abound in knowledge, and to all the Chiefs of the militia, who fight for the faith; and also to all our Algerine SUBJECTS, greeting.”

In which letter he complains, that the Dey had not only declared an unjust war against the Dutch, then in amity with the Porte, but likewise, that, instead of complying with his former orders, by which he had been enjoined to negotiate a peace with them, he had forcibly taken 50,000 dollars from them, and obliged their ambassador to retire into France.

Wherefore he now charges him afresh to send forth with two of his officers, with proper powers, to Constantinople, to answer their allegations, and to transact and conclude the said peace. And concludes with reminding the Dey and his Douwan, that such as refuse to obey their emperor's orders are criminals before God and men, &c.—Which order the Dey, upon that juncture, chose to comply with, rather than fall out with the Porte; and a peace was soon after concluded accordingly between Algiers, and the states of Holland (4).

of the Roman empire, open, and exposed to every bold pretender, who, if he hath but reso- a lution to attempt, will hardly fail of carrying it. This evidently appears, by the quick succession which hath been observed to happen among the Deys ever since they have been permitted to be chosen by the militia, scarcely one in ten of them having had the good fortune to die in his bed; that is, without a musket ball, or scymitar; even those few who have been blessed with a more peaceful exit, cannot be said to have been beholden for it either to any higher regard or esteem which the army had for them, but rather to their own good fortune or foresight, in nipping a new insurrection in the bud, by the death of the conspirators, before they could bring their designs into execution. Neither is it their male-administration, tyranny, or avarice, that hasten their ruin, any more than the contrary amiable qualities can preserve them b from it. The very want of success in an enterprise, though ever so wisely concerted and carried on, is a sufficient crime with those superstitious and mutinous troops, to cause an insurrection, and cost the best and most sagacious Dey, or officer, his dignity and life; nay, they are often caused upon no other foundation than a desire of change, blown up by some bold aspirer to the supreme power (E). This, however, helps to keep up in some measure the credit, or, at least, the shew of the Douwan, which might else have been quite abolished ere now; and a Dey is often obliged to assemble, and consult them upon all important matters, merely to screen himself from popular discontents; though in reality the chief members of it, being for the most part his creatures, he may be said to act with a despotic authority, there being no appeal from this supreme tribunal, but by way of insurrection, or open rebellion. We have already c observed, that the whole body of the militia is concerned in the election of a new Dey, and that the lowest person in it hath a right to vote as well as the highest; and as there are commonly several candidates to that dignity, the election can hardly be supposed to be carried on without some tumult, if not blows and blood-shed. But when once the choice is agreed on, the person elected is saluted with the words ALLA BARIK, that is, God bless, or prosper you; immediately after which, he is invested with the kaftan, or insignia of sovereignty, whilst the Cady, or chief judge, addresses him with a congratulatory speech, which is generally closed with a pathetic exhortation, importing, that, as it hath now pleased the Almighty to raise him to the supreme dignity of the kingdom, it is now his duty to govern it with justice and equity, to preserve his new subjects in their rights and liberties, and to make it his chief d care and concern to promote their safety and welfare, to the utmost of his power.

THE next officer in dignity and power to the Dey, is the Aga, or general of the Janissaries, who is one of the oldest officers of the army, and enjoys his post only two months; and is then succeeded by the Chiah, or next senior officer, or eldest Yiah-Basha. During those two months the keys of the metropolis are in his custody; all military orders are issued out in his name; and the sentence of the Dey upon any offending soldier, whether capital, or only corporal, is to be executed in the court of his palace. And as soon as he is gone through this short office, he is considered as mazoul, or superannuated; receives his pay regularly, like all the rest of the militia, every two moons, exempt from all farther duties, except when called by the Dey to give his advice at the grand council; to which he hath, however, a right to come at all e times when he pleases, but hath no longer a vote in it. The next to him in dignity is the secretary of state, who registers all the public acts; and next to these are twenty-four, or, according to Dr. Shaw, thirty Chiah Bashas, or chief colonels, under the Aga, who sit next to him in the same gallery in the Douwan. Out of this class are commonly chosen those who are to be sent on embassies into foreign countries, or to convey the Dey's orders throughout the realm. Next to them are the 800 Bolluk Bashas, or eldest captains, who are next in ° TASSY, l. ii. c. 6. SHAW'S Travels, p. 311.

(E) Nor is this bloody method of rising to, and maintaining themselves in, that high dignity to be so much wondered at, if we consider, 1st, That the soldiery, by whom they are chosen, amounting to about 1200, are either Turks or renegadoes, and both generally proud, rapacious, and untractable, and naturally expect to be very considerable gainers, if they prove but successful in these kinds of new elections, to which there seldom fails of being several candidates. 2dly, That military discipline is greatly wanting and neglected, or, to speak, perhaps, more truly, is so incompatible with the temper of those troops, that it might be dangerous to attempt the establishing or restoring it among them: so that when one of them, who hath served some time under those colours, comes to think himself sufficiently qualified, either to make a bold push for the dey-ship, or promote some other to it, he is sure to find partisans enough to assist him in it, though with no other view than that of some gain accruing from it. It is true, indeed, that this ambitious humour hath of late years been very much allayed by the many severe, yet reasonable, executions that have been made of these turbulent and aspiring spirits, if we may believe some of our latest accounts from thence (5). Yet in such ungovernable constitutions, there will never be wanting those, who, upon the least favourable opportunity, will be ready to blow the flame of sedition and assassination afresh. We need not doubt but the former Deys were as little sparing of the lives of those bold attempters; and yet we do not find that, of the first six that were chosen to that dignity, since the year 1700, above one of them has died in quiet possession of it; four of them having been massacred, and the fifth forced to save his life by a timely resignation (6).

a rank to be promoted to that of Chiah Bashas, according to their seniority. The Oldak-Bashas, or lieutenants, are next, who amount to 400, and regularly raised to the rank of captains in their turn, and to other employments in the state, according to their abilities. These, by way of distinction, wear a leather strap hanging down behind to the middle of their back. One rule is strictly observed in the rotation of these troops from one deputy to a higher; viz. the right of seniority; one single infringement of which, upon whatever pretence, would cause a revolt in the soldiery, and endanger, if not cost the Dey's life <sup>p</sup> (F). Other military officers of note are the Vekilards, or purveyors of the army; the Peys, who are the four oldest soldiers, and nearest to preferment; the Soulacks, who are the eight next in seniority to them, and are part of the Dey's body guard, and always march before him when he takes the field, being distinguished by their carbines and gilt scymitars, and a brass gun on their caps. The Kayts, or Turkish soldiers, each band of whom have the government of one or more Moorish adowars, and collect their taxes for the Dey; and the Sagiards, who are Turkish lancemen, 100 of which always attend the army, and watch over the water appointed for it <sup>q</sup>. To these we might add the three Beys, or governors of the three great provinces of the realm; but we shall have a more proper occasion to speak of them when we come to the division of it. All those officers above-mentioned compose the Douwan, or great council; and of them only the thirty Chiah Bashas have a right to sit in the gallery next after the Dey: the rest are obliged to stand on the floor of the hall, or council-chamber, with their arms across, and as much as possible without any motion: neither are they permitted to enter it with their swords on, or with any other offensive weapon, to prevent a tumult. As for those who have any suit, or other matters to transact with the Douwan, they must stand without at the gates, let the weather be ever so bad; and there they are commonly presented with coffee by some of the Chiahs, or inferior officers, till they are dispatched.

THE method of their gathering the votes in the Douwan is something singular. The Aga, or president, pro tempore, first proposes the question, which is immediately repeated with a loud voice by the Chiah Bashas, and from them echoed again by four officers, called Bashbal-dalas; and from them repeated from one member of the Douwan to another, with strange gestures and contortions; and with a most hideous noise and din, when the question is not to their liking. From all this the Aga easily concludes on which side the majority leans, and proclaims it accordingly. So that it is seldom seen that these assemblies end without some tumult, quarrel, or disorder; and no wonder, considering that the far greater part of the members are persons of mean extract, rude and illiterate, and are biassed by their own private interest and passions, rather than by reason or the public good <sup>r</sup>. And this seems to be one main reason why the Deys have of late years taken such pains to suppress those among them, as they knew to be ill affected to their measures, and to summon as few as they can into the council, besides his own creatures. It has likewise been a custom with them of late, immediately upon their election, to cause all the officers of the Douwan, who had opposed it, to be strangled, and to fill up their vacancies with those who had been most zealous in the promoting of it: by which means the far greater part of that supreme court becomes wholly devoted to his will.

IN this, and all other publick courts and assemblies, as well as state records, the Turkish is the only language that is allowed to be used; which obliges the Moors and Arabians, as well as the Christians, to make use of interpreters, whenever they have any complaint, suit, or other matters to come before any such courts. But the language of the present natives is a kind of compound of Arabic, Moreisco, and of their antient one; which, as we have formerly observed <sup>s</sup>, was most probably the old Phœnician. However, in their public commerce with other nations, they chiefly make use of the Lingua Franca, which is no other than a rude ungrammatical jargon, or mixture of Spanish, Portuguese, Italian, and French, which has been long since in vogue, not only along all these Barbary coasts, but likewise through most parts of the Levant; and this is also of great use to them in their piratic trade, which is above all others that which suits best with their temper, and brings them in the greatest advantage; on which account they are become the most formidable of all the Barbary corsairs. Nevertheless, they suffer free Christians, Jews, either natives or foreigners, Arabians and Moors, to exercise

(F) This seniority, not of age, which has nothing to do here, but of standing, may nevertheless be purchased, with the Dey's leave, by a junior from a senior; in which case the latter descends to the rank of the former. In all other cases they must wait till their turn comes, either by death, degradation, by way of punishment, or by the removal of the Aga to the superannuated station; which, as was hinted a little before, happens every two months; at which time the whole militia is regularly paid, and the Aga resigns his place to the Chiah, or the officer immediately next to him (7).

a a fair commerce both by sea and land ; together with other trades and manufactures in silk, cotton, wool, leather, and other commodities. But these are mostly carried on by Andalusian, Granadan, and other Spaniards settled in that kingdom, especially about the metropolis of it. Carpets are another manufacture of this country, though much inferior to those of Turkey, both in beauty and fineness ; but being both cheaper and softer, are preferred by the people to lie upon. There are also at Algiers looms for velvet, taffaties and other wrought silks ; and a coarse sort of linen is likewise made in most parts of the kingdom ; of which Susa produces the finest. Most of those manufactures are consumed at home ; and some of them, especially those of silk and linen, are so inconsiderable, that they are obliged to supply the deficiency of them from the Levant and Europe. These parts of Barbary send very few of their commodities, or even product, into foreign markets ; oil, wax, hides, pulse, and corn, b being but barely sufficient to supply the country ; though before the loss of Oran, the merchants have been known to ship off from one or other of the Barbary ports to the amount of seven or eight thousand tons of corn. The consumption of oil, though here in great abundance, is likewise so considerable in this kingdom, that it is seldom permitted to be shipped off for Europe *. The other exports consist chiefly in ostriches feathers, wax, hides, wool, copper, rugs, silk sashes, embroidered handkerchiefs, dates, and christian slaves.

The imports, whether by way of merchandize or prizes, consist chiefly in gold and silver stuffs, damasks, cloths, spices, tin, iron, plated brass, lead, quick-silver, cordage, sail-cloth, bullets, linen, cochineal, tartar, alum, rice, sugar, soap, cotton, raw and spun, copperas, aloes, brazil and logwood, vermillion, arsenic, gum-lack, sulphur, opium, anise and cummin c seed, mastick, sarsaparilla, aspic, frankincense, galls, honey, paper, combs, cards old and new, dried fruits, and variety of woollen stuffs. But though there is a constant demand of all these commodities, yet only a small quantity of them is imported by the merchants, on account of heavy duties, frequent exactions, precariousness of payments, and the uncertainty of the returns ; so that those who are in want of any of them will wait to the very last, in hopes to meet with them on board some prize, for it is chiefly by their corsairs that they are supplied with them. The misfortune is, that both the manufacturers and shop-keepers, which last are chiefly Moors or Jews, are very severely used by the government ; and often heavily fined for slight, or even pretended faults, which keeps them so poor, that it frequently puts them upon cheating their customers, either in weight or measure ; though they are sure, if caught, d to be treated with the utmost severity in their purse, or by corporal punishment, and often with death †.

The corsairs of Algiers form every one a separate kind of republic ; of which the Rais, or captain, is the supreme Bascha, who, and the officers under him, compose a kind of Douwan, in which every matter relating to the vessel is decided in an arbitrary way.

The coin in vogue here is chiefly foreign, their own being only of three kinds ‡ ; viz. the barba of copper, six of which were formerly worth an asper, but now only half an one. This coin has the arms of the viceroy stamped on both sides. The asper is a small square piece of silver with Arabic characters, stamped likewise on each side, fifteen of which make a Spanish ryal, and twenty-four a dupta, worth about a crown. They have likewise three sorts e of gold coin, but these are coined only at Tremecen ; viz. the rupee worth thirty-five aspers, the median fifty, and the zian, or dian, one hundred ; which last was the antient coin of the kings of Tremecen, or Telenfin, upon which account that province hath alone the privilege of coining these golden pieces, which are stamped with the viceroy's name, and are also current in the kingdoms of Couco, and Labez, though these have likewise their own particular coin. Besides these, the Turkish sultanus of gold worth about a ducat, the moticales of Fez about twenty-two pence, the Spanish ryals, French crowns, Hungarian ducats, and other European money, are likewise current among them. Only it must be observed, that there is no fixed standard for these foreign coins ; because strangers only compute their value by what they go f for in their respective nations. The only fixed species here is the patacachica, or pataca of aspers (an ideal sum, like our English pound, or the French livre), worth always two hundred and thirty-two aspers, and is the third part of a pataca gorda, commonly of the weight of two pistoles and an half ; but that weight is frequently raised or lowered at the Dey's pleasure, or the exigence of the government. The Jews have the superintendency of the silver mint at Algiers (if not also that of the gold coin at Tremecen), for which they pay a good round sum yearly to the Dey<sup>e</sup>.

We have already given some account of the rivers of this kingdom in the antient history of Mauritania Tingitana<sup>b</sup>. But, as the limits of this differed, we shall here subjoin a short description of the principal ones belonging to this kingdom. 1. The first is the Zha, or Ziz, which runs across the province of Tremecen, and the desert of Anguid, and falls into the Mediterranean near the town of Tabeerita, where it has the name of Sirut<sup>i</sup>. 2. Haregol, supposed the Sign of Ptolemy, comes down from the great Atlas, crosses the desert of Angued, and falls into the sea about five leagues from Oran. 3. Mina, supposed the Chylematis of Ptolemy, a large river which runs through the plains of Bathala, waters the city of its name, and falls into the sea near the town of Arzew<sup>k</sup>. (A). 4. The Sbellif, Zilef, or Zilif, a large one, which, descending from mount Gnanexeris, runs through some great deserts, the lake of Titteri, and the frontiers of Tremecen and Tenez, and falls into the sea a little above the town of Mostagan. This is supposed to be the Chinataph of the antients, and is inhabited on both sides by Arabs, who are rich and warlike, and can bring two or three thousand horse into the field<sup>l</sup>. 5. The Celesf, supposed to be the antient Carthena, falls into the sea about three leagues west of Algier, after a short course of eighteen or twenty leagues. 6. The Hued al quivir, supposed to be the Nazabata, or Nasaba, of the antients, and called by the Europeans Zinganir<sup>m</sup>, runs down, with a swift course, through some high mountains of Cuco and Abez, and falls into the sea near Bujeyah. It abounds with variety of fish, which is nevertheless neglected, on account of the great plenty that is caught on those coasts (B). 7. Suf-Gemar, or Suf-Gimmar al Rum-niel, which is supposed the Ampsaga of Ptolemy<sup>n</sup>, hath its spring on mount Auras on the confines of the Atlas, thence runs through some barren plains, and the fruitful ones of Constantina, where it receives some other rivers, which greatly increase its streams; thence, sliding northward along the ridges of some high mountains, it falls into the sea a little east of Gigeri. 8. The Ladog, or Ladeg, runs down from mount Atlas through part of Constantina, and falls into the sea a little eastward of Bona<sup>o</sup>. 9. Guadi, or Guadil-Barbar, springs near the head of Orbus, or Urbs, in Tripoli, runs through Bujeyah, and falls into the sea near Tabarca. It is supposed by some to be the Tusca, or Rubricatus, of the antients<sup>p</sup>. We omit sundry others of less note; and as to the Malva, or Maluja, which divides Algier from the kingdom of Fez, we shall give an account of it when we come to speak of the latter. We do not find, however, that the Algerines are very solicitous to make the best advantage they might of those that belong to them, though many of them are large enough, and of a sufficient extent, to be made serviceable in carrying on a communication between the inlands and the sea coasts. But their genius leads them too much to the piratic trade to mind any such real advantage; and it is not unlikely, that their tyrannic government may deter the Arabs, and other nations seated along their banks, from trying to reap any other benefit from them, than that of pasturage, and of conveying some of their commodities in flat vessels from one canton to another.

(A) This river, we are told (1), is now called Cena by the Moors, from a Marabout of that name, who had rebuilt the town of Bathalab on the banks of it, which had been destroyed by the Benimerini.

(B) We are told, that whilst this river was in the hands of the Christians, the mouth of it, which is very narrow, was so choaked up with sand, that no vessel could come up to it; but that, in the year 1555, the great rains swelled it to such a height, that it carried off all the sand and mud; so that galleys and other vessels have, ever since, entered it with ease, where they lie safe from storms, and all winds, but that which blows from the north (2).

The religion of the Algerines. THE Algerine religion at present differs only from the Turkish, in cherishing a greater variety a of superstitions. These African states had been converted from their antient idolatry<sup>a</sup> to the Christian faith, ever since the fourth century, when some Sicilian and Puglian lords, who had seized on some parts of Barbary, first introduced it there, and what a quick progress it made soon after, may be guessed from the number of African bishops, that met at the council of Carthage, ann. 411. amounting to 286, besides about 120 more that did not assist. But the church was soon after infected with arianism, and other heresies, by the Vandals, and other northern nations that passed thither from Spain. At length the Arabs brought in Mohammedism, which they propagated by the sword, about the beginning of the seventh century, and which hath taken such deep root ever since, that it hath reigned paramount to this day, and hath multiplied the old superstitions to a monstrous degree. b

THE Algerines acknowledge the Koran as the rule of their faith and practice, but are generally remiss in their observance of it. They have three principal officers, that preside over all religious matters; viz. the Mufti, or high priest; the Cadi, or chief judge in ecclesiastical causes, and such other matters as the civil and military power turns over to him; and the grand Marabout, or head of the Maraboutic order, which are a kind of eremitical monks, in such high veneration among them, that they bear an extraordinary sway not only in most private families, but even in the government. These three officers have their seats in the great Douwan next under the Dey, and on his right hand. There they are allowed to give their opinion in all difficult and important matters of the state, but without the liberty of voting with the rest of the members. As for those which relate purely to religion, they are usually referred c to them; and their decisions, if unanimous, are looked upon as binding, and to admit of no further dispute<sup>r</sup>.

Strange superstitions. A great deal of that superstition, which reigns throughout this kingdom, is, not without great reason, imputed to the pride, avarice, and knavery, of these Marabouts, whom they imagine to be inspired by some demons, and hold in such esteem, that they think it an honour to their women to be debauched by them. Those that travel are glad to provide themselves with one or more of them, as a sure guard against the most desperate banditti; so that they can cross the most dangerous woods and deserts, without fear of any insult from them. These Marabouts are known by their dress; they neither shave their heads or beards, and wear a plain long robe, with a short cloak thrown over it. Much the same regard they pay to their d madmen, idiots, and lunatics, whom they esteem as inspired saints, and great favourites of God. They place great merit in frequent washings of their whole bodies, in the length of their fastings (their lent stretching between seven and eight months), in the care and feeding of beasts, and other such kind offices to them, as the most effectual means to wash away their sins. On the other hand, they deem it a sin and defilement to carry the Koran below their girdle, to let some of their water drop upon their cloaths, to write with a pen instead of a pencil, to have any printed books by them, or any pictures and statues either of men or beasts, to use bells, to let Christians, especially women, set foot in their mosks, to exchange a Turk for a Christian; to touch any money, or enter into any common business, or even to staunch blood, or dress a wound, before the morning prayers are ended; to strike the ground with e their foot when they play at foot-ball, to eat snails, which they esteem sacred (C), to chastise their children in any other part than the soles of their feet, to sleep with their chamber door shut, and many more of the like ridiculous sort, not worth any farther notice. Some of a grosser kind they are charged with; as of ranking sodomy, and other unnatural vices, among f their virtues; which, whether strictly true or not, their practice is a plain proof that they do not look upon it as a breach of their law, seeing it is a reigning vice among them, from which neither priests nor laymen of any rank are exempt.

The dress of their men and women.

THEIR dress is very plain and light, especially among those of the common sort. But the Turkish persons of distinction affect a more sumptuous apparel, not unlike that which is worn in Turkey, being mostly of fine cloth or silk; their vests richly flowered, their turbants rich, and curiously done up, their legs are covered with boots of fine shining leather. The women's f garments differ only from those of the men in their lightness and length, their shifts and gowns reaching quite down to their feet; their hair is commonly tied behind, and adorned either with jewels, or common trinkets, according to their rank or circumstances, over which they wear a cap of silk or linen, more or less rich, as they can afford. They are likewise fond of adorn-

(C) Or rather, perhaps, as mischievous creatures, or malicious devils; for such, we are told, they are looked upon in the province of Constantina, by the superstitious vulgar, especially the women, who imagine that they create violent fevers, hæmorrhages, and other bodily disorders, in which notion they are encouraged by their knavish Marabouts, who undertake to cure them by counter charms, and make a gain of their superstitious follies.

<sup>b</sup> None but the viceroy, and some of his head officers, (and we may probably enough add, the chief members of the Dowan), are allowed to ride on horseback, at least in the metropolis, and other places of concourse. The rest must either ride on asses, or trudge on foot. As for the women, when they go abroad, they usually throw a thin linen veil over their faces; which they fasten to their girdle, and wrap an upper garment over their usual dress; so that they are only known by the slaves that attend them. Those that are of a higher rank are conveyed about in litters made of osier twigs, and covered with painted cloth; but so low, that they must sit cross-legged in them, yet wide enough to contain two persons in that posture. This way of travelling is much used in longer voyages, especially in their pilgrimage to Mecca; so that they can see without being seen, and travel free from wind, dust, and rain, as well as from the too great heat of the sun's beams <sup>b</sup>.

<sup>c</sup> THE Dey of Algiers pays no other revenue to the Porte, than that of a certain number of fine boys, or youths, and some other presents, which are sent thither yearly. His own income is variously computed; and, in all likelihood, rises and falls according to the opportunities he hath of fleecing and oppressing both natives and strangers; and this may be the reason why some made it heretofore amount to no more than 40,000 ducats, whilst others raise it to 400,000, and others to 600,000. Dr. Shaw hath since computed the taxes of the whole kingdom to bring no more into the treasury than 300,000 dollars; but supposes, that the eighth part of the prizes, the effects of those persons who die without children, joined to the yearly contributions raised by the government, presents from foreigners, fines and oppressions, may bring about as much more <sup>c</sup>. Tassy hath endeavoured to give us a more express estimate of it, from its several branches, exclusive of casual presents, and a few other duties; the whole amount of which, according to him, arises to little more than 650,000 current piasters, which he ascribes to the avarice of the provincial governors, who remit to the public treasury but a very small part of what they raise on the subjects, and sink the rest into their own pockets <sup>d</sup>. Thus both the Dey, and the officers who act under him, enrich themselves by the same laudable methods of rapine and fraud <sup>e</sup>; so that it is no wonder if the rest of the people are so shamefully impoverished by heavy taxes, and the injustice and bribery which reign among those in authority; much less to find the same infection spread itself down to those of the very lowest rank, under such excessive indigence and oppression.

<sup>e</sup> JUSTICE is no less venally administered here, with respect to the punishment of offenders, than it is with regard to property; and is more partially so towards the Mohammedan soldiery. These are seldom put to death for any crimes, except those of rebellion and revolt; in which cases they are either strangled with the bow-string, or hanged to an iron hook. In lesser offences they either fine them, or stop their pay; and, if officers, reduce them to the rank of common soldiers, whence they may gradually raise themselves again to their former stations. Women guilty of adultery have a halter tied about their necks, with the other end fastened to a pole, by which they are held under the water till they are suffocated. The bastinado is likewise used upon small offenders; and is given either upon the belly, back, or soles of the feet, according to the nature of their crime, or oftner to the pleasure of the Cadi or judge, who likewise appoints the number of strokes to be given, which amounts sometimes to two or three hundred, according to the indulgence he can obtain from him, either by bribery or friends <sup>f</sup>. And though, in many cases, the offender dies under them, for want of one of those powerful advocates, yet this punishment is neither reckoned capital, nor the judge called to an account for inflicting it in that inhuman degree. But the most dreadful of all punishments are those which they inflict on the Christians and Jews for certain offences; such as speaking against Mohammed, and his religion; for which they must either turn Mohammedans, or be impaled alive. Those who afterwards apostatize are still more severely tortured, being either burned or roasted alive, or thrown down from the top of the city walls, where they are caught hold of by iron hooks, some by the ears, others by the ribs, arms, or other parts of the body, and hang several days in the most exquisite torture; but this last, we are told, hath been set aside some considerable a time. Killing a Turk in a skuffle, fomenting a rebellion against the state, and such like, are likewise punished with impaling or burning; and those slaves who attempt to make their escape, are tortured to death in the most cruel manner, at the discretion of their masters (D).

Moors found guilty of robbery, or burglary, have their right hand cut off, and hung about their necks, and are made to ride through the city on an ass, with their faces towards the tail.
These retain among them the inhuman punishment of sawing in funder, which is done by tying the condemned person between two broad boards of the same length and breadth, and beginning at the head. A person of distinction, who had been ambassador at our British court, and well known to the officers of the navy, and garrison of Gibraltar, was, it seems, put to that cruel death not many years ago<sup>e</sup>. Besides the Dey and great Douwan, in whom the supreme b power was lodged, every province had a Basha or Bey who acted under the former; and a Douwan, with an Aga at the head of it, who acted under the latter; and by these all matters concerning their respective districts were regulated and decreed; but from them an appeal might be made to the viceroy Basha, and his council; and from these to the chief Aga, and the great Dou-
wan. But since the Dey is become so despotic of late, we cannot be sure whether these inferior Douwans subsist still; we only learn, that he keeps three Bashas, or lieutenants, under him;
one in the east, the second in the south, and the third in the west; who take a circuit every year through their respective governments, about the latter end of the summer, at the head of a small army, to gather in such taxes as the Dey thinks fit to impose upon them; and to punish them with military execution, if they refuse to pay; and this commonly takes up about c four months time. All the formality that is used in the Douwan, and other courts, is hearing the complaint and witnesses; immediately after which they proceed to give sentence, there being neither lawyers nor attornies to retard the administration of justice. When the women have any suit to them, they come veiled, and stand before the gates of the Douwan, crying aloud, and often, Char Alla, that is, justice in God's name; and these come generally accompanied with a croud of their own sex, sometimes to the number of one hundred, or more, to back their petition with their joint outcries. As for strangers, they have their own laws and judges among themselves; the Christians have their consuls, the Jews their presidents, and the Arabs, Moors, and others, their own chiefs; but the Douwan is still supreme d judge, to which they appeal in all disputes that arise amongst them. As for those that arise between them and the government, they must apply to the proper officers of it for justice, or in dernier resort. There is a considerable number of merchants, of various nations, in the maritime towns; that of Algier is computed to have above three thousand families of them<sup>h</sup>, who keep about two thousand open shops in the two chief markets; and the Jews quarter, which consists of about two hundred and fifty houses, contains at least eight thousand persons. Christian slaves are very numerous, not only in the metropolis, but in most parts of the kingdom, the corsairs continually bringing fresh supplies of them; insomuch that, in the year 1659, that city having equipped twenty-two or twenty-three vessels, they put between three and four hundred of those poor wretches in each of them, and yet had a sufficient number of them left to perform all their servile drudgery. The method the corsairs c take with them as soon as they are made prisoners, is to make a strict inquiry into their country, condition, and quality, which is often done by bastinadoing them, and their fellow prisoners, to extort a true confession; after which, having stript them almost naked, he orders them to be brought to the Dey's house, whither the European consuls repair, to examine whether any of them belong to their respective nations; and, if they were only passengers to reclaim them. But, if they prove to have served for pay to any nation at war with that republic, they cannot be released without paying their full ransom. Of these the Dey hath the choice of every eighth man, and chuses those who have some useful trades; as surgeons mates, carpenters, &c.; because these sell for a greater price; and if of quality for a still greater.
The rest, who are left to the owners and captors, are carried to the Besistan, or slave market, where a price is set upon them according to their profession, age, strength, and ability. From

(D) These, and other the like punishments, being inflicted according to the arbitrary will of the Dey, for offences against the state; by the Mufti and his two colleagues, for those against religion; and by the Masters on their run-away slaves; and not by virtue of any settled law, is, in all probability, the true cause of their having such a barbarous variety of them: For, besides those already mentioned, we read of their hanging those kind of offenders naked to a high gallows by two hocks, the one fastened quite through the palm of one hand, and the other through the sole of the opposite foot; in which miserable position they live in the utmost torture for three or four days, and sometimes longer. They have likewise condemned some to be nailed hands and feet to a cross, a tree, or a wall, probably out of hatred to Christianity, though the pretence has been, that some Christians, in their neighbourhood, had inflicted that punishment on some Mohammedans whom they had taken prisoners.

- a thence they are led to the court before the Dey's palace, and there sold by auction; and whatever is bid above the price set upon them belongs to the government. They have then an iron ring put round one of their ancles, and a short or long chain fastened to it, according as they suspect them more or less likely to attempt their escape. Among these, if any of them can procure a little money from their friends, or by way of charity, they are allowed to keep taverns, or rather wine cellars, paying a certain tribute to the Dey, according to the quantity they vend; for the Algerines allow themselves the use of wine; and these, and Turks, Moors, and Christians, will repair to, and dispense with the meanness of the place, and its accommodations, for the sake of the liquor; so that many of these slaves become rich enough in time to purchase their liberty, tho' they are obliged, besides their tribute to the Dey, to contribute towards the maintenance of their poor diseased brethren, and of the Christian chapels that are allowed for their use. As for the rest, who have neither trades, nor can put themselves in some way of living, they are used with great severity, fare and work very hard all day, and at night are shut up in their baths, and other public prisons, where they lie on the bare ground, without any other covering than the sky; so that they are sometimes almost stifled in water and mud. In the cities and towns they are put to the hardest and lowest kinds of labour; and in the country are made to draw the plough, instead of oxen or horses, and put to other such hard branches of agriculture; and are in this, and all other respects, treated with such uncommon inhumanity, as would be severely punished even among them, if exercised on the lowest rank of brutes. The women slaves are treated with less severity; and, if handsome and witty, are commonly made concubines, and sometimes gain a perfect ascendancy over their masters. But if any of them refuse to comply with their brutish lust, they spare no threats or cruelties to force them to it. And if application be made to the government in their behalf, as there have been signal instances of it, the common answer is, that they are their master's property; and that he is at liberty to put them to what use he thinks fit. Those that have neither youth, shape, or beauty, are usually consigned to some of the lower offices of the kitchen or family, according to their capacity; and are liable to be severely chastised for every slight miscarriage, especially in point of cleanliness, which they affect, in common with the Turks, to a very high degree; both with regard to their cloaths, table, furniture, utensils, &c. Popish priests and monks, that are slaves, are commonly used with more gentleness, because better supplied with money, by which they are exempted from labour and other hardships. But whenever any Christian prince declares war against that government, they are the first who fall the unhappy victims of their resentment and cruelty.

- THE Algerine women, especially those of the richer sort, lead an easy indolent kind of life, having little else to employ their time in than in dressing, sitting and chatting upon their sofas, or going to the baths, and visiting the tombs of their near relations, or those of their famed saints; or, lastly, to take pleasure in their gardens and summer-houses, which, though not elegant, yet are adorned with variety of verdure, flowers, fruits, shady walks, and other delightful accommodations. And here their husbands spend most of their spare time with them in smoking, drinking of coffee, and other recreations<sup>1</sup>. Although the Koran permits the men to have as many wives as they can maintain, yet the Algerines are contented with two, or at most three. They are seldom allowed to see them before marriage, but have them described to them by some female relation, or go-between, who are intrusted to transact the conjugal bargain; which, when concluded on both sides, the bridegroom sends some presents of fruits, and other refreshments, to his future bride, invites and feasts her relations in the best manner, according to his rank; and with dancing and music after the Moorish taste. On the nuptial day she appears in all her richest ornaments; her hands, arms, and face, deeply laid on with red and white, seated on a sofa, surrounded by a number of other women, all likewise richly dressed. At night she is conveyed under a veil, canopy, or sedan, according to her rank, and attended with the same female retinue to the bridegroom's house, with drums and pipes, dancing, and other such rejoicings. Here he receives and conducts her to a private apartment, whilst the rest of the company stand without, waiting till the usual tokens of her virginity be brought out to them; which are no sooner received, than the same company carries them in triumph thro' the whole city or town, attended with the same music and dances; whilst her parents and relations congratulate themselves upon her being come off her trial with honour<sup>2</sup>.

- In their sickness, each patient is always attended by persons of his, or her own sex; the physicians are commonly of the quackish kind, who cure chiefly by simples or charms; most of them are ignorant and indigent. When the sick person draws near to his end, they turn him towards the east, and cease not to pray to Mohammed for him till he expires. Immediately after they wash the dead body with warm water and soap, which done they deck it with a white shirt, a pair of white drawers and socks, and a silken robe and turbant. In that dress, it is carried on a bier to the burying place, attended by the relations and friends, but without a any particular mourning dress, except that the women cover their faces with a veil some few days, and the men wear their beards a whole month. They are three days in their houses without lighting any fire, during which time the near relations of the deceased make frequent visits to his tomb, and distribute bread and other alms to the poor. They likewise carry thither a kind of flint stones, commonly found along the sea shore, and throw them upon the grave, crying out Celem Allab, that is, light of God; which they accompany with loud outcries, and other tokens of grief; and if the deceased be of the richer sort, or a person of distinction, they commonly cause some encomiums to be engraven on his tomb-stone, intermixed with some apposite texts of the Koran; otherwise the ceremony is much the same with that of the middle rank, excepting only that the bier is followed with a greater retinue of his domesticks; b one of whom carries his sword, another his lance; the bearers are richly dressed: the procession, which is commonly preceded by one or more marabouts, or monks, is closed by a great number of horses and camels, and his tomb more sumptuously decorated <sup>1</sup> (C).

THE strength of this kingdom chiefly consists in their land and sea forces; but especially in the latter. They have but few cities of either note or strength, except the metropolis, (of which more in the sequel) and still fewer garrisons, if any deserve that name; these being mostly some inconsiderable forts either on their coasts, or some old castles in the inland parts, poorly fortified, and worse guarded, to keep the Moors and other nations in awe. We have already spoken of the Janissaries, or militia, who have engrossed all the power into their own hands, as being the only persons who have the privilege of chusing the Deys; and they must, therefore, c be very cautious of disobliging so powerful and mutinous a body of troops. Besides these, the government entertains a number of others, mostly Moors, who attend the three grand Bashas, or lieutenants, under the Dey in their respective provinces, and assist them in gathering the taxes from the people, by which all the soldiery and officers, civil and military, are chiefly maintained. These taxes are, on account of the scarcity of coin, mostly received in kind, as grain, cattle, fruits, &c. But these troops, which some have computed to amount to 12,000, but, according to the latest and most accurate writers, only 2000 <sup>m</sup>, are neither allowed to vote in the Dey's election, nor any of those other privileges belonging to the Janissaries, who have engrossed to themselves the whole power and management of the kingdom; and, on that account, stile themselves Effendi, or lords or nobles, and must be addressed by d that title by all their inferiors, tho' most of them are originally men of the lowest and ignoblest rank and character: for as their deficiency is supplied by new recruits, which the Dey sends for every five or six years from the Levant by his corsairs, the greatest part of them are either men of broken fortunes, poor shepherds, or even out-laws. These no sooner have got caps on their heads, and shoes on their feet, and a pair of knives to their girdle (D), and been instructed by their fellow soldiers, than they begin to assume an air of grandeur, expect to be saluted by the title of Effendi, or your grace, and look upon the most considerable citizens as their slaves, and the consuls of other nations as their footmen*. The Dey hath, indeed, power, on any emergency, instead of these Levant Turks, to inroll the Cologlies, or Coulolies, e who are the sons of such soldiers as have been permitted to marry at Algiers; but since these made once an unsuccessful attempt on the government, they have not been so much encouraged; and when they are, the state excludes them from the honour of being chosen Dey, Aga of the Janissaries, or in any other considerable post †.

BESIDES the privileges already mentioned peculiar to the Janissaries, they are allowed to have their quarters in some of the finest squares of their capital; and are maintained and served by

(C) These tombs, which are most commonly out of the cities or towns, are very neat and decent; and some of them are adorned with rich carvings, statues, and other ornaments: most of them have chapels, or oratories, to which both men and women repair, especially on Fridays, which is their sabbath. Near them are the cells of the marabouts, or monks, who are always there ready to assist their devotions, and receive their charitable alms for the dead.

Among those numerous monuments that are to be seen without the walls of the city of Algiers, is that of the famed lady Cave, daughter of count Julian, of Batrica, a woman of singular beauty, who being ravished by Roderic, the last king of the Visigoths in Spain, in revenge of which injury she invited the Sa*racens* thither; who, with an army of 600,000 men, soon subdued the whole country, and held it in subjection during several centuries (3).

(D) This is the original of a great part of those Turkish troops; from which, nevertheless, many of them have, by their valour and conduct, raised themselves to the highest posts in the government, and some of them even to the Deyship. Neither are they at all ashamed of their mean extract when raised ever so much above it, as we may conclude from the noble reply which Mohamed, Dey, gave to the deputy consul of a neighbouring nation. "My mother," said he, "sold sheep's feet, and my father neat's tongues; but would have been ashamed to have exposed to sale so worth- less a tongue as yours." (4).

- a slaves at the government's expence. Their stipends are duly paid every too moons; and they are allowed to buy their provisions one third cheaper than any other inhabitants. They not only treat the Jews and Christians with haughtiness and insolence, but the Moors also, though of the same religion with them; so that the wealthiest of these is forced to give the way to the meanest Turkish soldier (E). However, it is plain that they have not yet been able with all their forces to subdue them all, there being a much greater number of them, as well as of the Arabs (F), and other nations, who, either by reason of their advantageous situation among inaccessible mountains and deserts, or their vicinity to other kingdoms, have not only bid a constant defiance to the Turkish yoke, but dare even venture to make frequent incursions into several territories that are wholly subject to it<sup>a</sup>: and it is to suppress these, as well as to
- b extort the taxes from the rest, that they keep such a number of second-hand forces in the three districts above-named; which are, however, mostly under the command of Turkish officers.

(E) It is not a little surprizing that these brave descendants of the antient Mauritanians, who had so long signalled themselves by their bravery, both in their own country and out of it, should be so far degenerated as to suffer themselves to be tyrannized over by these Turks, considering they are almost an hundred to one more numerous than they. But it must be remembered, that they are mostly the off spring of those who had been driven out of Spain (5), Italy, France, &c. and had by that time exchanged their martial genius for the mercantile one, which they brought hither with them, and exercised in most maritime towns of the kingdom, where they chiefly reside; and provided they may become rich by traffick, can easily comply with the haughty humours of the Turks. And it is not unlikely that the hardships and cruelties they endured under their first tyrant Barbarossa, and some of his successors, (of which we shall speak more fully in the sequel) helped to complete their degeneracy; so that from that time they have lived in the greatest awe and dread of these lordly tyrants; who, looking upon all the rest of mankind as their slaves, are every way qualified to the most hazardous and desperate exploits, both by sea and land, and have made themselves formidable by them to all the countries round about them. But we must observe here, that these Moors are hated and despised for it by those who live in the country villages, and retain their old martial spirit, as being the more genuine offspring of the antient Mauritanians. For these preferring a poor life, with some sort of freedom in their homely huts, to any advantages they might enjoy under a Turkish yoke, have ever been ready to embrace every opportunity that offered to shake it off; and though hitherto without success, yet not without full proofs, that it was more for want of means than bravery, that they suffered them to reign in their antient patrimony (6).

(F) These free Arabs, being frequently confounded by our writers with the Moors before-mentioned, and no wonder, seeing the Turks call them both by the same name, it will not be amiss to give a short account of them here. We have already observed, that some of them are of the wandering kind, live in tents, and often shift their habitations for the convenience of their numerous flocks. Others follow their pasturage along the rivers and low grounds, and live in villages, build very neat houses, and carry on a gainful commerce. Both have their Cheyks, or chiefs, over them, by whom every adowar, or community, is distinguished. When the Turks made themselves masters of this kingdom, they reduced some of them under tribute, and others they obliged to live peaceably with them. But the former found means, whenever the Algerine armies came to levy their taxes, to bury their grain, and such other effects as were not portable, in caves, and other safe places, whilst themselves wandered about with their flocks till their departure; which obliges the troops to carry their own provisions with them, instead of those which they expected from their vassals: but if they have the good fortune to surprize them, they make them pay their tribute double.

Those that live in villages are mostly seated about Mount Atlas; and the wandering ones in the deserts, near the kingdoms of Tunis and Fez, with which they carry on likewise a large and gainful commerce, particularly in their fine horses, which they tame, breed, and manage with exquisite dexterity (7): these likewise live in handsome tents, go finely clad, especially their women; who, besides their other finery of collars, bracelets, &c. paint their faces, necks, arms, and legs, and their fingers ends.

All of them boast themselves to be the untainted offspring of the antient Arabs, and to have preserved their mother tongue in the greatest purity. They generally are great astronomers, poets, songsters, and pastoral writers; their Cheyks themselves encouraging with honours and rewards those that excel in any of those arts, and many of them value themselves in being great proficients in them, and in their own writings, in praise of agriculture and the pastoral life, as well as of their victories, amours, and other the like favourite subjects; all which they cause to be collected into volumes, and taught in their schools.

They profess the Mohammedan religion, but with a strange mixture of superstition introduced into it by the marabouts. They take much delight in hunting of wild creatures, their country abounding with lions, leopards, bears, tigers, porcupines, ostriches, elks, stags, wild asses, and cows, of a different kind from the common tame ones. These two last they esteem a delicious food; but their most usual diet is the milk of their flocks, honey, fruits, pulse, and now and then a lamb, or kid (8). They are warlike, but have no arms, like the Algerine Turks; their most common ones are the bow, short lance, and cutlafs. Whenever they go to engage an enemy they commonly carry with them their wives, children, and family, that the fear of their being made slaves may make them fight more courageously. Most of these tribes, or adowars, live independant from any but their own chiefs; and are still a standing proof of that prediction made to Ismael, the son of Abraham (9), both with regard to his numerous posterity, and to their continuing free from any foreign yoke to the end of the world.

Of the Algerine forces; and how paid;

ALL the military officers, as well as the civil ones, from the Dey himself, down to those of the lowest rank, have no other settled salary than the soldiers closed pay, so called, because it admits of no further augmentation, and amounts to eighty saims for every two moons: they come and receive it duly at the hall of the Douwan: but every office hath some perquisites annexed to it besides, which rise and fall; such as arise from imports, exports, anchorage, the sales and ransoms of slaves, and other commerical duties. To these we may add certain donations, begun at first to gain some private ends, but since become into a settled custom; presents made to the Dey, or the Douwan, by foreign courts, or private persons, to obtain a post, or favour, or mitigate a punishment. The person who pay the former salary is the only person that is excepted; his pay amounting to 2000 patacas for officiating in that post, which lasts but two months; after which he returns to his closed pay. Those Turks that have been raised to the rank of Mazoul Aga, or to such employments as exempt them from farther services, as well as those who have been wounded or maimed in the service, have their full pay continued as long as they live, and may settle in what part of the kingdom they please; but if they quit the service without any real cause, before they have attained to that rank, they forfeit half of theirs without recovery, which seldom happens, it being reckoned dishonourable to do so, as well as for a soldier to have his pay lessened for a misdemeanor. Every soldier, besides his pay (which is at first but eight saims every two moons, but augments regularly every year by one saim, or more, according to his merit or services, and must be paid in good current coin) is allowed to follow some handicraft, merchandize, or other calling he likes, or to live quietly at his own home; but must be ever in readiness to attend the service of the state when called to it<sup>b</sup>. The discipline of the Turkish soldiery in time of war is generally strict and severe; and there is one thing in it that is highly commendable, that expressly forbids all kind of plundering during the whole time of engagement; which law is so strictly observed, that they leave that advantage to the Moors and slaves, as being not only below the dignity of a Turkish soldiery, but as an action that brands them with the utmost infamy. They have their cavalry, infantry, and artillery, as we have in Europe. Their army is commanded by an Aga, who hath a Chaya and two Chiaous under him; all of them appointed by the Dey. The infantry all march on foot, officers and soldiers, except the Bey, Aga, and Chaya, each soldier carrying only his sabre and musket, without any other incumbrance; the state furnishing horses to every tent, which holds twenty fighting men, to carry their provisions and other conveniencies. The cavalry is also distributed into tents of twenty men each, but is provided with a greater number of horses and Moors, for foraging and other services. The rout, or order of marching, is regulated by the commanding officers, till they come into an enemy's country; when the Bey, having ordered the horse and foot to unite, forms them into squadrons and battalions, each under their proper officers and standards. The van is composed of a body of infantry; the wings of two squadrons a little towards the rear: the rest of the infantry in two files, with the baggage in the middle; and two squadrons, forming two wings behind, together with a small battalion of foot behind them, make up the rear. When they engage, the baggage being left under a strong guard, a large body of infantry leads the van, with two wings of cavalry, supported by others at some distance. The main body makes the center, behind which both horse and foot retreat to rally; and out of which fresh men are draughted to reinforce the van. The post of the auxiliary Moors is near the wings, to attack as opportunity offers, or the Bey commands<sup>c</sup>. One thing that makes them fight more desperately against the Christians than any other enemy is, that those that are taken by them are never exchanged, or redeemed, but are looked upon as dead to the state; and their effects accordingly seized by it, if they have neither children nor brother to claim them<sup>d</sup>. The Algerines are still more formidable at sea; and are, indeed, more so than any other power along the coasts of Barbary; and, though they are not allowed any concern in the affairs of state, nor in the election of the Dey, yet they are held in great esteem, on account of the cruises they continually bring, which are one main source of the public revenue, and a means of procuring them respect from the Christian powers for the security of their trade. Their navy consists commonly of at least twenty ships (G); one only of which belongs to so that scarcely one half have the good luck to come back (11).

(G) The fathers of the trinity, who go thither to redeem Christian captives, make them amount to twenty-five, from eighteen to sixty guns, besides a great number of smaller vessels, or row galleys, which they equip for cruising in the summer. But these being commonly manned with Moors, made desperate by their misery, and quite unskilled in the working of them, either founder, or are stranded, if they escape being taken;

As for the twenty large ones, though their number may be increased as occasion serves, it is not suffered to be lessened; but as soon as any one is taken, or sunk, the owners are indispensibly obliged to fit out another with all convenient speed, of equal bulk and strength, that their navy may suffer no diminution (12).

- a the government, and is assigned to the admiral. She is stiled the Deylik or royal ship, hath her particular store-houses, and is fitted out in the same manner as other ships. All the rest belong to private persons, and have likewise their store-houses well provided, the captains never failing of stripping their prizes of all the conveniencies they find in them. And it is no wonder that a people, who look upon all the rest of the world as their tributaries or slaves, should be so addicted to the piratical trade, and treat their captives with such arrogance and inhumanity as they do. It must, however, be considered, that, as their country affords them but little how equipped, and kept; timber, except what is fetched as far as from the wilds of Biledulgerid, or the province of Bu-jeyab, they content themselves with making their keels and bottoms with it, and supply the
- b insides and upper works with the fragments of the prizes they make, which they carefully break up to save both timber, nails, and every thing that is of use; by which means they can build a very swift vessel at a small charge.

IT may, indeed, appear surprising, that in a country where there is so little timber, no how supplied with naval stores. masts, sails, cordage, anchors, pitch, and other necessaries, so great a number of ships can be maintained at so little trouble, or cost; but besides these supplies from their captures, our English consul, who is, it seems, the only merchant of our nation here, and carries on a more considerable trade than any other person, furnishes them with powder, balls, bombs, fire-arms, anchors, cordage, and all other naval stores; and takes in return corn and oil for the service of the garrison of Gibraltar, as it did of that of Port Mahon, when in our possession:

c no nation being allowed to carry corn out of Algiers but our own<sup>e</sup>; neither need one wonder they should pay so singular a regard to us, considering the constant supply we send among them of what is most wanted (H); and which is still a more cogent motive, thinking, that if they should give cause for a rupture with us, our cruisers would easily stop all their piratical tribe from stirring out. So that we need not fear their paying us a superior regard, as long as we are in possession of either of those important places. However, as it often happens, that reason and argument fail in this politic and tumultuous court, the only remedy is, at such junctures, to ply it well with money, castans, gold watches, and such like presents: for it is an old tried observation, that give a Turk money with one hand, and you may pluck out his eyes with the other*.

- d THE captains of those cruisers, who are generally settled officers, though excluded, as we have observed, from matters of state, have commonly a share in their ships, if they be not Cruizing captains under some restrictions. the sole owners of them, and are accordingly allowed to fit out when they please, and cruize where they will; but with this restriction, that they shall attend the service of the state when called to it, either to transport men or provisions, follow the Dey's orders, when commanded to any particular cruize, or even to serve the Grand Signor; and all this at the owner's charges. Another restraint they are under is, that they have an Aga Bachi, or some old experienced officer appointed by the Dey to act as Aga, without whose consent they can neither give chase, nor return, nor even punish sailors. At their arrival home, this Aga makes his report how the captain hath behaved; who, if found guilty of any misdemeanor is sure to be punished for it;
- e witness Mesomorto, who, though afterwards Dey, received 500 bastinadoes; and was immediately dispatched upon a new cruize to retrieve his character. In other respects they are allowed to sail whither they will, far and near; and we are told that some have gone as far as Newfoundland, and that others have ventured to take prizes in the Texel<sup>f</sup> (I).

WHEN these cruisers are returned, they must give an account of their success to the govern- Prizes how ment, which claims an eighth part of all the prizes, slaves, cargo, and vessel; the rest being disposed of.

(H) The goods imported into Algiers by us, and other Europeans, are wrought silks, gold and silver stuffs, damasks, linen and woollen cloths, spices, brasse, copper, and tin-ware, quick-silver, ammunition, and sea-stores of all sorts; cochineal, copperas, sugar, brasil and red-wood, alum, galls, vermilion, brandy, and other spirits, opium, gums, dried fruits, paper, and other less considerable articles.

In return for which we receive fine wool, ostrich feathers, skins of wild and other beasts, dates, and christian slaves.

The duties paid for goods imported by Turks, Moors, Jews, &c. are 12 1-half per cent. and those for exportation 2 1 half. But our nation, according to the treaty concluded with them, an. 1703, pay but 5 per cent. on goods imported, and 2 per cent. on those exported; which favour is likewise extended, we are told, to the French nation. Even money imported pays 5 per cent.

except that for the redemption of slaves, which pays but 3 per cent. Wine, and other spirits imported, pay four pialters per pipe; and the company of the Bajlion de France, a little island the French are possessed of on the coast of Algiers, is, we are told, allowed to send two vessels thither every year duty free (13).

(I) Their usual cruizes on the Mediterranean are in the streights of Gibraltar, the capes of Molinos, Gat Palos, Coisa and Cassa, St. Martin, and St. Sebastian; the islands of Majorca, Minorca, Iwica, and St. Peter; Genoa river, the coasts of Naples, Ecclesiastical State, Sicily, Trapan, and the Adriatic Gulph.

divided amongst the proprietors and ship's company, in such proportions as are agreed between a them: whatever is found on board these prizes that can fit their purpose they make use of, without troubling themselves whether it be proportionable or no. They do the same by the artillery they take, and range their guns without regard to their bigness or strength of their vessel. They are no less careless about the proportion of their yards, anchors, cables, and other rigging, &c. still more so in their other accomodations and provisions, having neither hammocks or chests on board, nor any other food but biscuit, water, a little rice, and such like hard fare; all which is slovenly dressed and eat. They even value themselves upon despising the nicety of the Christians, and on their being able to carry on their piratical trade without those conveniencies<sup>e</sup>. If a captain is renowned for bravery, or, which is the same with them, for being fortunate, his ship is so crouded with sailors, that he is obliged b sometimes to turn a good number of them on shore: but if he bears a different character, either for courage or fortune, he labours under a scarcity of hands, and is frequently forced to resign. One thing is remarkably singular in these Algerine cruizers; viz. that whatever passengers are in the ship at the taking of a prize, they are entitled to a share, let them be of what country or religion they will, upon a notion, that probably, by some secret direction of Providence, their success might be owing to some of them. We shall close this article of their sea forces with an account of their navy, as it was taken by the author above quoted, A. D. 1724 (K). The reader will find it in the margin; only it will be proper to apprise him, that though several of those ships ordnance are said to carry twelve, eight, and six pounders, it doth not mean that all their main battery are twelve pounders. This account, however, if right, greatly exceeds that which another author gives of the state of it but eight years after, that is, in 1732, which is a plain proof of of its vast decay since 1724. We shall give it in his own words.

The naval force of Algiers hath been for some years in a declining condition. If we except their row-boats and brigantines, they had, an. 1732, only six capital ships of the line, from 36 to 50 guns; and at the same time had not half that number of brave and experienced captains. A general peace with the three trading nations, and the impossibility of keeping up a suitable discipline, where every private soldier disputes authority with his officer, are some of the principal reasons why so small a number of vessels are fitted out, and why so few persons of merit are afterwards willing to command them. Their want, likewise, of experience, with the few engagements they have lately been concerned in at sea, have equally contributed to this diminution of their naval character. However, if by proper discipline and encouragement, they should once more assume their wonted courage and bravery, they have always in readiness such a quantity of naval stores, as will put them in a capacity of making considerable augmentations to their fleet; though at present we find them troublesome enough to the trade of Europe (16).

S E C T. II.

The division of the kingdom of Algiers.

<sup>b</sup> WE have already taken notice that this country hath undergone a great variety of divisions, according to the different lords that have ruled over it, such as Romans, Christians, Arians, Saracens, and Turks, which hath occasioned that great difference we meet with in those authors that have written at different times upon that subject. The largest of which was into the eighteen provinces we have lately given the names of, and which was made soon after that of Algiers Proper became the chief province of that kingdom; or, perhaps, rather after its putting itself under the protection of the Turks. But after the Deys of it became powerful enough to be in some measure independent from them, they contracted it into three districts, or governments, formerly mentioned <sup>a</sup>; viz. eastern, western, and southern. As, therefore, those eighteen provinces have very few towns, except their capitals, and most of these very inconsiderable, we shall content ourselves with giving our readers what is most remarkable in each of them, as we proceed with our description of those three governments; and of the province of Algiers Proper, as being in all respects the most considerable now of the whole kingdom, referring them to the map of the kingdom for their respective boundaries and situation with respect to each other.

<sup>c</sup> THE eastern, called also the Levantine government, or Beylick, contains the towns of 1. Bona; 2. Constantina; 3. Gigeri; 4. Bujeyah; 5. Stessa; 6. Tebef; 7. Zamoura; 8. Biscara; and 9. Necanz; in all which the Turks have their garrisons: besides, it includes the two antient kingdoms of Couco and Labez, though independant from the Algerine government; to whose forces their country is inaccessible, and living under that of their own Cheyks, or chiefs, chosen by each of their adowars, or hords. To these we may add a French factory at Callo, under the direction of the company of the French bastion.

<sup>d</sup> THE western government hath the towns of 1. Oran, now the residence of the Bey; 2. Tremecen, which enjoyed the advantage whilst Oran was held by the Spaniards; 3. Mastagan; 4. Tenez; and 5. Secrelly, with its castle and garrison.

As for the southern, or third government, it hath not so much as a town, village, or even house; all the inhabitants living in tents, which obliges the Bey and his forces to be always encamped. Besides the towns mentioned under the two former articles, there are some others we omit, as poor and inconsiderable, without any fort or garrison, and a great number of others that now lie in ruins <sup>b</sup>.

<sup>e</sup> THE eastern, or Levantine government is by far the most considerable of the three, not only in wealth, strength, and extent, but in the number and goodliness of its cities; of which we shall now give some account, reserving the description of the metropolis for another section. The first is that of Bona, once the capital of the province under the kingdom of Constantina of its name, and supposed to be the antient Hippo, once the seat of the great St. Austin, and a sea port, built by the Romans (A). It was formerly rich and populous*, but is now poorly

(A) The inhabitants, however, deny it to be the antient Hippo, which had been so often taken, retaken, and destroyed by the wars; and pretend it to have been since built at the distance of two or three miles from it with the old ruins, and called Baleud-el Ugued, from a sort of trees of that name, that grow in great numbers in its neighbourhood; which is, indeed, the most probable of the two (1).

The remains of the antient Hippo, we are told, by an accurate examiner of them (2), spread themselves over a neck of land between the rivers Boojemah, over which is a bridge of Roman workmanship, and the Sci-boufe on a flat land, often overflowed, but gradually raiseth itself to a considerable elevation. The ruins are about half a league in circuit, and consist only of broken walls, cillerns, and the fragments of the convent above-mentioned.

built, and thinly inhabited, and hath scarcely any traces of its former grandeur, except the ruins of a cathedral, or, as others guess, of a monastery, built by that prelate, about three miles distance from it; among which is a marble statue, said to be his; but so mutilated and defaced, that no traces of either features or dress are remaining. Near these ruins is a famed spring, called by his name, much resorted to by French and Italian sailors, who come to drink of its water, and pay their devotion to the maimed statue, which becomes daily more so by their striving to break off some splinter, or scrape some part of it by way of relick. Bona was taken by the pirate Barbarossa, and joined to his new kingdom of Algiers, but was soon after recovered by its former owners the Tunisens, and as soon lost again by them. It is commanded by a little fort, in which is a garrison of about 300 Turks, under the command of an Aga, who is also governor of the town. The road for the ships is good for nothing before the town (B), but a little farther west, towards the Genoese fort, it is very deep and safe. The country about it, and in great part of the province, abounds in corn, fruit, and bread, and great quantities of small and large cattle; but they are much exposed to the incursions of the plundering Arabs<sup>c</sup>.

2. Constantina, the Cirta Julia, and Cirta Numidie of the Romans<sup>a</sup>, and since called Constantina, in honour of a daughter of Constantine the great, who rebuilt it with great magnificence<sup>e</sup>, and now by the Moors Cusuntin, or Cucutin, is the capital of the province of its name, and the only one remaining of it. It is commodiously situated, about forty-eight miles from the sea, upon a kind of peninsular promontory, inaccessible on all sides, except on the south west. 'Tis computed about a mile in circumference, inclining a little to the southward, but ending to the northward, in a precipice of at least 100 fathoms perpendicular; but yielding a most beautiful prospect from a great variety of mountains, vales, and rivers, which lie before, and at some distance from it<sup>f</sup>. The town is well fortified, and abounds with noble relicks of antiquity, which give one an idea of its pristine grandeur, when it was the capital of Mauritania Cæsariensis; such as a great variety of cisterns, aqueducts, porticos, gates, triumphal arches, &c. of curious stone and workmanship, we have no room to dwell upon. The bridge over the river Rummel is likewise a noble piece of art; a little below which is a natural curiosity no less worth admiring; viz. that river running through a subterraneous passage made in the solid rock, designedly laid open in several places for the convenience of drawing water, and cleansing the chanel; and, after running about a quarter of a mile in a northern direction, falls from its subterraneous course into a large cascade. The highest part of the city being just over that place, they continue still to throw their great criminals thence into it. Near this cascade is likewise a fine transparent spring of hot waters, which swarms with tortoises, which the ignorant women fancy to be devils, and to be the authors of all their diseases<sup>g</sup>. In this city the Bey of the eastern government hath his residence, and maintains a guard of 300 Spahis, or Turkish horse, and 1500 Moors, at his own charge; these troops not being on the Algerine establishment<sup>h</sup>. The inhabitants are wealthy and proud, yet brave. The adjacent mountains, which traverse this district, are inhabited by a warlike, yet civilized people, who follow several sorts of trades, besides furnishing this and other towns with variety of fruits and provisions. They are so numerous as to be able to raise a body of 30 or 40,000 men upon any dislike taken at the Bey of Constantina, or any other occasion. One misfortune is, that they have no fire arms, but only lances and arrows; and another, that they are often at war with each other, and chiefly on account of their wives; who, when they are weary of their husbands, or ill used by them, commonly flee from one ridge to another in quest of a new one, and carry off with them what jewels, coin, and other valuable effects they can lay their hands on<sup>i</sup>.

NEAR the city, towards the sea coast, are the ruins of Colo, a Roman colony, with a castle on a very high rock, and a garrison under an Aga's command; adjacent to which is a small French factory, protected by the Dey; the factor of which deals with the Moors for hides, wax, and wool. The mountains of Colo abound with a large and fierce kind of monkeys, which the Moors have the art to catch at any time, but never do it, unless they are sure of getting a good price for them. On the same coast are seen the ruins of the antient city of Stora, which

(B) Doctor Shaw tells us, that the continual discharging of ballast into the road, and the neglect of cleansing the port, which came to the very walls, is the cause of both being become so unsafe and incommodious, though it might, with proper care and encouragement, be so far remedied, as to make the town one of the most flourishing in all Barbary (3).

a hath a convenient bay, where the Genosse, and after them the French, began their African trade, which hath been since improved by the company of the French bastion.

CONSTANTINA continued the residence of kings ever since the Arabian conquest of Africa, till an. 1520, when Barbarossa, being become master of Algiers and Colo, the inhabitants, in order to recover their commerce, which had been ruined by it, submitted to him, and have continued to be an Algerine province ever since <sup>k</sup>.

b 3. Gigeri, al Jigel, the Igilgili of the antients *, but now only a poor village, consisting of about 1500 mean houses, and commanded by an old small fort, with a garrison, which lies <sup>3. Gigeri described.</sup> on the sea coast between Bona and Bujeyab, about fifteen miles from each, and a little beyond the cape that formeth the eastern boundary of the gulph of Bujeyab, or Bujeiab, to whose kingdom it formerly belonged. The fort is situate on a high steep rock, projecting into the sea, and, by its position, forming a two-fold harbour, one on the east, and the other on the west. The inhabitants being mostly of the wandering kind, this territory hath neither town <sup>Territory.</sup> nor any other village.

c WITHIN this precinct, which borders on the Numidian deserts, stands the famed Mount Araz, stretching itself between twenty-five and thirty leagues in length from north to south, and every-where very difficult of access. The inhabitants of it are a race of Arabs, called Cabeylezen, a warlike people, who made this ridge the last refuge of their liberty, and <sup>Arabs who inhabit the high mountains;</sup> have preserved it ever since by the natural strength of their precipices. Before the year 1664 they used to traffick with the French factory at Gigeri, and brought thither hides, corn, and wax. But a war breaking out at that time between France and Algiers, the duke of Bedford being admiral, he was ordered to build a fort on the sea coast, to be a check upon those Arabs. The work was no sooner begun, than they came down with a design to attack him, and obliged him to put to sea; which he had no sooner done, than they beat the French out of Gigeri, demolished their fort, and made 400 of them prisoners, besides those that were slain in the fight; since which time they have plundered all strangers that are wrecked upon those coasts, and make slaves of them without distinction, even though they belong to nations in friendship <sup>drive the French out of Gigeri; plunder all ships wrecked on their coasts.</sup> with Algiers and the Porte. The Mohammedans are the only ones that are discharged, and sent home with a small viaticum: neither can the Dey save any of the wreck to the owners by his authority, or by any other way than a friendly composition <sup>l</sup>. We may have occasion

d to give some instances of these depredations when we come to the historical part. But this coast is almost the only one in the kingdom where they cannot be suppressed, by reason of the inaccessible situation of the inhabitants; in other parts the government takes particular care of those nations that are in friendship with it; and, if any of their ships chance to be treated in the same hostile way, a complaint of it is no sooner brought before the Dey, but the strictest enquiry is made after the offenders; who, if caught, are not only made to refund the ill-gotten plunder, but severely punished according to the nature of the crime.

e 4. Bugia, or, as the Africans write it, Boojeiab, the supposed Saldæ of Strabo (C), built <sup>4. Bugia;</sup> by the Romans <sup>m</sup>, and once the capital of a kingdom of its name, hath a handsome sea port, <sup>its port,</sup> formed by a narrow neck of land running into the sea: a great part of whose promontory was formerly faced with a wall of hewn stone; where was likewise an aqueduct, which supplied the port with water, by discharging it into a capacious basin; all which lie now in ruins; and the tomb of Seedy Busgree, one of the tutelar saints of the place, is the only thing remaining that is remarkable in it.

f As to the city itself, it is built upon the ruins of a large one, at the foot of a high mountain <sup>city,</sup> that looks towards the north-east; a great part of whose walls run up quite to the top of it; where there is also a castle that commands the whole town, besides two others at the bottom, <sup>castles,</sup> built for a security to the port. The inhabitants drive a considerable trade in plough-shares, <sup>trade,</sup> mattocks, and other such iron tools, which they manufacture from the adjacent mines. The town is watered by a large river, which Marmol and Dapper call Huet el Quibir, or the great <sup>river.</sup> river; and which is supposed to be the Nasava of Ptolemy <sup>n</sup>, as it empties itself into the sea a little to the eastward, after it hath received a great number of rivulets into its stream (D). The place

(C) This supposition we have formerly ventured to dissent from (4), on account of the distance which the Itinerarium computes to be between Saldæ and Igilgili; viz. 93 miles: whereas Boojeiab is but thirteen leagues from Jijel, the supposed Igilgili of the Romans. Nothing is more uncertain than these kind of conjectures at the best; yet, as so many authors seem to concur in them, it cannot be taken amiss of us, if we acquaint our readers with them, as well as with the difficulties that may be raised against them, and leave it to every one's judgment to determine on either side.

(D) Marmol, who likewise calls it Zinganor (5), adds, that whilst it belonged to the Christians, the mouth of it was so choaked up with mud and sand, that no vessel place is populous, and hath a considerable market for iron work, oil, and wax, which is carried on with great tranquillity; but is no sooner over than the whole place is in an uproar; so that the day seldom concludes without some flagrant instance of rapine and barbarity<sup>o</sup>.

5. Steffa;

5. STEFFA, called by Marmol Testelza, and by Grammay Distefa, is situated on the south of Bujeyah, about twenty leagues from it, and fifteen from the sea, on the road from Fez to Tunis<sup>p</sup>, in a fruitful valley, which extends itself as far as the mountain of Labez. It was destroyed by the Arabs; so that it retains nothing now of its pristine grandeur, but the sad remains of its once spacious and stately walls of square stone of a prodigious size: and the inhabitants, amounting to about 300 families, are as miserable and poor as any under the Turkish dominions.

its ruins and misery.

6. Tebef.

6. TEBEF hath been likewise a large and flourishing city under the Romans, but lies now in as poor a condition as Steffa<sup>q</sup>.

7. Zamora.

7. ZAMORA, the supposed Azama of Ptolemy, is sunk as low as any of the two former, through the Turkish tyranny, and is commanded by a fort built by the Algerine government: it is, nevertheless, reckoned one of the most fertile places in all Barbary for corn and pasturage. It hath a market every Monday, to which the Arabs, &c. resort in great numbers to sell their commodities<sup>r</sup>.

8. Biscara taken by the Algerines;

8. BISCARA belonged to the province of Zeb in Numidia, which lies south of the kingdom of Labez; but the Algerines, in their annual inroads to carry off slaves, made themselves masters of it, to open a more easy passage into the southern provinces. It retains still some remains of the antient city that gave name to this territory, and hath a garrison to keep the inhabitants in awe, who lead a wandering life in their tents, and are they who usually bring lions, tigers, and other wild beasts, which they have the art of taming, for sale to strangers. The city of Algiers is never without a great number of Biscarans, who are employed in the hardest and lowest offices, as cleansing of streets, emptying of vaults, sweeping of chimnies, and carrying of burdens; and when they have got about ten or twelve crowns by this drudgery, they return to their country, where they are respected as worthy men, on account of the scarcity of coin among them, they being reckoned the most miserable of all the Arabian tribes in this kingdom<sup>s</sup>.

9. Necauz a delightful town, but running into decay.

THE last place in this eastern government worth notice is Necauz, reckoned one of the pleasantest towns in Barbary, situate about twenty leagues south of Steffa, near a pleasant river, whose banks are adorned with a great variety of trees and other delightful verdure. The figs here are esteemed the finest in all Afric; and when dried are bought up far and near at a good price. The territory on each side is fertile in corn, and other conveniencies of life. In the town stands a most stately mosk; and not far from it a large college, well endowed, for the instruction of the Turkish youth. The inhabitants are civil and sociable; and the women very beautiful; the houses neat, though but one story high; and the gardens adorned with all sorts of fruits and odoriferous verdure. It had hospitals, and a variety of baths, and other conveniencies; all which dwindle gradually through the tyranny of the Turkish government<sup>t</sup>.

THE territory of Bujeyah, like that of Gigeri, is encompassed with high mountains, whose cantons are distinguished by the names of Beni-jubar, Auraz, and Labez, and are inhabited by some of the most antient tribes of Arabians, Moors, and Saracens. The greatest part of them have been used, from time immemorial, to distinguish themselves by a cross marked on one of their hands; and some, out of a greater regard to that custom, will have one stamped on each cheek; but can give no other reason for it than a constant tradition from their ancestors (E).

THE mountains of Beni-jubar lie about twenty miles south of Bujeyah, and extend themselves along the coast a considerable way, both in length and breadth, and are part of the little Atlas. They are very steep and rugged, and from them flow a great number of springs. They abound could come into it. But that after Salharres had made himself master of it, the rains that fell in great abundance in that year did so thoroughly clear it up, that some of their largest vessels have been able to enter it ever since, and ride safe in it from storms, and from every wind but the north.

(E) It is probable, however, that this custom began when the Vandals became masters of this country, who treating the Christians every where with particular lenity, induced them either to become Christians, or at least to endeavour to pass for such, by assuming that symbol of their religion, shewing of which might be a kind of safe-guard against the insults of the ravaging soldiers; so that the signature is still preserved among them, though the occasion of it is quite forgot (6); unless we will suppose, that they really became Christians under the Vandal government, and retained the cross as a kind of superstitious relic or charm, after they turned Mohammedans.

(6) Dapper's Algiers, Tassy, lib. i. c. 9.

a with fruit trees, especially walnuts and figs; produce plenty of barley, with which the inhabitants feed their numerous herds. The people are warlike, and live under a chief of their own: some of them are excellent archers: and the whole ridge hath here and there villages, inhabited by the tribe or people whose name it bears <sup>u</sup>.

LABEZ is another ridge belonging to the little Atlas, and extends itself from that of Beni-jubar to the eastern kingdom of Couco, and is inhabited by a stout sort of people, who much resemble them in their manners and way of life; but are however, subject to a tribute to the Dey of Algiers, consisting chiefly in horses, which those of Couco are not. Labez is neither fertile in corn nor fruits; its chief produce is a sort of reed or rush, of which they manufacture the beautiful Arabian mats, called in the language Labez; from which this kingdom or canton b hath its name <sup>w</sup>.

THE ridge or canton of Auraz, or Eures, as the Turks pronounce it, is another part of the Atlas, extending itself southward of Constantina quite to Biledulgerid, and consists of a large group or knot of hills, running into one another, and intersected by small plains and vallies; the length about 30 leagues <sup>x</sup>, or, as a modern traveller computes it, about 120 miles in circuit <sup>y</sup>. Both tops and bottoms are very fertile, and still continue to be the garden of the kingdom. Some springs there are, which, coming down from the hills, form a kind of salt marshes, which the sun dries up in summer, and converts into salt. The inhabitants are fierce and warlike, and live chiefly by robbing and murdering of travellers; and so fond were they once of their liberty, that they would suffer no stranger to be among them, lest they should learn the passes c and avenues leading to their abodes; and so impatient are they now, since the Algerines have deprived them so far of it as to bring them under tribute, that it requires no less than forty of their military stations to oblige them to pay it; every year the Bey comes at the head of his flying camp to extort it from them <sup>z</sup>.

THE last canton worth notice under this eastern government is called Couco, or Cuco, and by the Marseillians Couque; and hath its name from the mountain at the foot of which the metropolis stood, or perhaps from the city itself (F), once the seat of a kingdom, adorned with noble buildings, particularly with the palace of its princes, who had greatly signalized themselves by their exploits in Spain. It was situated in a triangular position, southward of Algiers and Bujeyah, about 36 miles from the former, and 20 from the latter, at the foot of the mountain, surrounded at the bottom with steep rocks, which served it as a strong defence, and on the top with a great number of farms and villages, very populous and rich; one of which, called Gemahaxabarix, at the foot of the same mountain, contained five hundred houses, and had a large market every Friday, resorted to by a vast concourse of the neighbouring people. The princes held likewise a port on the sea coast called Tamagus, between Bujeyah and Algier, from which the city, consisting of above fifteen hundred houses, drove a considerable commerce of hides, wax, and honey, with that of Marseilles. The access to it was very difficult and dangerous, there being but one way to come at it, through such narrow and rugged defiles, that a handful of men could have overwhelmed an enemy's army with stones; besides which the city was fortified with strong high walls, on that side where it is less guarded by the rocks <sup>1</sup>. In this flourishing condition it continued under its princes, till the beginning of the 17th century, when the king of Couco, then in alliance with that of Spain, ceded the port of Tamagus to him, which the Algerines, however, made themselves masters of not long after; and, in order to put an effectual end to the clandestine intrigues between that prince and Spain, destroyed his metropolis, ravaged the plains about it, and obliged him and his subjects to flee to the mountains. However, both the city and kingdom of Couco had, by reason of its vicinity to Algiers, and the inaccessibility of its mountains, been looked upon by the Turks as a thorn in their sides, because it was a kind of sure refuge to their enemies, criminals of state, &c.; and even some of their Deys, when they apprehend any danger either

(F) Marmol tells us accordingly, that the true name of this mountain, or knot of mountains, was Eguili-andus, and Dapper Eguilu-Andalus; and both of them describe it as very steep and craggy. The lower parts of it are fertile in wheat, and the upper in barley; both abound with good pasturage, and breed vast quantities of cattle and bees, of which they drive a great commerce with Marseilles. Their mountains have some iron mines, which they fabricate into swords, daggers, lances,

&c. and have an excellent way of hardening it, so as to be but little inferior to steel (2). They have also, in some parts, mines of salt-petre, of which they make gunpowder, being supplied with brimstone by the French merchants. Their country abounds likewise with olives, raisins, and figs, in the latter of which their king's revenue chiefly consisted; and was affirmed by the Marseillians, who traded thither, to have amounted to 700,000 crowns (3).

from the Porte or other quarter, or when wearied with the load of government, do usually flee thither; and, if any of them can be so fortunate as to reach those recesses, they are sure to live in safety and ease, or may wait for an opportunity to remove to some other asylum. Hence it is, that the Algerine government made so many vain attempts against the kingdom; and even after they had destroyed its capital, and driven its prince farther off among the mountains, yet they never could bring the brave inhabitants under any tribute, tho' the Deys have left no means or stratagem untried to do it (G). The inhabitants are distinguished by the names of Arabians, Bereberes, and Azagues, and value themselves chiefly on preserving themselves from the Turkish yoke, tho' they are obliged to buy their independency with the loss of their wealth; so that from being once some of the richest people of all the inland countries, in horses, cattle, grain, and fruits, to say nothing of their iron manufacture, mentioned in the last note, nor of that of their linen and cotton stuffs, &c. they are sunk into the extremest indigence and poverty, avoiding all commerce with their neighbours, lest that should give a handle to the Algerines to bring them into the same slavish state to which they have reduced the rest of the Arabs and Moors of Barbary<sup>b</sup>. And thus much may suffice for their eastern government.

government,
and its capital
Oran.

THE second Algerine government is stiled the western, and hath now the city of Oran (H) for its capital, or residence of its Bey, a place formerly of great repute, containing 6000 houses, mostly inhabited by weavers and clothiers, and much resorted to by Catalonian, Genoese, and Venetian merchants. It had several stately mosks, besides hospitals, baths, caravanseras, and other public buildings; but is now much reduced from its grandeur and extent, and about a mile in circuit, but is the best fortified on all sides<sup>c</sup> in the kingdom, Algiers excepted. It is situate on the sea coast, upon the declivity and pretty near the foot of a high mountain, which overlooks it, upon the ridge of which are built two castles that command the town. About a furlong west of the mountain stands a third castle, on a higher situation than the two former, with a large valley between them; so that their respective ridges are so remarkably disunited, that they not only form a most convenient landmark, but render all the approaches from the latter to the former impracticable. To the south and south-east of the town are two other castles erected, on the level with the lower part of it, but severed from it by a deep winding valley, which serves as a natural trench to the south side of the place. A little rivulet, formed by a small spring of excellent water, at about three furlongs distance from the town, and conforming its course to the windings of the valley, furnishes the city with plenty of that element; near the spring stands another castle, which forbids all approaches of an enemy; and, at the same time that it guards the matamors or subterranean depositories of corn, digged under it, is an important defence to the city<sup>d</sup>.

Taken by, and
the Spaniards.

It is most likely, however, that most of these fortifications were built since the Algerines retook this important place from the Spaniards, an. 1708, after it had continued in their hands above 200 years (I); during which time the residence of the Bey was at Tremecen. For they

(G) It will not be amiss to apprise our readers here of a strange mistake of the late French writer of the history of the African Sharifs, who, having taken his account of this city, and kingdom of Couco (as he hath done that of several others), verbatim almost from Marmol's history of Afric, hath described both of them in the flourishing state they were in when that author wrote, without considering how low the various changes and catastrophes above-mentioned must have, since that time, reduced them from their prilline state; so little dependence there is to be had on those copyists, rather than historians (3).

(H) Oran is called by the Africans, Gubaran, by other writers, Maduran, Auran, Aeran, and Horan by Marmol and Lauger Tassy (4); the former of whom believes it to be the Unica Colonia of the Romans. Dr. Shaw, who writes it Warran, derives it from the Arabic I'ab-ar, importing a place of steep or difficult access, (5) answerable to its situation.

(I) The Spaniards, in the year 1505, when the famed cardinal Ximenes was prime minister to Ferdinand V. did by his advice, and under his direction, get possession of this important place, as it was then the staple of a very considerable commerce for slaves, corn, oil, wax, honey, hides, and other African commodities; and as it had likewise the village and road of Marsalquibir, or great harbour, the Portus Magnus of the antients, at a small league distance west from it, under its jurisdiction, which is reckoned one of the most capacious havens in the world.

The reason or pretence for the Spaniards seizing on Oran, was, that they were become opulent and powerful enough to venture to cruise upon their coasts. They had long before that time inured themselves to the piratic trade, by the constant wars they sustained against the kings of Tremecen, or Tlemsan, who wanted to set a governor of their own over them; whereas they pleaded their antient privilege against it, and the right of chusing their annual judges and magistrates, both civil and criminal, from among themselves, and to admit only of a receiver of the customs from the Tremecen court. This was the state of the Oraners, when the Spanish fleet came and made themselves masters of the port of Marsalquibir, and after that of their capital.

- a no sooner made themselves masters of it, than they applied their utmost care to secure it from future attacks, and ordered the Bey to come and reside in it; where, besides a strong garrison, he is obliged to maintain in pay 2000 Coulolies, and 1500 Moors, at his own charge, and to have them always in his retinue. About two leagues south of Oran are the ruins of an antient city called Batha, which was destroyed by the wars that raged between the African powers about the beginning of the seventh century, and is now remarkable only for a little chapel, built in memory of a Marabout, who lived among these ruins, and by his singular beneficence and hospitality to poor travellers of all sorts, got at length rich enough, by the presents sent him by the wealthy, to maintain 500 disciples, whose employment was to go through a long litany of all the divine attributes by the help of their beads, at certain hours of the day alternately; but whose sect is now upon the decline, as many others are, since their commerce with Europe hath brought all such superstitious fooleries into contempt among them. But the Arabs still call the place by his name, Cena's Plain<sup>a</sup>.

Tremecen, formerly Telensin, Telemicen, and by the Arabs Tlem-Son, once the metropolis of one of the greatest kingdoms in Mauritania Cæsariensis, is situate about 10 leagues from the sea, and 30 south west of Oran, and five south-south-east of the mouth of the Tafna, upon a rising ground, below a range of rocky precipices, upon which runs a slip of level ground, that bursts out with a great number of springs, which, uniting into one small stream, form a variety of cascades in its descent towards the city. The town is surrounded by a strong wall, forty cubits high, flanked with towers, and made of mortar composed of sand, lime, and small pebbles, which being cast in a frame, and afterwards well tempered and dried, have acquired a solidity and strength equal to that of stone. The several stages and removes of these frames being still observable: some of them appear to have been 100 yards long, and two in height and thickness<sup>c</sup>. The gates of the city, which are five in number, have drawn-bridges before them, with other fortifications, to defend them. It hath besides a strong spacious castle built in the modern way, with courts, halls, and handsome barracks, for the Janizaries. Its stately wall. Castle, and other public buildings.

WHILST it was the capital of the kingdom, it was divided into several wards, two of which were still distinguishable in Edrisi's time, and might be considered as two cities, of an oblong square figure, inclosed each within its own walls<sup>f</sup>, the two containing, in the year 1562, no less than 25,000 houses well built, with large streets, and a vast number of public buildings of noble structure, particularly five large square colleges, built after the Italian manner, besides baths, hospitals, &c. in great numbers<sup>e</sup>, of all which little is now left but its fortifications, and some noble ruins (1), the place having been almost destroyed by Hassan, Dey of Algiers, Destroyed by the Algerines. an. 1670, as a punishment for the disaffection of its then inhabitants; so that there is now scarcely a sixth part remaining of this so famed metropolis, and nursery of arts and sciences, which is computed to have been about four miles in circuit<sup>b</sup>. It hath suffered no less in the destruction of its public structures; insomuch, that out of 150 mosks there remain no more than eight, each with a tower of the doric order adorned with marble columns; of 160 public baths there are but four now left. The Jews had there ten synagogues, and those hardly sufficient for them, all which are gone to decay<sup>i</sup>; the city being now inhabited by none but Arabs, Moors, and Jews, most of them very poor, except the garrison of Turks; and running still into greater decay ever since the removal of the Bey and his court to Oran, of which we gave an account in the last article.

In which expedition they brought away, among other booty, about 20,000 Christian captives. However, from that time, Oran decayed sensibly every way, and hath done so much more, since it fell under the tyranny of the Algerines (6); so that the only improvement it hath received from these is its fortifications; for though some of them appear still to be of the old fashion, especially the castle that stands on the uppermost ridge, and the easternmost of those that lie before the town, yet the other three are regular polygons of the modern kind (7), and so are some other fortifications added on the sea side; which shews of what importance they esteem this place to be to them, and what a loss the Spaniards had in its being taken from them (8).

(1) Among those curiosities that are still to be seen here, one of the most remarkable is a large basin, of Moorish workmanship, two hundred yards long, and about fifty in breadth. The inhabitants have a tradition, that the kings of Tremecen were used to take the diversion of the water, and the subjects taught the art of navigation upon it. But our curious traveller thinks it rather to have been designed for a large reservoir, either in case of a siege, or at all other times very useful to refresh the great number of gardens and fine plantations below it; which is no improbable conjecture, considering that the course of the water of the river, which supplies the city from the adjacent mountains, might be easily cut off, or turned, by a besieging enemy, as had been observed long before by another judicious author (9).

- Mostagan. ABOUT 20 leagues east of Oran is the town of Mostagan, al. Mostaganin, Musty Gannim, the a Cartenna of Pliny and Ptolemy (K). It is built in the form of a theatre, with a full prospect
Its situation and strength. of the sea; and, in every other direction, surrounded with hills which hang over it. In one of the vacant spaces, about the middle of it, are the remains of an old Moorish castle, which, by its fashion, appears to have been built before the invention of fire arms. The north-west corner of the city, which overlooks the port, is surrounded with a wall of hewn stone, and hath another castle built in a more regular manner, and defended by a Turkish garrison. But all these being overlooked by the adjacent hills above-mentioned, the chief security of the place
Citadel. lies in the citadel, which is built upon one of those eminences, and commands both the city and country <sup>k</sup>. The town is well supplied with water, and its haven is commodious and safe.
Mount Magaraba. Behind it runs mount Magaraba, so called from the Magarabas who inhabit it, and are de- b scended from the Bereberes. This mount extends about ten leagues from east to west along the Mediterranean coast. These Magarabas live in tents, feed a great quantity of flocks, and pay 12,000 crowns yearly to the Dey of Algiers <sup>l</sup>.
- Tenez. SEVEN leagues east of Mostagan, and about the mid-way between Oran and Algiers, stands the city of Tenez, upon the foot of a hill, and about a league from the sea, where it hath a convenient port. Tenez and its territory were once subject to the kings of Tremecen; but, taking advantage of its intestine broils, set up a kingdom of their own, independent of that; which proved only a short-lived one, and became soon after a prey to the Algerines, who have kept a strong garrison in it ever since; the governor of it resides in the castle, which was once the royal palace. The territory about it is very fertile in corn, fruits, and pasturage, and produces c honey, wax, &c. Marmol supposes this place to be the Laguntum, and Sanut the Tipasa, of Ptolemy; but we have already shewn in the antient history, that the obscure village of Tefessad is the antient Tipasa <sup>m</sup>.
- Sargel or Sarcely. THE last Algerine garrison in this western government is Sherfshel, al. Sargel, or, as Tassy calls it, Sercelles, a poor ruined town, on the sea coast, about eight leagues west of Algiers, remarkable only for its harbour for small vessels <sup>n</sup>, and its Turkish garrison (L).
- The southern, or third Algerine government, hath no cities, but only itinerant villages. THE southern district, or third government of the Algerine kingdom, is altogether without any walled cities, though there are to be seen here and there the ruins of some noble ones; among which some few troops take their quarters, and form a small kind of gar- d rison to keep the inhabitants of these wild tracts in awe. These live altogether in tents, and are divided into Hords, or Adouars, each of which forms a kind of itinerant village under their respective chiefs, chosen from among themselves, and change their habitations according to the season, or as the convenience of pasture and agriculture requires. They commonly feed great numbers of cattle small and great, besides their horses, and other

(K) Or rather Carthæne in the plural, for so Ptolemy writes it, though Pliny gives it in the singular; and it is not unlikely that this, and Masagran, which lies a small league from it, and in the same direction with the antient Cartenna and Arsenaria, now Arsene, and the same distance which the Itinerarium gives them, may have been formerly but one colony or community; and hence the first of these authors might give it a singular, and the other a plural name (10). Marmol, indeed, takes Masagran to be the Portus Deorum of the latter, but brings no proof for it (11); and the former opinion seems to us the best founded of the two.

(L) We cannot omit the antient and famed city of Teffare, or, as it was called by the Romans, Cæsarea, which, though at present reduced to a heap of ruins, and consequently no Turkish garrison, yet, being situate within this western government, well deserves our notice, as well on account of its having given birth to several eminent philosophers and poets, and of its having been formerly one of the most populous and opulent cities of Afric, as for some curious relics of its former grandeur. The Africans call it Tiguident, or Deg-dent, that is, the antient city. It was situate on a bay, a mile eastward of Sargel, between it and Algiers, and appears from its ruins to have been three leagues in circuit.

It was built by the antient Africans, and embellished by the Romans, and afterwards by the princes of the Idrisian line. It was at length totally destroyed by Abdalla the son of Mohadin, and its inhabitants most inhumanly butchered, an. 959 (12). We are told, that a famed Marabout rebuilt it afterwards, so as to contain 13,000 houses (13); but at present nothing is left of it, but the ruins of its walls, and two antient heathen temples, the dome of one of which is of such a height, that a ship may be seen from it twenty leagues off, and on the land side, over the plains of Meticha, above sixteen leagues.

The Moors call this temple Coborurnia, or Roman sepulchre; it is built of large square stones, and is inclosed all around. Our author adds, that an attempt was made to destroy it in 1555, in hopes of finding some hidden treasure. But the Christian slaves, who were ordered to demolish it, had scarce loosed some of the stones, than they were stung to death by a swarm of black venomous wasps, that came out of the holes, which put an end to that design (14).

East of this place is a vast forest, called by the inhabitants the bad wife, or woman, full of cedar, cork, poplar, laurel, box, and other trees; it supplies the city with all the timber they want for building their ships, houses, and for other uses, but is not allowed to be cut down without leave from the government.

- a beasts of burden, which carry their portable hamlets from place to place. We have already given some account of their religion, way of living, &c. at the beginning of this chapter<sup>o</sup>; and of their antiquity, origin, and various tribes, &c. in our antient history<sup>p</sup>; and to pretend to describe their respective countries, and settle their various limits, would be as endless as superfluous in a work of this nature. It will be sufficient to say, that the greatest part of these districts or cantons, being so many branches of mount Atlas, are bespangled with high hills, intersected by vallies, and some of them by wide sandy deserts, all of them more or less fertile according to the nature of the soil, and plenty or scarcity of water that is found in them; some of them, especially in the more southern parts, along the confines of the Sabara, or great desert, and in the countries of Zab and Mezzab, being destitute of
- b that element, except what they get out of wells, which they are forced to dig wherever they pitch their tents; and of these some are so salt and brackish, and others impregnated with such distasteful minerals, that nothing but necessity can reconcile men to the use of them<sup>q</sup>. All these nations in general are obliged to pay a kind of tribute to Algiers, who pay a tribute to Algiers, but not without being forced to it by the Bey's troops, which many of them are careful to avoid, when the time of his visiting them draws near, by removing their stations to some inaccessible parts, where he cannot come near them without danger. But, whenever any of these fugitives are afterwards caught, as they often are by surprize, he never fails making them pay double all their arrears, or making an equivalent number of them slaves, whom he sends to Algiers. In that metropolis, we are told, are great numbers of Beni-Mezzab, (a tribe which,
- c by their situation and swarthy complexion, are supposed to be the descendants of the Melano Gætulians, or Nigritiæ, described in our antient history)<sup>r</sup>, who are exempt from paying any tribute to that government; but have been from time immemorial the only persons employed in the slaughter-houses of that city<sup>s</sup>.

THE standing forces which the Bey, or governor of this southern province, keeps on foot at his own charge are inconsiderable; consisting only of 100 Spahis, or Turkish horse, and 500 Moors. With these he and his court are always incamped in some canton or other, after the manner of the inhabitants. But, when the return of the year comes for them to go and levy the usual tribute, he generally receives a considerable reinforcement from the Dey, and may raise contributions in Biledulgerid, whenever he can, either by force or stratagem, open himself a d way thro' the narrow passes that lead into that country<sup>t</sup>.

A description of the city of Algiers, the metropolis of the kingdom.

- e HAVING gone thro' the description of the three provinces or governments, into which the kingdom of Algiers is divided, we come now to give an account of its famed me- The city of Algiers de- tropolis; a city which for several ages hath braved the greatest powers in Christendom, and hath scribed; been the constant residence of the Dey and court, the post of the main body of the Turkish soldiery, the station of the navy, and the center of government, and of the military force of the state. We have, at the beginning of this chapter, given the etymology of its present name Algezair, or rather (as it should be pronounced) Al-Jezeir, or Al-Jezerab<sup>a</sup>; that is, as the Arabic word imports, the island, because there was an island before the city, to which it hath been since joined by a mole. In their public letters and records they stile it Al Jezeire Megerbie, Other names, or the western Al Jezeir, to distinguish it from another of the same name near the *Dardanel*s.
- f And the Arabians call it to this day Gazeira-Al-Bene-Mosgana, from an Arabian prince called Mosgana who had formerly subdued it, or, as Marmol will have it, was the founder of it<sup>b</sup>. But we may safely affirm it to be of a much antienter date; and tho' authors differ much about The antient its origin, some supposing it the antient Rufurum, or Rufueurum, others the Salda, others the Iohum. Jol, or Julia Casariensis, built in honour of Augustus, we hope we have sufficiently proved it in our antient history<sup>c</sup> to have been no other than the antient Icosium, placed in the itinerary at 47 miles from Tipasa, which is farther confirmed by the reverend traveller often quoted in this chapter<sup>d</sup>.

ALGIERS is situate between Buieyab on the east, and Tenez on the west, in 36° 30' north latitude, and 34° 15' east longitude; and is washed on the north and north-east side by the Its fine prospect.

Mediterranean, over which it hath a full prospect, being built on the declivity of a hill, upon a which the houses rise so gradually above one another, that there is hardly one in the whole city but enjoys a full view of it in one or other of those directions; whilst, by the advantage of that declivity, and the whiteness of the terrasses, the city yields a beautiful prospect towards the sea, and at a distance appears like a whetster's ground covered over with linen, in the form of an amphitheatre. Its bigness is variously computed, even by the two most recent authors who have been there, the one gives it a league, and the other but half of that circumference<sup>e</sup>. Others give its walls a still larger circuit<sup>f</sup>; their height thirty feet on the upper, and forty at the lower end towards the sea; that it may the better resist the violence of its waves, they are twelve feet thick, and flanked with square towers, but all so decayed as to be of small defence, unless where they are secured by some additional out- b work. They are surrounded with a ditch twenty feet wide, and seven deep, but now almost filled up with mud, except in some parts where they are of little consequence. The walls have some jettings out, with port holes, but few or no cannon belonging to them; so that its strength chiefly depends on its outward fortifications.

THE city hath six gates open, each of them guarded by some outwork, and some others are now walled up. The open ones are, 1. Alcassava, or rather Bab Cassaubab, built upon the highest part of the city, and forming the western angle of it. It is of an octogonal figure, and hath proper embrasures on every side. 2 The Bahjideed, or new gate, fronting the south. 3. Bab Azoone in the same direction (A). 4. The fisher's gate, vulgarly called Babezeia and Piscaderia, or fishery gate, which forms the opposite or eastern angle of the city, by the c water side on the south-east; as 5. the mole, or Douwan gate, doth towards the north. 6. The Babel-wed, or river's gate, facing the Elved river towards the north<sup>g</sup>. The whole city is overlooked by a ridge of hills on the western side, which run almost on a level with the Bab-Cassaubab, or uppermost gate; and upon it are built two strong forts, one of which, from its five acute angles, is called the Star Castle, and stands about a small furlong from the gate above mentioned, and commands the sandy bay, and mouth of the river Elved; the other, called the emperor's castle, stands at half a mile distance south from the Cassaubab gate, hath the command both of the Star Fort, and of the whole ridge, as well as of the sandy bay, and mouth of the river Rebat, on the south side of the city (B). Thus much for the situation and strength of Algiers to the landward<sup>h</sup>. But it is much better fortified, and capable of d making a much better defence towards the sea side, where in describing its various fortifications, we shall begin with an account of its mole.

THIS mole was the work of the famed Cberedin the son of Barbarossa. Until his time the port of Algiers lay quite open, and looked more like a road than a harbour; but as soon as he was become master of the place, he set himself a building and fortifying it in that strong and commodious form we behold it in; in doing which he employed all the Christian slaves with such strictness, that he saw it completed in three years time, without any expence to him. It is built on the small island that faces the town<sup>i</sup>, in form of a large semicircle, extending itself from the Douwan, or mole gate, to one of the extremities of the island, and from the other extremity of it towards the walls of the town, leaving an handsome opening into the haven, where c the largest vessels may ride in safety from the violence of the waves. The mole is about 100 paces in length from the castle that defends it to the mole gate above-mentioned, and about six or seven wide, having on one side a stone key, and on the other a sandy rocky bank from end to end. The whole is defended at one angle by an old round castle, formerly built by the Spaniards, when they were masters of the place. It is called the fanal castle, or light house fort. It stands upon the solid rock, and a fire is carefully maintained in it for the security of ships. It hath three batteries of fine cannon. At the south end of the island is another fort, consisting of three batteries, to defend the entrance of the harbour, which is capacious enough

(A) So called from Aazon a Mauritanian prince, who besieged the city at that gate, which name it hath retained ever since (1).

On the walls of this gate are the hooks fixed, which catch those criminals that are thrown down from the battlements (2).

(B) It was at this last place, that the emperor Charles V. landed his army in that unfortunate expedition, which he made against Algiers, an. 1541; and there is still a fragment of the pier, which he is supposed to have erected for that purpose. The same monarch, the better to secure a communication between his army and fleet, and to succour his troops in their intended approach to the town, possessed himself of the ridge above mentioned, where he laid the foundation, and built the round or inner part of the castle, that hath continued to be called after his name ever since (3).

a to contain a good number of large ships (C), and is seldom or never without merchantmen, corsairs, and other vessels, riding in it. The misfortune is, that when the wind sets in from the northward, which is quite across the road, it causes such a swell in the harbour, that they commonly fall foul one of another, which obliges them to lash the ships close to each other. Besides which, the slaves of the Deylik are employed the whole year in bringing large blocks of stone from a neighbouring quarry, and laying them on the sand, to secure the mole from the impetuosity of the waves; which labour must be continually repeated, because the sea gradually washes those stones away, and makes such a constant supply necessary<sup>k</sup>.

b THE embrasures of the castle and batteries here are all employed; the cannon is of brass, and their carriages, and other utensils, kept in good order. The battery of the mole gate, upon the east angle of the city, is mounted with several long pieces of ordnance; one of which, our author thinks, hath seven cylinders, each of them three inches in diameter<sup>l</sup>: half a furlong to the W. S. W. stands the battery of the fishers gate, called also the sea gate, which consists of a double row of cannon, and commands both the entrance into the port and the road. There stand besides two or three forts more along the sea coast; the one on the south side of the city, called the castle of the renegadoes; the other two on the north side; viz. Setteet Akk-leet, a regular pentagon, and able to annoy an enemy either in their landing, or lodging themselves on the Bakiras, or adjacent plain; the other, called the English castle, inferior in extent and strength, which commands the high road c to rivers gate, on the same direction<sup>m</sup>. Thus much may serve for the fortifications of Algiers.

THE town is computed to contain 100,000 Mohammedans, among which are some few renegadoes, not above 30 in Dr. Shaw's time<sup>n</sup>, 15,000 Jews, and 2,000 Christian slaves, besides European and other strangers. There is but one handsome street in it, which reaches from the east to the west end, and is wider in some parts than in others, but in all much broader than any of the rest. It hath on the widest part handsome shops, and the chief merchants houses, and the market for corn and all provisions is kept in it. All the other streets are so narrow, that two persons can hardly walk a-breast; and the middle being so much lower than the sides, which form a kind of parapet, or passage for the water that runs through it, added d to their usual nastiness, makes it very disagreeable to walk through them<sup>o</sup>; especially as camels, horses, mules, and asses are continually passing and repassing, to which one must give way at the first warning, by squeezing one's self against the houses. It is still more dangerous to meet with a Turkish soldier in the streets; for the wealthiest Christian must take care to give him the way, and stand close till he is passed, or be in danger of feeling some shocking effect of his brutal resentment. The narrowness of those streets is commonly thought to be designed as a shelter from the heat. But there may be another reason given for it; viz. the frequent earthquakes it is subject to, seeing the fronts of almost all the houses are propped up by pieces of timber from one to the other across the streets (D).

THE houses, which are computed to amount to about 15,000, are built of brick or stone, and mostly square, with a large paved court in the middle, not unlike our common inns. The galleries round the court are supported by columns, and over them runs a second range supported in the same manner. The folding doors to the apartments are commonly of the height of the ceilings; and over the uppermost gallery are the terrasses, which serve them either for walking or drying of linen. Some will have pleasant gardens in them, and generally a neat summer-house on a corner of it, to shelter them from the weather whilst at their work, or gazing towards the sea, whether their corsairs bring them any prizes. Their very chimnies contribute to adorn the houses, being always kept clean and white-washed, and rising e

(C) It is of an oblong figure, 130 fathom in length, and about 80 in breadth, and 15 in depth at the highest, and the effect of art and labour. The two batteries that guard the entrance into it, and have been built within this century, are said to be bomb proof. They have each of them their lower embrasures mounted with thirty-six pounders; but the middle one between them is old, and of the least defence; and as none of them are fenced with mines, or advanced works, and the soldiers who are to guard them, not being kept under any regular course of duty and attendance, our judicious author thinks, that a few resolute battalions, supported by a small squadron of ships, would find no great difficulty to make themselves masters of the strongest of them (4).

(D) Langer de Taffy mentions a remarkable one, which happened there an. 1717, when the town felt several violent shocks for nine months successively; insomuch that all the inhabitants, except the Douwan and state officers, who kept within the Dey's palace, left the city, and incamped in tents in the country about it, many of whom perished through mere want. In some places whole villas were overthrown, and the ground was rent and torn up (5).

in form of a cupola on the four corners of the terrass. The apartments have no windows towards the streets, except some small grated ones, to admit a little light and air into their pan-tries, and the servants chambers, which are built along the great stair-case, but do not open to it; so that all the light the rest of the rooms have is only from the folding doors, and small windows that open to the inner court. They are obliged to white-wash their houses inside and outside at least once a year, but commonly do it against the approach of their grand festivals; and this is all the elegance you find in them; for as to their furniture it is plain and mean, consisting only of a few utensils, mostly of earth or wood, and a mat and two quilts, laid over two or three sticks, to serve them for a bed<sup>p</sup>. As there are no squares or gardens in the town, but the houses are contiguous together, one may walk from one end of it to the other over those terrasses, there being ladders raised on purpose, where the houses are of an unequal height; and it is common for them to visit their neighbours, and spend their evenings in fresco with each other upon them; notwithstanding thefts are never heard of, because any stranger that is caught in any house, without having first sent in his name, is sure to be severely punished. But tho' the houses of private people are so mean within, there are many belonging to persons in high and public stations, which are quite elegant, and paved all over with marble, the pillars of the same, and the cieling finely carved, painted, and gilt<sup>q</sup>.

THE most magnificent of all is the Dey's palace, which stands in the heart of the city. It is a spacious stately edifice, surrounded with two noble galleries, one over the other, supported with marble pillars, and hath two spacious halls, in one of which the Douwan meets every Sunday, Monday, and Tuesday. The barracks for the Turkish soldiery, five new structures of which were added to the old ones, an. 1650, are likewise very grand structures, and kept very clean by the slaves that attend them, at the charge of the government. Every barrack contains six hundred Turkish soldiers (E), each of which hath a fine spacious apartment allotted to him; and all the courts of these barracks have fountains to wash in before they go to their prayers.

THEIR mosks are very numerous, about 107 in all, and some of them very grand; and, as these are mostly situate along the sea side, they make a very fine shew, and add much to the beautiful prospect of the city. The baths are also in great number, it being customary for the Turks to resort to them, not only before the time of their five daily prayers, which their religion obliges them to, but at all other times of the day, when their affairs will permit it. Some of them are very large and sumptuous, finely paved with marble, and elegantly furnished with all other conveniencies; others are small and mean, suited to the lower rank; but all of them are built much after the same manner. The women have likewise their particular baths, attended by persons of their own sex, into which no men are allowed to set foot upon any pretence whatever. And yet it often happens, that these pretended inviolable sanctuaries of female chastity are turned into nurseries of intrigue and lewdness, notwithstanding the dreadful fate that infallibly attends the offenders, if discovered, and the frequent instances of such discoveries (F); the women being permitted to be attended only by female slaves,

(E) It is to be observed, that married men, who are mostly renegadoes, are excluded the benefit of these barracks, and obliged to provide themselves lodgings at their own expence in some other parts of the town; and so are likewise the single men that will not conform to the regulations of these public buildings. In either case they may hire private houses, or, which is more usual, take up their quarters in one of the four fondacas or albergas of the town.

These are large commodious edifices belonging to private persons, consisting of several spacious courts, in which are large warehouses, and variety of apartments to let; and, on account of their conveniencies for men and goods, are also much frequented by the Levantine merchants; for neither Algiers, nor any other town in the kingdom, hath either inns, taverns, or other public places, like the caravanseras in Turkey, for the entertainment of strangers. Those few Christians, who resort thither upon any business or accident, either take up with some persons to whom they are recommended, or with the consul of their nation, who is always ready to accommodate them with an apartment in his house, or his table, if they are persons of distinction.

As to the Greeks, and other mean travellers, there are plenty of cookshops, and public wine-houses, kept by the slaves of the Deylik, for their accommodation (7). The Jews likewise keep such houses and apartments to let, for the use of those of their own nation (8).

(F) Our author closes his account of these female baths with a dreadful instance of Turkish revenge upon an intrigue of this kind, which happened an. 1680; of which we shall give our reader a short abstract. Seremeth Effendi, an old wealthy Turk, settled in Algiers, after having married four wives there, fell in love with and married a fifth, just turned of twelve years of age, but so beautiful and witty as to ingross his whole affection, though her tender age, and his extraordinary corpulence, had rendered it impossible to consummate his marriage, as it could not be done without imminent danger of her life. His singular affection for her did however raise the jealousy of the other four to such a height, that they resolved at any rate to ruin this new favourite; which they easily compassed during his attendance on the Dey at some neighbouring war. The first step they took, after having gained her confidence, a slaves, young men are frequently introduced in their habits, than which nothing is easier; the very dress of the women already described contributing to conceal the cheat. As for those that belong to the men, they are commonly attended with such robust waiters, and the ceremony of sweating and rubbing is performed by them with such excessive roughness, that unless a stranger takes care to have an interpreter with him to bespeak a more gentle usage, they are sure to undergo a very fatiguing and irksome, instead of a delightful and wholesome exercise*.

b BESIDES those public baths, of which there are about sixty, they have six others, which they likewise call Bafios; but are no better than large stinking prisons, in which they lock up their slaves at night: in each of these they have a chapel for the free exercise of their religion; and every slave is allowed three small loaves, and a little mattrafs and rug for their bed; to these bagnios they must all repair at some stated hour in the evening; and, on the next morning, they are again let out to go to their respective labours. There are likewise some handsome edifices without the walls of the town, which are no small addition to its beautiful prospect; such as the hall where the officers of the marine hold their assemblies, at the foot of the mole; the habitation of a marabout is in high veneration among them, and situate on the declivity of the hill; a handsome square building, with a cupola, after the Turkish manner; and above all, a great number and variety of tombs belonging to their great men; some of which are very fine (G), and most of them adorned with chapels and oratories, which was to inspire the young damsel with a violent passion for a handsome young slave, a Spaniard by nation, and a concealed Jew, but a great favourite of Seremeth. After which they assisted her in introducing him in a female dress, among her other attendants, into one of those baths, where they had all the opportunity they could wish to indulge their mutual affection; but, upon their lord's return from the war, betrayed the whole intrigue to him. Seremeth, upon the first hearing of this fatal secret, fell into the most violent transports of fury and resentment: but, upon further inquiry, quickly discovered that the accusers had been no less faulty than the accused; so that his resentment against his new bride gradually cooled into pity, whilst it flamed more furiously against his other faithless wives, on whom alone he resolved to wreak his whole revenge. He looked upon himself the less injured by the former, as he had not yet consummated his marriage with her; and therefore thought, that divorcing her, and marrying her to his Spanish slave, would in a great measure save his honour. The misfortune was, that the Douwan, by some means or other, became acquainted with the whole affair; and what was still a greater aggravation, that the Spaniard was a Jew: For they thought it equally execrable that a Jewish slave should dare to mix his blood with that of a Mussulman woman, or that she should consent to it. Upon which they condemned him to be burned alive in the Jewish burying ground, and her to be drowned as usual (9), which was accordingly done, in spite of all the intreaties of Seremeth, and the efforts of the Dey himself to prevent it, who had now conceived a great passion for her.

Seremeth, now more exasperated than ever, by this sad catastrophe, against his four wives, resolved to glut his revenge by inflicting a much more inhuman one upon them; but, assuming a milder aspect, first decoyed them to his country seat, and having secured his most valuable and portable effects, in order to go and end his days in the deserts of Couco; he acquainted some deputies from that kingdom, then at Algiers, with his design, who gladly engaged to assist him in it. Accordingly, on the day before their departure, he takes them with him to his country seat, where he caused his four wives to be stripped of all their ornaments, which he distributed among those strangers. He next caused them to be led into a dungeon, where he had the night before confined a negroe slave, who had been privy to their intrigues, and there ordered them all to be impaled alive upon four stakes prepared for that purpose, after having first scared the offending part with a hot iron. The negroe slave was next quartered alive, and one of his quarters hung about the neck of each of them; which done he locked up the dungeon, and left them to expire in the most dreadful torments, whilst he and his new associates took horse, and by a speedy march, quickly reached the mountains of Couco, where he was out of all danger from the Algerine government, who did not receive the news of this dreadful tragedy till he was got far enough out of their reach.

Seremeth had taken care that a young female slave should be a witness of the whole scene, that she might inform them of it, but left her locked up in a chamber of his villa, whence she could not be released till next morning. As soon as the Dey was apprised of it by a messenger sent on purpose, he dispatched a Chiaoux thither, who, breaking into the dungeon, found two of the wives already dead, and the other two just expiring, whose agonies he put an end to with his sword. They were afterwards buried in a manner suitable to their rank; and his estate, which he had not time to sell, was, by the order of the Douwan, equitably divided among the children of those unfortunate mothers (10).

(G) Among these are six stately ones of a round figure, contiguous to each of her, which are easily distinguished from all the rest. These belong to six Deys, who were elected to that dignity, and immediately after strangled in the Douwan, within a few days of each other, by the fury of their cabals: the seventh that was chosen maintained his post; of whom we shall give a farther account in the course of this history.

The tombs of the Deys and Bashas are distinguished by a stone, on which a turban is carved in relieve: those of the Agas and military officers by a pike fixed in the ground close to the coffin; those of the Rais or sea captains by a staff, with a gilded truck or ball.

Those of the common people are only distinguished by flat stones, laid in the earth in the form of a coffin, of which those at the head and feet are highest. All these tombs are without the walls, at a small distance from the town; the only one to be seen within the city is that of Hali, Dey, who was looked upon as a saint, and a great favourite of heaven, because he died a natural death; a happiness which few, that are raised to that dignity, have enjoyed since its first establishment; insomuch, that his tomb was for forty days successively adorned with flowers, and surrounded with crouds of people offering up prayers for his soul (11).

are resorted to by men and women every Friday; near which are also the cells of the marabouts, who ply there on those days, to assist the comers in their prayers for the deceased, and receive some pieces of money, or other presents, in return for their charity.

THE city of Algiers had formerly neither wells nor fountains to supply it with water, but were forced to save that which fell from the sky in cisterns, till the last century; when a Moor, driven thither from Spain, found out a way of conveying as much of it, by the help of two aqueducts, as supplied a hundred fountains with it, at proper distances from each other. This water, which is universally allowed to be excellent, is brought thither by a long course of pipes and conduits from a great variety of rivulets, which have their source on the adjacent mountains; and do likewise supply their country seats, and adjoining gardens and orchards with it <sup>1</sup>.

about Algiers.

THE territory about Algiers is very fertile; and the hills and vallies about are every where beautified with gardens, groves, and country seats, whither the richer sort of people resort during the summer season. These villas are little white houses, finely shaded with variety of fruit trees, and other verdure, which yield a beautiful prospect towards the sea. The gardens are stocked with plenty of fruit trees, melons, and pot-herbs, and watered by a multitude of fountains and rivulets; a thing of singular pleasure and benefit in these hot climes, as it keeps every thing in a constant verdure; and where the people are so negligent of these advantages, that they do not so much as prune their trees, but let nature take its own course in almost every thing; and suffer their vines, which are here of exquisite beauty and fruitfulness (H), to run up to the very top of their lofty trees, where they extend themselves from one to another, and form indeed natural and delightful shady bowers; but would yield much better fruit, if they were better cultivated. The same may be said of their orange, citron, and other fruit trees; which, though in great number, yet, for want of care, never come to that perfection, as those which are cultivated by strangers, particularly by the European consuls; the trees of whose villas produce much more excellent fruits than those that belong to the Turks and other natives. And it is not a little surprizing, that this should not excite their sluggishness to strive, at least, to that same industry in a thing, in which, in all other respects, they appear to take an equal, if not a greater delight <sup>2</sup>.

The rich and extensive plains
of Mettjah.

IT will not be expected, that, in a work of this extensive nature, we should take notice of every fertile spot belonging to this province of Algiers Proper; of which the reader will find a more ample account in the authors often quoted thro' this chapter. One of them, however, we cannot well omit on several accounts; and, particularly, because it will give him an idea of the fecundity of the rest. We mean the rich and delightful plains of Mettijab, or, as it is corruptly spoken, Muttijar and Mottigia, out of whose territory a great part of the Algerine plantations above mentioned are taken. This plain, which extends itself above ten leagues in length, and four in breadth <sup>3</sup>, or, according to a later and more accurate observer, near fifty miles in length, and twenty in breadth <sup>4</sup>, is every where watered by a great number of springs and rivulets, and produces abundance of rice, fruit, roots, and grain of all kinds in great perfection; insomuch that the inhabitants enjoy two, and sometimes three crops yearly of wheat, barley, oats, and various kinds of pulse, except in some few barren spots near the sea and woods, which swarm with venomous reptiles. This fertile spot is inhabited by Arabian tribes, and was the native dominion of prince Selim Eutemi, who was dethroned, and murdered by Arach Barbarossa, of whom we shall speak in the sequel <sup>5</sup>.

NATURAL curiosities here are scarce worth notice, if we except the Hammam, or hot baths of Meereega, the antient Aquæ Calidæ Colonia, situate between the river Shellif and the sea; the largest and most frequented of which is a basin of twelve feet square, and four deep; and the water of which bubbles up in a degree of heat just supportable: after it hath filled the basin,

(H) These, however, are not the natural product of the country, but were formerly brought hither by the Moors from Granada after their expulsion from it; for, before that time, the Algerines, instead of cultivating it, did take singular pleasure in rooting up those which the Christians had planted there, and in turning the ground to other uses (12).

It is surprizing to see what a vast number of gardens and plantations there are in the neighbourhood of this capital, though the reader may judge of it by those which cover a great part of an adjacent plain, about fifteen miles in compass, which are computed to 20,000:

these have, indeed, no houses belonging to them, but only huts built of boughs; and those which are nearer the town have their villas, neatly kept by the slaves belonging to each of their owners.

None of these gardens or plantations are walled, but only fenced with what we call Barbary fig-trees, whose leaves being once stuck in the ground, take such deep root, and grow so quickly up, that in a few years they form an impenetrable hedge by their closeness and the prickles that grow upon the leaves, and are a safer, as well as more delightful inclosure than any wall (13).

a it discharges itself into a smaller one, made use of by the Jews, who are not permitted to bat in company with the Mohammedans. These two baths were formerly covered with a handsome building, and stone corridors around the basins, but at present lie exposed to the weather, and nearly half filled with stones and rubbish, though still much frequented in the spring, being supposed to remove all rheumatic pains, to cure the jaundice, and to alleviate most other inveterate habits and distempers: higher up the hill there is another spring, but much too hot to bathe in; which is, therefore, conveyed through a long pipe into another room, and used in much the same manner and effect as our pumping<sup>z</sup>. There are several other such hot springs in this province, whose waters are also medicinal, and very little heavier than rain water; these which our author weighed were in proportion to it, as 836 or 837 to 830; and that of Melwal as 910 to 830*.

THESE Thermæ are a sign, that the ground underneath abounds with sulphur, nitre, and other inflammable bodies, which is farther confirmed by the frequency and violence of the earthquakes, to which this country is subject at sea as well as land: three of the former our author felt, an. 1724, in a cruizer of 50 guns, at some distance from the coast, and in such a depth of water, that a line of 200 fathom could not reach the bottom; each of which gave as great a shock to the vessel, as if a large weight of twenty or thirty tons had fallen from a prodigious height upon the ballast: those at land are no less violent, and commonly fall out after some great rains at the close of the summer, and in autumn; the occasion of which is supposed to be the constipation, or closeness of the surface at such times, which confines c or keeps back the subterraneous steams, which in the summer find a freer passage through the chasms or chinks of it †.

THE people in this neighbourhood talk much of large gigantic bones being dug up, particularly a thigh bone thirty-six inches long; but our author could meet with nothing like it at his coming to the place, and observed the coffins and graves to be of the usual dimensions; and much questions, whether those large ones so much talked of were not those of camels or horses buried along with their riders, together with their armour, &c. after the manner of the Goths and Vandals, who passed over from Spain into Afric<sup>a</sup>; and being the descendants of the ancient Scythians might, in all probability, use their old way of interring their great men<sup>b</sup>. This appears indeed so much the more probable, from some of those swords which have been found d among the bones; one of which, our author tells us, is kept in the Dey's palace at Algiers, dug not many years ago out of Temendfeuse: they are of an uncommon length, bigness, and weight, and have large handles in the shape of a cross<sup>c</sup>; so one would imagine them to be too unwieldly to be used by men of common size and strength, and, consequently, that the bones and the weapons must have borne a nearer proportion than our author seems willing to allow.

are at peace with Algiers.*

AS this is a matter that more immediately concerns us to know, as a trading nation, and <sup>a</sup> as being in alliance with the Algerine state, than any other we have treated of in this chapter, it would doubtless be looked upon as an unpardonable omission, if we should neglect to give our readers at least as particular an account of it as we have done of all the rest. We have already taken notice that ours and the French nation are at peace with them. This privilege we have not only enjoyed ever since the year 1682, but have likewise, by our good offices, obtained it for our neighbours the Dutch; who, if we had not used our interest in their behalf, might have continued to this day at war with them; and now they are obliged to buy the continuation of their friendship by very considerable annual presents. The Swedes, about the same time, thought fit to purchase a peace from them at the expence of 700,000 <sup>b</sup> dollars; which, considering the small number of Swedish vessels which their cruizers meet with, hath hitherto been looked upon as no small mystery. And it is well if the Dey is not, e're long, obliged to lessen the number of those alliances, from the same motives which obliged his predecessors to enlarge them: in which case it is easy to guess which of the four allies will be most in danger of a rupture, as long as the French can annoy them with their ships from Marseilles and Toulon, and we much more so with ours from Gibraltar. Were it not for this, it is plain their interest would rather induce them to be at war than peace with us, or any other trading nation, because they have always found that the balance of the captures made by, and upon them, was greatly on their side, both with regard to number and value; and without such a constant supply of them, their state, such is the constitution of it, cannot possibly support itself <sup>c</sup>, but must either break the most solemn treaties with some of their allies, or suffer their sea forces to act in open violation of them, to prevent an insurrection (A).

Peace refused to the emperor.

WE need not wonder, therefore, at the Douwan and militia being so greedy of war, that they even refused to enter into an alliance with the emperor, though the Soltan, to whom they still own a kind of subjection, did earnestly request it of them; nor at the Dey himself appearing outwardly the most forward and eager for it, though his own interest ought rather to incline him to be at peace with Christian princes, since every unsuccessful enterprize against them, or even miscarriage in his officers, doth as often occasion the loss of his head, as his stiff refusal to declare war against any nation they have pitched upon for a prey: but it is far otherwise with the officers and soldiery, who, whatever small losses they may suffer by it, are sure in the whole to be considerable gainers, as in the case of the late war with England, wherein <sup>d</sup> their loss of about twenty-six of their beggarly corsairs was so amply compensated by the taking of no less than 350 of our rich merchant ships, that they would never have consented to a peace with us, had we not purchased it by dint of money, and a supply of naval stores <sup>b</sup>; both which their government stood in great want of at that juncture (B).

(A) It was a true, as well as serious answer which the late Dey, Ali, is reported to have given to Mr. Cole, our English consul, on his complaining of the injuries which our vessels met with from his cruizers; The Algerines are a company of rogues, and I am their captain (1). And it is plain, that if they have too many allies, their younger soldiers, who cannot well subsist without the money that arises to their share from prizes, will raise such clamours against him, as will oblige him either to break off with some of them, or to wink at such unjust depredations. This was the case, an. 1716, when these prizes became so scarce, that the officers were forced to lay the matter before the Douwan; where, after strong debates, it was carried by a majority, that since they met with few ships at sea, but what were either French, English, or Dutch, and prizes were the chief support of the state and navy, war should be immediately declared against the last, which was accordingly done; and one of their ships then in the harbour was seized, and an order issued out to all the

Algerine ports to do the like: and all that their consul could obtain from the Dey, who had a value for him, was, that he should be allowed his own time to settle his affairs, and be protected from insults (2).

They had, indeed, made a very strenuous opposition before against making any peace with them upon terms, alleging, the little encouragement there would be to fit out any ships, whilst they continued in friendship with those three trading nations, and how inconsiderable the loss of a few corsairs would be to the state, when balanced with the usual riches obtained by the war; concluding with a pathetic Arabic proverb, that those men ought never to sow, who were afraid of the sparrows (3): so that if the rich presents of the Dutch, and their further promises of a greater supply of naval stores, prevailed upon the Douwan to grant them a peace against the remonstrances of the sea officers and soldiers, these found means soon after to oblige them to break it.

(B) Besides the great advantage which the Algerine state hath, with respect to the number and value of those prizes,

- a It was by the same policy that we have kept them in some tolerable friendship with us, and inspired them with a particular esteem for our nation, till our becoming masters of Gibraltar and Port Mahon fixed them more effectually to our interest. It is much by the same motive of fear that the French oblige them to keep up their alliance with them; and that they obtained the same privilege with us by the treaty concluded an. 1718; at which time they had a stout squadron lying off in the road to give weight to their consul's remonstrances. But as to the rest of the Christian princes and states, it plainly appears, from what hath been said, that it is utterly against the Algerine government to be at peace with them long; and with some of them, especially the Spaniards, ever to be so, unless driven to it by superior force, which hath hitherto been tried in vain; and whenever that happens to be the case, it must be expected to be of
- b no longer duration than till they grow strong enough again to break it off.

It is quite otherwise with respect to the African powers, with whom they must, upon several accounts, keep a good harmony; and more particularly with the king of Morocco, and the Bey of Tunis, who, being contiguous to that of Algiers, might otherwise prove very troublesome neighbours to it: for this last being chiefly peopled by the Arabians and Moors<sup>c</sup>, who not only detest the Turkish government, but are naturally friends of the two former, on account of their being Moors, would run a very great hazard upon any rupture with either of them; and it might perhaps be the most effectual way for any European princes to suppress the Algerine power, to engage either or both of them in a war with it, and support them well. The misfortune is, that the Turkish tyranny hath long since sunk the whole Moorish race into such slavish abjection, that they imbibe from their very infancy an unconquerable dread of the Turkish name; and are, as it were, naturally inured to be treated with the greatest contempt and insolence: neither is this slavish spirit confined to those that groan under their yoke, but hath spread itself among all the rest, and much more since the close of the last century; when Chaban, Dey of Algiers, with only 6000 Turks and 6000 Moors, attacked, and totally defeated the king of Morocco, Muley Ishmael, at the head of 60,000 men, and obliged him to buy a peace from him on his own terms. His success was no less surprising soon after against Mahamed, Bey of Tunis, whom, with only 3000 militia, he defeated, at the head of 20,000 men, with a great slaughter, and took all his cannon and baggage; after which he entered his capital in triumph; and having set his rival Ben Choukee on the throne, returned to his own dominions, laden with an immense booty, as we shall relate more at length in the sequel. These two instances may suffice to shew how formidable the Turkish powers must have been by that time, and much more so since, both to the Moorish subjects and to the neighbouring Moorish kingdoms; who, on that account, are made to think it a singular favour and obligation, that they forbear extending their conquests into their dominions<sup>d</sup>.

It is, indeed, otherwise with respect to the tributary Arabians, who still retain their antient valour and love of liberty to such a degree, as to be still watching every opportunity of ridding themselves both of their yoke and tribute, and are numerous and strong enough to prove an overmatch for the Algerine troops, were their tribes but rightly united with each other, and their neighbours sure to observe a neutrality. But besides that, the government takes care to keep them in extreme poverty, by loading them with taxes, and oppressing them with military executions in cases of non-payment; they have still a more effectual way to prevent any attempt from that quarter, by fomenting divisions between tribe and tribe, and playing one against another; by which means a small number of Turkish forces, seasonably thrown in on any one side, will prizes, they have several other ways of indemnifying it for those of the losses they suffer at sea. If a corsair is lost at sea, or taken by the enemy, the owner is obliged to buy or build another of equal force within the time limited by the Dey, who is, however, to have some regard to his circumstances and abilities.

If a Turk or Moor be taken prisoner, though in fighting with an enemy, or by any other accident, whether laudable or otherwise, he is never redeemed or exchanged by the government, but is looked upon as dead; and if he hath neither child nor brothers, all his effects, real and personal, are seized on by the Dey for the service of the state: and if he returns from his captivity, all that he can obtain from him is a year's pay, such as he had before, to enable him to provide himself with a fresh set of arms, in order to enter again into the service.

Those that are either taken or killed in these excu-

sions, or die in the service, have their vacancies supplied by new recruits from the Lieutenant, who are at first admitted only to the lowest rank and pay, which being but small, is an inducement to them to mend their condition, either by plunder in the army, or prizes at sea; by which means also they have an opportunity to raise themselves either by seniority, or by their valour and good behaviour, from one degree to another, till they arrive at the chiefest or highest pay (4). Even the demolition of houses by bombardment brings some emolument to the state, if they belong either to Moors or Cauloglies, who are obliged by the law to rebuild them within a year; and if they are not able to do it, every thing belonging to the house is seized on, and sold for the use of the state. So that in all respects war must be the most preferable to such a government, which can carry it on at so small an expence, and turn its very losses into gain (5).

be more than a sufficient balance against the other: and thus, by the old experienced general a maxim of, Divide et impera, on the one hand, and by another more peculiar to the Turks, that severity on one side begets fear on the other, the Algerine state hath been able to keep that large and populous kingdom in obedience, or rather in a most cruel slavery, with a force scarcely amounting to 7000 Turks, including the Couloglies; of which near 2000 of the former are supposed to be veterans, excused from duty, and of the remaining 5000, 1000 are constantly employed in annually relieving their garrisons, whilst the rest are either to arm out their cruizers, or to form the three flying camps belonging to the three provincial viceroys, or rather annual tax gatherers, mentioned in a former section<sup>c</sup>, assisted only by about 2000 Zwawabs, corruptly called by Leo Africanus, Dapper, and other modern writers, Azagues, who are Moorish horse and foot, kept in pay for that purpose, who being all native enemies to the government, are only made use of to augment the bulk of its forces; but are never considered as any real safe-guard to it<sup>f</sup>. With so small a number of Turkish forces hath such a kingdom as this (so very dangerous to the head, so subject to convulsions among the soldiery, so onerous and oppressive to the subjects, and these not only born and bred enemies to the Turkish yoke, but almost 200 to one more numerous than their tyrannic lords), been able to subsist and support itself so long, maintain such constant wars against so many Christian states, and for the most part with surprising success, when each of them singly could equip a naval force so vastly superior to theirs. Lastly, how they have been able, by the help of so small a number of corsairs, to cause themselves to be respected at sea, and so many nations court and buy their friendship and alliance at a high rate; and how, with such handfuls of Turkish troops, they have been able c to keep so many large provinces and variety of nations in subjection to them, might well be looked upon only as an inexplicable but an incredible problem, had not our vicinity to, and commerce with them, given us all the assurance of it that can be desired. But it is not improbable, that the most incredulous of our readers will find, in the sequel of their history, to which we are now hastening, matter enough, both to convince them of the truth of it, and to unravel a great part, if not the whole of that strange paradox.

The history of Algiers from the foundation of that monarchy by Barbarossa, to the end of the 16th century.

History of Algiers.

IT will not be improper, in order to connect the Antient and Modern History of this king- d dom, to recapitulate, in few words, the several vicissitudes and revolutions it hath gone thro', from the time it was, with the rest of the African provinces, abandoned by the Romans, to the fatal period in which it became subject to the famed tyrant Barbarossa; who, being invited hither to deliver the Algerines from the Spanish yoke, did, by the basest treachery and cruelty, subdue it to himself, and became the first Turkish tyrant of it: ever since which time that brave nation hath continued under the galling yoke of a Turkish government. And this we think the more necessary to do here, as all those various revolutions lie mostly scattered in the several histories of the Vandals, Greeks, Saracens, Arabs, and other nations, that have successively held it under their respective dominions, and cannot be so easily recollected by the reader, without some such short recapitulation, as shall bring them as it were under one view, especially e as this kingdom hath been blended at several times with those of Tunis, Tripoli, Morocco, &c. and with them made but a part of a much larger and more powerful kingdom.

WE have seen in some former chapters the Romans expelled out of this, and the rest of Afric, by the Vandals, and other northern Barbarians; who, after having destroyed the best part of their opulent cities and most sumptuous works, and domineered over these parts from the year 427 to 558, were forced to yield in their turn to the conquering arms of the renowned Belisarius, Justinian's successful general; from which time they continued in subjection to the Greek emperors, till about an. 663, when the Mohammedan Arabs over-ran all this part of Afric, and tyrannized over it till the natives found means to shake off the yoke, and to make themselves masters of a great part of Barbary, where they divided themselves into a great number of petty f kingdoms or states<sup>a</sup>, under chiefs of their own nation and chusing, in whose government they continued several centuries, that is, till an. 1051; when Abel Texifn of the Zinbagian tribe, drove them out, by the assistance of some powerful marabouts, and took upon him the title of Amir al Mumenin, or chief of the faithful, whilst his subjects were distinguished by that of Morabites, and corruptly Almoravides.

a THIS race was again driven out in the 12th century by Mobavedin, a marabout, who, with the assistance of the Muzamedins, dethroned Braban Hali, the last emperor of the Zinhagian dynasty, and forced him to flee to some rocky precipices, where he miserably ended his life, with the unfortunate remains of his family, whilst the usurper and his successors seized on his dominions; and these affected to call themselves from him Mabavedins, and afterwards Mobavedes and Mobades <sup>b</sup>. The marabouts drive out the Zinhagi.

THIS priestly race was again expelled by Abdulac, governor of Fez, at the head of his Benimerini; and he, soon after, stripped of his new conquests in the 13th century by the Sharifs of Hascen, descended from the Arabian princes, who had flourished here in the 10th century; and these, the better to secure their new dominions, divided Barbary into several little kingdoms or provinces, each of them under their respective chiefs, to prevent their being lost a second time <sup>c</sup>. Amongst the rest, this of Algiers was divided between four of their own native princes; the chief of whom, named Rabmir-amiz, made choice of that of Tremecen; and the other three had those of Tenez, Algiers Proper, and Bugeya, or rather Bujeyah; by which partition those four cities became the seats and capitals of the four kingdoms, and the princes soon after took the title of kings upon themselves, and each of them had a number of Arabian tribes, or small republics, under them, whose chiefs were obliged to pay a certain tribute to them. These four monarchs laid so good a foundation for a lasting balance between them, that they continued some centuries in mutual peace and amity; till at length, that of Tremecen having ventured to violate some of their articles, that of Tenez, named Abu'l-fariz, who was by this time become very powerful, and was no less ambitious than he, took occasion, from his infringement, to declare war against him. It was not long before he made himself master of Bujeyah and Tlem San, or Tremecen; and had such success against his antagonist, that he obliged him to submit to a very disadvantageous peace, and to become tributary to him. He did not, however, continue long so; for Abu'l-fariz dying a few years after, and having divided his kingdom between his three sons, the eldest of whom had Tenez, the second Jigeri, vulgarly called Gigeri, and the third, named Abdalaniz, that of Bujeyah; this last immediately entered into a vigorous and successful war against the king of Tremecen; in which the Algerines, who had been hitherto tributary to the latter, seeing him now become too weak either to protect or oppress them, thought it more safe to transfer their tribute to his antagonist; by which means Abdalaniz became so powerful, that he might, in all likelihood, have made himself master of all Barbary with a great deal of ease, had not Spain taken advantage of those intestine discords, and sent a powerful army thither, which soon put a stop to all his success, and quite changed the face of affairs there <sup>d</sup>. Abdalaniz's success against the king of Tremecen.

THIS remarkable revolution happened an. 1505, when Ferdinand V. king of Arragon, by the advice of his prime minister, cardinal Ximenes, sent thither the count of Navarre with a powerful army and fleet, who soon made himself master of the important city and harbour of Oran, or Auran, then chiefly inhabited by Moors, who had been banished out of the maritime provinces of Spain about twelve years before; and who, being thoroughly acquainted with the Spanish language, and the course of those maritime coasts, did greatly infect them by their frequent descents, and pillaging inroads; to suppress which this powerful force was chiefly sent. The Spanish admiral pursued his success with such valour and speed, that the city of Bujeyah, and other considerable places, soon followed the fate of Oran, which so alarmed the Algerines, who had no small reason to fear that his next attempt would be on their capital, which was at that time in too weak a condition to make head against such a force. In this dilemma they found no better expedient than to apply to Selim Eutemi, or, as Marmol calls him <sup>e</sup>, Celim-Beni-Tumi, a noble and warlike Arabian prince, whose territory was the fertile plain of Mettijah, vulgarly Mosligia, and to put themselves wholly under his protection and government; who came accordingly at the head of a good number of his bravest subjects, together with his wife Zaphira, a lady justly celebrated for the beauties of her body and mind, and a son, then about twelve years old. All this, however, could not hinder the Spaniards landing a sufficient number of forces near Algiers on that same year, which soon obliged that metropolis to pay homage to Spain, and to become tributary to it: neither could prince Selim prevent their building a strong fort on the small island opposite to the city <sup>f</sup>, and putting a strong garrison, together with a sufficient quantity of artillery, into it, which proved a powerful curb on the Algerines, at the same time that it terrified their corsairs from sailing either in or out of that harbour: this galling yoke they were obliged to submit to till the year 1516, on which king Ferdinand died; but no sooner were they apprised of his death than they resolved, if possible, to shake it off, and make a fresh push for their liberty. Aruch Barbarossa, the famous, or rather infamous, pirate, a Turk, and native of the island of Lesbos, in The Algerines put themselves under the protection of prince Eutemi.

invited by the Algerines ;

his extract and first ex-

the Archipelago, or, as Marmol and others will rather have him, a Sicilian renegado (C), was a by this time become no less dreaded for his valour than for his surprising success, and was then on a cruize with a squadron of gallies and barks. To him the Algerines, with the consent and permission of prince Eutemi, sent a deputation, requesting him to come and free them from the Spanish yoke, and promising him a gratuity answerable to so great a service, both which he readily accepted, and immediately dispatched a squadron of eighteen gallies and thirty barks to their assistance, whilst he hastened to them by long marches by land, accompanied by as many Turks and Moors as he could possibly engage in that expedition : the news of this filled the city of Algiers with inexpressible joy. But as we are now entering into a strange series of the most uncommon villainies, murders, and surprising successes of this infamous pirate, who is particularly noted by all historians of this time, though with some disagreement, as being the first who brought the Turks into Barbary, it will not be improper to give our readers a short account of him before we proceed farther. b

We have already observed in a late note, that his father was a renegado, whether of Sicily or Lesbos, who followed the same piratical trade : his mother is said to have been a Spaniard of Andalusia, who had been taken prisoner by, and was brought up under him ; others will have him to have followed the trade of a potter. However that be, his son, whom we are speaking of, began that of corsair very young, and had the command of a vessel, fitted out by some Constantinopolitan merchant, to cruize upon such as were not in alliance with the Porte, and steered directly with it towards the coasts of Barbary, where a Turkish vessel had hardly ever been seen. He was kindly received by the king of Tunis, and permitted to put into any of his ports, upon paying him a tenth for every prize, and was here joined by another galley. We are told he was but then thirteen years of age, and had with him two brothers, Hayradin, vulgarly Aradin, and Isaak ; the former of whom made afterwards a greater figure than Barbarossa himself, and succeeded him in the kingdom of Algiers. c

THESE three soon after took such a number of prizes, particularly two of the pope's gallies of war, as filled both Moors and Christians with astonishment (the Moors of Barbary having till then annoyed those coasts only in tow-boats and brigantines), insomuch that in about eight years time he saw himself at the head of twelve large gallies ; eight of which were his own, and the rest belonged to his chief officers: some authors make them amount to twenty-six, all manned with Turks and Moors. With these he was, not long after, invited to the assistance of the king of Bujeyah, who had been dispossessed of his dominions, with promises of ample rewards ; and having landed his forces, consisting of 1000 Turks and Moors, made a fruitless attempt to recover his capital, in conjunction with that prince, the Spanish garrison making a continual fire upon them, in which his left arm was shot off by a cannon ball. He renewed it the year following with no better success ; upon which he wholly gave it up, and sailed directly for Jigel, distant about twenty leagues from Bujeyah, where he continued the whole autumn and ensuing winter : by this time, the inhabitants being almost reduced to a famine through the badness of the harvest, he set sail, and soon after returned with three ships laden with corn, which he distributed among the townsmen, and the Arabians of the adjacent mountains ; by which he so far gained the affections of the latter, that they immediately honoured him with the title of their Soltan ; tho' they had, till then, refused to acknowledge the sovereignty of the greatest monarchs. Under this new title he began to make war against some of the neighbouring mountaineers, and had gained several considerable victories over them, when he received the embassy from prince Selim Eutemi, or, as he is called by others, Salem Aben Toumi above-mentioned, which gave him the promising prospect of making himself master of a more convenient and important place on the Barbary coast than either that of Jigel or Bujeyah. With this view he began his march by land, as was hinted above, at the head of 800 Turks, 3000 Jigelites, and 2000 Moorish volunteers ; but instead of taking the direct road to Algiers, bent his way towards Sbarsbel, where Hassan, another famed corsair, had settled himself, and whom he there surprised, and obliged to surrender, not without a previous promise of friendship ; but no sooner got him in his power than he caused his head to be cut off, seized on all his ships, and obliged the Turks, who had assisted in his service, to follow him in his new expedition. Upon their arrival near Algiers, all the people of that metropolis, great and small, with prince Selins Eutemi at their head, went out to meet this great warrior and deliverer, whom they looked upon as invincible, and conducted him into that metropolis with the utmost splendor and triumph amidst the greatest acclamations of the people, and lodged him in one of the noblest apartments d e f

(C) Marmol, and others after him, positively affirm his father to have been a native of Sicily, and originally a Christian, who turned Mohammedan for the better carrying on the piratical trade. If so, Aruch, or, as he calls him, Horux (for the surname of Barbarossa was given him on account of his red beard) was only a renegado's son at most ; for his father must be supposed to have brought him up in the religion he had assumed, and so could be no apostate from Christianity (1).

(1) See Marmol, Afric. lib. v. ch. 11.

- a of that prince's palace, where he was again received with the greatest marks of distinction, and returned their compliments on his happy arrival with great condescension, and repeated assurances of his sincerest friendship and assistance: whilst his troops were likewise treated with such uncommon generosity, that our pirate, elevated beyond measure at their strange and unexpected submission, and his own reception, began to form the treacherous design of enslaving them, and making himself king of Algiers, and the provinces belonging to it. His only fear was, lest his Turks and Moors should recoil at so signal a piece of baseness, and others refuse to join in it, or, perhaps, betray his design to prince Selim, and abandon him to his just resentment. He, therefore, resolved to communicate it first to the chief officers of his council, after having first exacted a solemn oath of secrecy from them, who made no scruple to applaud his resolution, and
- b to promise to assist him in it with all their might.

ALL this while his troops revelled in the city and country with all the licentiousness and insolence imaginable, and committed the most shocking disorders with surprising impunity, the Algerines neither daring, nor being in a condition, to suppress them; and Barbarossa not only conniving at it, but privately encouraging them, with a view of bringing things to such a crisis as would facilitate the execution of his treacherous scheme. In the mean time, the better to delude the Algerines, he caused a battery to be erected at the marine gate, opposite to the Spanish fort, and at the distance of about 500, or, according to another author, 300 paces<sup>f</sup>. and from thence continued battering it for the space of a whole month, without any effect, his cannon being much too small: upon which he thought proper to put off his expedition to some other

- c time. In all this he acted in so arbitrary a manner, without consulting the prince, or shewing the least regard to his being pleased or displeased with what he did, whilst his soldiers behaved with the same brutish insolence to the Algerines, that they could no longer doubt of his perfidious design, and began to complain of his perfidy in so loud and public a manner, as gave the pirate reason to think that their next step would be to oppose him with all their might; to prevent which, he resolved to be before-hand with them, and at once to rid himself of prince Eutemi, get himself proclaimed by his troops king of Algiers, and oblige the Algerines to acknowledge him as such (D): all which he but too easily accomplished, with little or no danger or difficulty. With relation to the first, his being lodged in the prince's palace gave him an opportunity of concerting his measures both for the time and means of privately dispatching
- d him; for having observed that he usually staid a while alone in the bath every day before the time of prayer at noon, he took that opportunity of surprising him there, unperceived, in that naked and defenceless condition; and having strangled him with a napkin, immediately withdrew, without being observed by any one; presently after this he returns thither, attended with a considerable retinue, under pretence of bathing, as usual, and put on the most lively tokens of surprize and grief at the sight of the murdered prince; but to avoid suspicion, gave it out that he was fallen into a fit, and had been suffocated in the bath: and though the inhabitants of Algiers did but too justly suspect the perfidious and inhuman pirate to have been the author of that tragic scene, they had been already so cruelly treated by his soldiers, that they dared neither complain, nor oppose any thing he did. On the contrary, they began to fear that the

(D) We are told by a late writer, that there was still another motive which hastened the execution of this perfidious design; viz. Barbarossa's secret affection for the excellent and beautiful Zaphira, prince Eutemi's wife. This secret piece of history, he tells us (1), he met with in a vellum manuscript, in the hands of a famous marabout, of the family of that unfortunate prince. The substance of which is, that the pirate's addresses to that virtuous princess being rejected, with that resentment which the murderer of her husband, and the enslaver of the Algerine kingdom, justly deserved, his passion grew the more furious, and made him resolve to use force towards her. He made no scruple to threaten her with revenge; to prevent which, she took care to arm herself with a dagger and a dose of poison against his next visit, designing with the one to stab the tyrant to the heart upon his first attempt, and to dispatch herself by the other, if she missed her blow.

He came accordingly on the next day, and on some pretence, got all her women into one room, and having locked them up in it, entered into that of the princess, whom he found sitting on her sofa, and all bathed in tears, and overwhelmed with the deepest grief. He endeavoured at first to sooth her by the gentlest carriage, but grew the more furious upon her next repulse, and had no sooner laid his hands on her, than she drew out the dagger, and tried to plunge it into his heart. He did, however, so far ward off the blow, that it only wounded him in the arm; but that proved sufficient to oblige him to leave her for a while, till he had bound up his wound, and called in one of his guards to disarm her, resolved now more than ever to force her at any rate: but whilst that was doing, she had swallowed the poison, which operated with such quickness, that she expired soon after at his feet; whereupon the brutish tyrant wreaked his revenge on her women whom he had locked up, caused them to be all strangled, and privately buried with their mistress, and a report to be given out that they had made their escape (2). But whether this story might not be contrived by some of prince Eutemi's descendants to blacken the name of Barbarossa the more, we leave to our readers to decide, especially as our author doth not pretend to answer for the authenticity of the manuscript out of which he took it. The reader may see it at full length in his history of Algiers (3).

slaughter would be universal; upon which many of them abandoned the city and country; and, with what little they could take with them, fled into some of the neighbouring states, whilst others barricaded themselves in their houses, and left the Turks masters of every thing, which paved the way to the execution of the other two parts of his treacherous plot, getting himself proclaimed king by his troops, and acknowledged by the Algerines; the former of which was but too readily complied with by his forces, and without the least opposition from the latter. Barbarossa was accordingly proclaimed through the city with great pomp; he rode through the streets on horseback, attended by his Turks and Moors, who cried, “Long live Aruch Barbarossa, the invincible king of Algiers, the chosen of God to deliver the people from the oppression of the Christians, and destruction to all that shall oppose, or refuse to obey him as their lawful sovereign;” which last threatening words so confirmed the inhabitants in their fears of a general massacre, that those few that were left in the city began to think of preventing it by a timely submission.

THE cavalcade ended, the tyrant was accompanied to prince Eutemi’s palace, where, being seated on the throne under a stately canopy, he received the congratulations of his Turks; immediately after which his troops dispersed themselves, as was agreed, through all parts of the city, to acquaint the Algerines with what had been transacted, and to invite them, in the new king’s name, to come and swear allegiance to him, with assurances, that as many as should comply, would be treated with particular regard by him, and entitled to his special favour. Accordingly many of them came and complied with his invitations, paid homage to him, signed the instrument of his coronation, and were dismissed with tokens of his esteem and very large promises. The rest were brought in by degrees soon after, more through fear than love or hope, though he had taken care to allure them to it by a proclamation; in which he gave them the greatest assurances that he would govern them with the equity of a good prince, and the indulgence of a tender father. He had also issued out another edict for the establishing a better discipline and regularity amongst his soldiery, forbidding them, under severe penalties, to molest the inhabitants in their going in and out in pursuit of their respective callings: but all this proved mere grimace, and so little observed or minded by him or his Turks, that strangling, confiscation, imprisonment, fines, and banishment, were some of the first tokens he gave them of his pretended equity and fatherly tenderness; insomuch, that both he and his Turks became so dreadful and detestable to their oppressed subjects, that they used to shut up their houses and hide themselves, whenever he appeared in public. Whilst he was thus exercising his tyranny over all whom he suspected of disaffection, he did not forget to strengthen himself by every means that could terrify them from attempting the recovery of their liberty. He began with regulating and augmenting his forces, fortifying the citadel of his capital, supplying it with sufficient artillery, and other warlike stores, and placing a strong Turkish garrison in it. He next coined new money<sup>ε</sup>, with his name and stamp upon it (E); and sent ambassadors to all the neighbouring princes, in order to get himself acknowledged by them. In a word, he so confirmed himself on his new throne, allowed his Turkish soldiers so much liberty, and they grew so insolent and brutish with it, that neither the Algerine women, nor even their children of either sex, dared to appear in the streets, for fear of exposing themselves to some bestial attempts: whilst the men were quite drained and impoverished with heavy taxes by their pretended protector, nor dared so much as complain of their unhappy slavery, without danger of a still worse treatment.

guilty of three oversights.

BARBAROSSA, in spite of all his craftiness, suffered his brutishness and ambition to hurry him into three oversights, which were like to have proved fatal to him; for his treacherous and inhuman way of treating them could hardly fail, he must needs think, of driving them upon some desperate way of recovering their liberty; and he knew well enough how ready the Spaniards, under whom, tyrannic as they were, they could hardly fare worse, would be ready to assist them with all their might, to crush at once both him and his Turkish bloodhounds. The next false step he took was the disobliging the warlike Arabs within his dominions, already but too justly provoked at his perfidy and murder of the brave prince Eutemi; for though he had made use of all the artifices he could think of to wipe off the imputation of it, he was still firmly believed to be the author of it; and though he had, by fair promises and caresses, so far gained upon them, that they had agreed to pay him a small tribute, yet he had suffered his harpies to invade them, and violently to drive away their flocks, seize on a their granaries, &c. under pretence that they refused to pay it; by which means they were become no less inveterate against him than the Algerines. The third oversight he committed was the disbanding the greatest part of his Moorish troops, who were mostly of the province of Jigel, vulgarly Gigel, whom poverty, and the sweets of sharing with the Turks in plunder and oppression, had wholly attached to his service, but were now returned home with no small grudging and discontent <sup>b</sup>.

THE Algerine chiefs were apprised of all this, and began to think it a favourable crisis to make a bold push for liberty. They found means to send privately some deputies to the Arabians of the Mettijeau plains, the country and dominions of their late noble Cheyk, prince Selim Eutemi, whose son had happily escaped to Oran, and put himself under the protection of the Marquess de Gomarez, governor of it, and was treated by him with all the tenderness and respect due to his birth, youth, and unhappy circumstances. The design of this
b embassy was no other than to stir up those brave Arabs to join with them in revenging the murder of their prince, to put an effectual stop to the Turkish tyranny, and to restore his son to his father's throne and dominions: they likewise found means to carry on a secret correspondence with the governor of the Spanish fort opposite to Algiers. The result of the whole was, that Barbarossa and his Turks should be all assassinated at once, and that the Algerines should again become tributary to Spain. The day being agreed on for the execution of this important attempt, it was resolved, that a considerable number of Moors should bring their fruits and herbs, as usual, to the market, with arms concealed under their gowns; and c that another set of them should privately glide themselves to the gallies which were drawn up upon the shore on each side of the city, and set them on fire: so that whilst the Turks were employed in extinguishing the flames, the citizens should shut the gates upon them, and the garrison of the fort attack them in their armed boats on all sides, whilst the cannon of the ramparts kept firing upon them. The misfortune was, that the persons engaged in this design were too numerous; and Barbarossa had so vigilant and jealous an eye over the Algerines, that he discovered the whole design time enough to prevent its taking effect. So that, without betraying the least suspicion or uneasiness from them, he caused a strong guard to be placed both at the city gates and about the gallies, under pretence of securing them from the Spaniards, and by that means prevented the farther execution of that plot, without giving them the least suspicion
d of his being apprised of it: and whilst they were patiently waiting for a more favourable opportunity for resuming it, he was meditating on the most effectual means of wreaking his vengeance on the contrivers of it. Accordingly, as he was soon after going with his usual retinue to the mosque, at the hour of prayer, he was followed thither by a number of the Algerine chiefs, who were no sooner entered than the gates were ordered to be shut, and the place to be surrounded by the Turkish soldiery, to prevent the citizens approaching it. Immediately after which Barbarossa begun with upbraiding them in the strongest terms for their intended treachery, as he stiled it, against him; then caused the heads of twenty of the principals of them to be cut off at the mosque's door, and, with their bodies, to be flung into the streets, and thence buried in some great dunghills, which were then in the heart of the city. He likewise
e confiscated most of their estates, and laid a heavy fine on the rest. Which dreadful execution so terrified them, that they never dared since to attempt any thing against him or his successors, but have patiently submitted their necks to the galling yoke with the most surprising patience, in spite of all the insolence and oppression they have groaned under ever since <sup>i</sup>.

IN the mean time the young Arabian prince, the son of Eutemi, whom we left at Oran, thinking himself no less able than he was eager to revenge the wrongs done to his family, laid before the marquess of Gomarez a very practicable plan for putting the city of Algiers into the king of Spain's hands, in which he proposed to become the principal actor; and was thereupon sent to lay it before cardinal Ximenes; who approving of it, sent a fleet with 10,000 land
f forces, under the command of Don Francisco, or, as others call him, Don Diego de Vera, to drive Barbarossa and his Turks out of Algiers, and to restore young Selim Eutemi. But the fleet was no sooner come in sight of the place, than it was dispersed by a storm, and the greatest part of it dashed against the rocks: most of the Spaniards were drowned; and the few that had escaped to shore, either killed by the Turks or made slaves (E). So that instead of driving the tyrant out of Algiers, this sad disaster not only confirmed him the more in it, but contributed to swell his pride and insolence to such a degree, that he began to imagine himself invincible, <sup>a</sup> and that the very elements conspired to make him so, and to grow more cruel and oppressive than ever towards the inhabitants both of the city and country; and indeed, not only the Algerines, but the Arabians and Moors, began to look upon him as a prodigy of good fortune, as well as of insolence and tyranny: and well they might, considering to what pitch of power and grandeur he had raised himself with so small a handful of Turkish desperadoes<sup>k</sup>. The Arabians of several tribes in particular were so alarmed at it, that they held several conferences; in which they at length resolved to send on an embassy four of their most distinguished chiefs for wisdom, to implore the assistance of Hamida Al Aabd, vulgarly Hamidel Abdes, king of Tenez, a prince no less uneasy than they at Barbarossa's exorbitant power; and who readily promised to do his utmost to drive him and his Turks out of Algiers, provided they engaged to <sup>b</sup> settle that kingdom upon him and his descendants. Their present fears made them readily agree to his conditions; so that he immediately set out, at the head of 10,000 Moors; and, upon his entering into the Algerine dominions, was joined by the Arabians of the whole country. Barbarossa had timely notice of his approach, and, trusting to his good fortune, engaged him at the head of only 1000 Turkish musqueteers, and 500 Granada Moors, and totally defeated his numerous army (F), and pursued him to the very gates of his capital, which obliged him to remove farther towards Mount Atlas; upon which he laid siege to, and easily carried it; and after having given it to be plundered by his Turks, obliged the inhabitants to acknowledge him their sovereign (G).

ONE would have imagined that such an unequal victory and rapid success, when weighed with <sup>c</sup> the tyrannic use he made of them, would have inspired all the neighbouring states with a suitable dread of his government. Nevertheless, he had no sooner made himself master of the kingdom of Tenez, than the inhabitants of that of Tremecen, which borders upon it, upon some dissatisfaction against their then reigning prince Abuzeyan, vulgarly Abuzijen, who had, it seems, dethroned his nephew, and forced him to flee to Oran for refuge, sent some of their principal citizens on an embassy to him, with very advantageous offers, and even of the sovereignty of their noble city and fertile territory, if he would come to their assistance; which he readily accepted. His brother Hairadin, al. Cheredin, was immediately ordered to send him the artillery and other warlike implements, necessary for that enterprize, from Algiers. His other brother, Isaac Zemi, was left governor of Tenez with only 200 Turks and a few Moors, whilst himself <sup>d</sup> hastened by long marches towards Tremecen, with the rest of his forces, attended with a great number of camels and horses laden with provision; his army still increasing as he went, by the addition of several Moorish tribes, which joined him with no other view than that of plundering. Abuzijen, who suspected nothing of his subjects treachery, being informed that Barbarossa was marching with full speed towards his dominions, went to meet him with an army of 6000 horse and 3000 foot. The battle was fought on the plain of Agbad, al. Agebel, near Auran, with great bravery for some time; but the invader's artillery gave him such an advantage at length, that he forced him to retire to his capital, where he no sooner arrived, than the Tremecenians struck off his head, and sent it on the point of a spear to the victorious Barbarossa, with a fresh invitation to him to come and take possession of the kingdom. Upon his approach, <sup>e</sup> they all went out to meet and welcome him, whom he received with his usual complaisance, and many fair promises; but was no sooner entered that city with his Turks, than he began to give them some marks of his tyrannic temper; and either by foul or fair means compelled those, who had rifled the palace of their late king, to refund every particular to him; by which means he raised an immense sum upon his new subjects, some part of which he employed in repairing the fortifications of the city and citadel, called Al-Meshuar, and the rest in rewarding his Turks and Moors. The Tremecenians were highly exasperated at this extreme severity, as they deemed it, and were not long before they gave him cause to fear that his reign over them would prove but uneasy and precarious; and as, on the other hand, he rightly judged his neighbourhood, with the Spaniards of Auran, would prove troublesome and dangerous, he <sup>f</sup> thought proper to enter into an alliance with Muley Hammed, king of Fez, who was then at war with that of Morocco. After which he took care to seize on and secure the remaining cities of that kingdom to his obedience, by garrisoning them with his own troops<sup>1</sup>: and as

(F) This victory was, however, chiefly owing to the advantage which his troops had from their fire-arms, the enemy having no other weapons than arrows and javelins (2).

- a some of them ventured to revolt soon after, at the report of the tyrannies which he every where exercised over those that fell under his power, he was again obliged to send one of his corsairs, named Escander, a man no less cruel than he to reduce them; so that the Tremecenians began now to repent in good earnest of their having invited such a tyrant to their assistance, and to consult on the means of driving him away, and bringing back their lawful prince Bubama, or, as others call him, Abuchen Men, or Abu Hommen; but, unfortunately for them, their cabals were discovered soon after, and a great number of the conspirators were massacred in the most cruel manner, Abuchen Men had the good luck to escape to Auran, and to be received under the protection of the marquis of Gomarez, governor of it, who sent immediate advice of it to Charles V. then lately arrived in Spain, with a powerful fleet and army. Some say, that that governor took the young prince with him to Spain, whither he repaired to lay before the emperor a plain state of the affairs and transactions in Africa, and to advise with him about the means of suppressing the power and success of the now dreaded Barbarossa<sup>m</sup>. However that be, no doubt can be made about the readiness with which that politic monarch undertook to reinthrone an unfortunate prince, who would thereby become not only tributary to him, but might be made very instrumental in driving the usurping tyrant out of his other conquests. He immediately ordered him a succour of 10,000 men, under the command of the governor of Auran, who, under the guidance of Abuchen Men, began his march towards Tremecen, and in their way were joined by prince Selim, and a great number of Arabs and Moors from the adjacent countries. The first thing they resolved upon was to attack the important fortrefs of Calau, situate between Tremecen and Algiers, and commanded by the corsair Escander, at the head of about 300 Turks. They invested it closely on all sides, in hopes that Barbarossa would thereby be induced to come out of Tremecen to its assistance, which would give the citizens an opportunity to rise up in arms during his absence, and to keep him out. The Turks, however, made a brave defence, and, in a sally they made at night, surprised and cut off near 300 Spaniards. This encouraged them to venture a second time, in which they found the besiegers so well upon their guard, that they were repulsed with great loss, and Escander himself was wounded in the thigh by a musket ball; soon after which they surrendered upon honourable terms (H); and the place, after a severe plunder, was put into the hands of the king of Tremecen.
- d ALL this while Barbarossa kept himself close in his capital, not daring to stir out for fear of a revolt, and no less embarrassed on account of the politic delays which the king of Fez made, to send him the quota of auxiliaries stipulated by the late treaty of alliance between them, notwithstanding all his pressing instances to him.
- At length being informed, that Abu Hammen and his Arabs, accompanied by Martin Argot, the Spanish commander, were in full march to lay close siege to Tremecen, he judged it more safety to come out of it, at the head of 1500 of his Turks and 5000 Moorish horse, and to break his way through the enemy in the open field. He was not gone far from the city, before his council advised him to return and fortify himself in it; but it was now too late, the inhabitants being resolved to keep him out by main force, and to open their gates to their own lawful prince as soon as he appeared. In this distress he saw no way left but to retire to the citadel, and there defend himself till he could find an opportunity of stealing out with his men and all his treasure. Here he defended himself vigorously, and made several successful sallies against the enemy, as if he designed to hold out a long siege; but his provisions failing him, he took the advantage of a subterranean back way, which he had caused to be digged up for that purpose, and taking his immense treasure with him, stole away as privately as he could. His flight was, however, soon discovered, and he so closely pursued, that to amuse, as he hoped, the enemy, he caused a great deal of his money, jewels, plate, &c. to be scattered all the way, thinking they would not fail to stop their pursuit to gather it up. This stratagem failed him, through the vigilance of the Spanish general, who was himself at the head of the pursuers, and obliged them to march on, till he was come up close to him, on the banks of the Huexda, about eight leagues from Tremecen. Barbarossa had just crossed the river with his vanguard, when Argot fell upon his rear on the other side, and cut them all off; then crossing the water, overtook him, at a small distance from it. Here a fresh and bloody engagement ensued, in which the Turks fought

(H) This capitulation was, however, broken by the besiegers, and the Turks all massacred except sixteen, who went and clung close to the stirrups of the king, and of the Spanish general. The occasion of which was owing to a young Arabian officer, who, having discovered his father's shield upon Escander, who had formerly taken it from him, and had greatly abused his wives, fell upon him in a violent fury, assisted by thirty young warriors of his own tribe, and a good number of others who followed after them and cut them all in pieces, notwithstanding all the king's and general's endeavours to prevent it (4).

like so many lions, till being over-powered by numbers, they were all massacred by the Spaniards, and Barbarossa among the rest, in the 44th year of his age. Thus fell that famed corsair, four years after he had raised himself to the royal title over the city of Jigel and adjacent countries, two years after his making himself to be acknowledged king of Algiers, and scarcely a twelve-month after his treacherous reduction of that of Tremecen. His head, set upon a lance, was carried in triumph to that capital, where the marquis of Gomarez settled the king again upon his throne, not only without opposition, but with the joyful acclamations of all the inhabitants. Some few days after the fight, the king of Fez, who had, till then, artfully delayed sending his ally any succour, made his appearance at the head of 20,000 horse near the field of battle, as if he came to his assistance; when, upon hearing the news of his defeat and death, he marched off with all possible speed, to avoid being attacked by the enemy <sup>a</sup>.

THE consternation was still greater at Algiers, when this news reached the Turks that were left therein in garrison; and not without great cause, considering that they were not only surrounded with enemies on all sides, but that they were left to defend a city, to whose inhabitants they were become so justly, and on so many accounts, odious, ever since their arrival thither <sup>b</sup>. However, they soon agreed, as the most effectual way to prevent a revolt from that side, to cause Aradin, or Hayradin, the late Barbarossa's brother, to be proclaimed king of Algiers, and high admiral of the sea; which was done without any great opposition, though the generality of the captains, and some say Hayradin himself, were at first more inclined to embark their forces and riches upon twenty-two galleys, which was all their naval strength at that time, and to abandon Algiers, than to trust to the inactivity of the inhabitants: and this must, in all probability, have proved their safest way, had not the marquis Gomarez been guilty of too much precipitation in sending the emperor's forces back into Spain, so soon after his reinthroning the Tremecen king, instead of keeping them still in Afric; by which means he lost, for ought that appears to the contrary, the fairest opportunity of driving those Turks quite out of Barbary. Hayradin was too quick-sighted not to perceive the advantage which the removal of those forces was to him, in ridding his friends from all farther dread, and disheartening the malecontents from all farther hopes from that quarter: of all which he so well convinced his officers and militia, that they all resolved to stand by him to the last <sup>c</sup>.

HE was, not, however, without some just fears, that the Algerines, to whom his government became daily more insupportable, on account of the cruel tyrannies and oppressions which his officers exercised over them, would, upon the first opportunity, join themselves with the Arabians and Moors, and break out into some open revolt. He had scarcely held the reins two years, before he had such pregnant proofs of an universal ferment throughout the kingdom, as made him apprehend some speedy insurrection, unless he found some more effectual means to over-awe them than his few insolent Turkish forces, which were now detested by all his subjects. The more effectually, therefore, to secure himself against all events, he had recourse to Selim I. then emperor of Constantinople, to whom he dispatched an ambassador, with magnificent presents, to notify to him the death of his brother Aruch, and his own election to the Algerine crown, and to make him at the same time an offer of submitting the kingdom to his protection, and to pay him an annual tribute, provided the emperor would assist him with forces sufficient to maintain himself in his station and his new conquests. He was moreover to inform the Porte with the situation of the affairs in Barbary, and to represent to him how easy it would be to reduce that whole country under its protection and government; and last of all, if the Grand Signor refused those offers, they were then empowered to offer to him an entire cession of the Algerine kingdom, on condition that Hayradin should have the dignity and title of viceroy under him <sup>d</sup>.

SELIM, who had but a little before, by the conquest of Egypt, put a final end to the long usurpation of the Mamelukes, was highly pleased with this proposal, as it was so considerable an addition to his dominions, or, at least, to his glory; and sent Hayradin word, that he readily received him under his protection, appointed him his Basha or viceroy over the kingdom of Algiers, and that he would speedily dispatch to him a reinforcement of 2000 Janissaries, completely armed, which he accordingly did; by which means Hayradin became so absolute a master, both of the Arabians and Moors, that they were forced to become his submissive slaves, without daring to utter the least complaint against his government. After this he continued in Algiers without the least fear or danger, well guarded by his bold and resolute Turks, increasing daily in power and wealth by the number of his corsairs, and their successful depredations at sea: whilst the Porte kept sending him a constant supply of recruits every year, with money for the payment of his troops; insomuch, that vast numbers of Turks, who were either malefactors, or persons in debt, or desperate circumstances, broken fortunes, or on any other <sup>e</sup>

a account uneasy at home, resorted thither from the Levant, and gladly listed in his service either for the land or sea; so that in a little time the Turks under him became capable of suppressing both Moors and Arabs at home, and of opposing and annoying the Christians at sea<sup>a</sup>.

He was now at leisure to put two grand projects in execution, which he had been meditating for some time. The first was to destroy the Pegnon or Spanish fort, which was a great nuisance to his metropolis, or at least to force the garrison out of it: the other was to make that city a commodious harbour for his ships, by building a mole from thence to the island, in order to shelter them from the weather and the north sea, as well as from being within the reach of the fort guns; to avoid which, they were obliged to lie about a mile west of the towns, and without any good anchorage. As to the first, after having made several fruitless attempts to compass it by force, he at length bethought himself to do it by stratagem; to which end he directed two handsome young Moors to convey themselves privately into the fort, and to get admittance to the governor, under pretence of being desirous of becoming Christians; and these acted their part so well, that they were kept in his house, in order to be instructed, before they were admitted to baptism. They had continued there some time without the least mistrust, when, on Easter day, whilst all the garrison were at church, one of the governor's domesticks observed them both very busy at the top of a watch tower in making signals to the city by the motion of the muslin of their turbans; upon which he alarmed the garrison, which immediately put itself in arms to prevent a surprize. The two young Moors being seized and brought to the governor, were soon forced to discover the whole secret, and that they were sent thither by Hayradin to watch a proper opportunity for surprizing the fort, and to give notice of it to the town by a signal. Upon which the governor ordered them to be hanged upon a very high gallows, as a signal to the town that their plot was discovered; which so exasperated Hayradin, that he resolved to leave no experiment untried till the fort was either taken or destroyed. He sent accordingly a herald, on the next day, to summon the governor, Martin de Vargas, either to surrender the place upon the honourable terms he offered him, or expect the utmost severity of military law, in case he refused. To this the brave governor sent an answer, that he was a Spaniard, and equally despised his offers, and his menaces; which so exasperated him, that he swore upon the Koran, before a full council, to begin the siege immediately, and not to quit it till he had mastered the fort, or perished in the attempt. News being brought to him on the same day, that a French vessel was stranded upon his coast, and implored his protection and assistance, he readily granted it; but caused the cannon to be taken out, in order to be employed in battering the fort, along with the few field pieces which he had by him; and he continued firing at it with such vehemence, during a whole fortnight, that the walls and fortifications were almost quite demolished, and the garrison made so weak a defence, that he rightly judged it to be reduced to the last extremity. Upon which, The Spanish getting about 2000 musqueteers on board his galliots, he reached the fort of the place, and fort taken. mounted the breach without any opposition. Here he found the governor dangerously wounded, and the rest of the garrison either slain or wounded. He caused them to be removed to Algiers, and healed of their wounds; but some months after, either upon some dislike or suspicion, caused the brave governor to be bastinadoed to death, and the rest to be made slaves<sup>c</sup>.

BEING now become master of that important fort, he delayed not to put his next project in execution; which was to build a strong mole for the safety and convenience of his ships; in which he employed no less than 30,000 Christian slaves, whom he obliged to work without interruption; so that he had quite completed the whole within less than three years, without any expence to him. His next care was to cause the fort to be repaired, and a good garrison to be sent into it, to prevent any foreign vessels coming into the harbour, without previously giving a good account of themselves. These two important works added so much strength and wealth, not only to the city, but to the kingdom, that Hayradin soon became dreaded, not only by the Moors and Arabians, but by the maritime Christian powers, and more particularly the Spaniards, from whom they had been in constant apprehension of some powerful descent; whereas they were now in a condition not only to annoy all their trading vessels along the Barbary coasts, but likewise to make frequent and successful incursions upon their own, and bring from thence great numbers of prisoners, and other valuable plunder. Hayradin failed not to acquaint the Porte with an account of all these transactions, and to represent them to the best advantage, in order to obtain a fresh supply of money from thence, to enable him to build a stronger fort, and to erect new batteries in all the places which seemed most exposed to favour an enemy's landing. He made no request but what was readily granted by the Grand Signor; neither lost he any time to make those additional fortifications, both to the fort and the mole; all which have still received a greater improvements from time to time, as often as there was occasion for them<sup>y</sup>.

Succeeded in Algiers by Hassan Aga.

The Pope engages Charles
V. against him.

IN the mean time the Soltan, whether out of a sense of the great services Hayradin had done him, or perhaps, out of some jealousy, lest, after having raised himself to such a height of power and wealth, he should attempt to make himself independent, raised him to the dignity of Captain Basha of the empire; and appointed Hassan Aga, a Sardinian renegado, an intrepid warrior, and an old experienced officer, to succeed him as Basha of Algiers; who had no sooner taken possession of his new government, than he began to pursue his cruises and ravages on the Spanish coasts, with greater fury and success than ever, and extended them to those of the ecclesiastical state, and other parts of Italy. This soon alarmed Pope Paul III. and obliged him to apply to the emperor Charles V. and to exhort him to send a powerful fleet to suppress those frequent and cruel piracies. The emperor, on his part, wanted not to be spurred up to it. His resentment for the loss of the Spanish fortresses, the indignities which had been offered to his governor there, and the hostilities they continued still committing on the Mediterranean, to which we may add, the invitations he received from several Arabian chiefs, who promised to assist him in restoring the prince Selim to his throne, easily determined him to equip a powerful fleet, and to command it in person; in which he flattered himself with an easy conquest, not only of Algiers, but of the greatest part of Barbary. The account he had received of the situation, strength, and valour of those people, all contributed to confirm him in his noble views, as nothing, indeed, could immortalize his name so much as the suppression of such a vast number of sworn enemies to Christianity, and the reducing of those vast countries under the standard of Christ. That nothing might be wanting to render so glorious a design successful, by engaging all Christian powers to join in it, Pope Paul published a bull, with a plenary absolution of all sins, and the promise of the crown of martyrdom to all those who should fall in battle against those infidels, or be taken slaves by them, and a variety of other indulgences and blessings, suitable to the services which every one should do in so glorious a cause<sup>z</sup>.

THE emperor accordingly set sail towards the end of the summer, at the head of a powerful fleet; consisting of 120 ships and 20 galleys, and having on board 30,000 chosen troops, and an immense quantity of money, arms, ammunition, &c.; besides great numbers of young nobility and gentry, who came in as volunteers, and attended him at their own expence, upon the only motives of religion and glory. Among these were many brave knights of Malta, of whom we shall speak more largely in a subsequent chapter; an order of noblemen of all the nations of Europe, whose greatest ambition it always was to signalize themselves against all the enemies of Christianity; and who were ever ready to join in any expedition against them, and always behaved themselves with uncommon valour and intrepidity. Besides these, many ladies of birth and character likewise helped to increase the splendor and greatness of his court; and the wives and daughters of the officers and soldiers, who followed them with a view of settling in Barbary, when he had finished the conquest of it. All these meeting with a favourable wind, soon appeared before the coast of Algiers, every ship displaying the Spanish colours on the stern, and another at the head, which had a crucifix to serve her for a pilot.

nation.

IT is hardly possible to express the general consternation which the appearance of this powerful fleet threw the city of Algiers into. It was at this time surrounded only with a wall, without hardly any out-works. The whole garrison amounted only to about 800 armed Turkish soldiers and 6000 Moors, without fire-arms, and poorly disciplined and accoutred; the rest of their forces being then dispersed in the other provinces of the kingdom, to raise the usual tribute on the Arabs and Moors. In this distress the Douwan immediately assembled, to deliberate on the most effectual measures for defending the place. One of their first resolutions was, not to hazard their forces in a fruitless opposition to the enemies landing, but to reserve them within the walls, in order to make the best defence they could against their attacks, till the return of those detachments which were then scattered through the kingdom; to hasten which they dispatched expresses every where, acquainting them with their danger, and to desire them to make what additions they could to their number, in order at least to obtain a more favourable capitulation from the enemy. The place where the fleet came to anchor was near cape Matabuz, about two small leagues to the eastward of Algiers; where the army being landed without opposition, the emperor took his post on an eminence, and caused his standard of the cross to be set up at the sound of trumpets, kettle-drums, &c. whilst the rest of the army worked night and day with indefatigable alacrity in erecting a fort, which hath retained ever since the name of the emperor's fort. The army was encamped under the cover of the artillery of the fort, and near a spring which supplied the whole city with fresh water; whose course being turned by the Spaniards, soon reduced the inhabitants to so great a want of it, that

- a they were forced to make use of such a stinking fort as their cisterns and reservoirs furnished them with, and which would, ere long, occasion some dreadful disease among them. In this complicated distress the Basha Hassan received a summons from the emperor to surrender the place at discretion, on pain of being put to the sword with his whole garrison. The herald was moreover ordered to extol to him the vast strength of the emperor both by sea and land, and to make him very considerable promises, both of money and great preferments; and at length to strive to prevail upon him to take hold of that favourable opportunity to return to his native country, and be reconciled to God and his church, both which he had so greatly offended by his apostacy * To all which the surly Hassan returned this answer; That none but a madman would pretend to advise an enemy; but that the advised must still act more madly, if he should take the counsel of such an adviser; and with it dismissed him. Others however tell us, that he freely owned himself to be, at that juncture, wholly out of a condition to resist so formidable a power; but, as the proposal was no less hard on his side, he hoped his majesty would grant a few days suspension to deliberate with his council. His only view in this was to gain time, in hopes that some of his expresses would reach those flying camps, that were then scouring the provinces. As he had heard no news from those quarters, he was just upon the point of surrendering, when advice was brought, that the forces belonging to the western government <sup>a</sup> were in full march towards the place; upon which the Douwan unanimously resolved to defend it to the utmost. On the other hand, Charles receiving no farther answer from the town, and being sensible that the situation of the place would not permit him to block it up by sea and land, which could not be done without dividing his forces, resolved to try a general assault, which he could the more safely hazard, as he had taken care to dispose of his fleet so as to have it ready at hand for a re-imbarkation, in case of necessity. These precautions being taken, he lost no time to be beforehand with the troops that were coming to its relief, but kept a constant firing upon the town; which from the weakness of its fortifications, and the faint defence of the besieged, he began to look upon as already in his hands. In the mean time, whilst the Douwan were deliberating on the most effectual means of obtaining an honourable capitulation, a surprising scene opens itself to them, which makes them at once alter their resolution; and the assurances given them by a poor despised madman of a speedy relief, and of the total destruction of the Christian army and fleet, in some miraculous manner, before the end of the moon, encourages them to hold out till the time prefixed; when the prediction met with an accomplishment, no less surprising and unexpected, than exact in every particular. The reader may see a more ample detail of this wonderful prophet, and his speech and behaviour before the Douwan in the margin (G); for the truth of which we have

(G) This surprising person was an eunuch named Yusef, or Joseph, much admired by the common people for his prophetic gift; but no less despised and ill-treated by the great ones on that account, as may be gathered from the speech he made to the Douwan upon this occasion, and wherein, after some long preamble in praise of God and his prophet, he addressed them in words to this effect:

“ My lords, I am the poor Yusef, the slave of slaves, and most abject of Musfulmen, persecuted by the great, represented as a madman by our Marabouts; on which account not only my advices have been rejected, but myself treated ignominiously. The Cadi, who is the judge of the law, hath often made me undergo very severe and public punishments; and why? Because the Almighty, whose ways are to us unsearchable, hath sometimes given me an insight into futurity; and what I have hitherto foretold hath been thought unworthy of their regard. I have remained silent towards those that despised me, but have informed those poor people, who pitied and relieved me, of things of the greatest moment to them. But at this juncture, Hassan being ruler of our city, the public danger forces me to speak.”

Here Hassan (whom the present distresses had a little humanized, as well as the clamours of the people that followed Yusef had over-awed, they all expecting some great revelation from their prophet), bid him speak on; upon which he proceeded in words to this effect: “ Here is a powerful fleet of infidels, whose vessels are crowded with armed men, and who have come as suddenly “ upon us, as if they had risen out of the sea. We are destitute of every means of defence, and our only hope placed on an equitable capitulation, if equity can be expected from Christians. But God, who laughs at the machinations of men, hath quite other thoughts. He will release his people out of the hands of idolaters, in spite of all the Christian gods, be they ever so many. Lord Hassan, and you his ministers, and great men of the kingdom, and learned men in the law, I call upon you to take courage. Rely for this once upon the despised and abject Yusef, and be assured, that before the end of this moon, our God will display his glory to the utter confusion of the Christians: Their ships and army will perish in your fight, and our city be victorious and free. Their arms and equipage will fall to our share; and as they have already employed a vast number of hands, in erecting forts for our future defence against themselves, so shall they continue still slaves to us, and few of those blind and hardened people shall be permitted to return to their own country.” He concluded as he had began, with a kind of doxology, which was answered by the shouts of the whole multitude; which last proved, in all likelihood, more effectual in determining the Douwan to hold out till the end of the moon, than any confidence they had in his predictions (5).

Marmol, a zealous Romanist, hath indeed taken notice of this extraordinary prophet; but, instead of it, tells us, that there were at that time three prophecies current among the Algerines, which an old woman had uttered against the Christians; two of which had already have no other evidence, but a received tradition among the Algerines, though the history of a that unfortunate expedition hath left us the most authentic, as well as dreadful proofs of its accomplishment.

with rains.*

THE besiegers had already suffered greatly by the rains, which had overflowed their camp, damaged their provisions, and wetted their matches, so as to render their fire arms useless; of all which the governor being fully apprised, had galled them by his frequent sallies, in which they lost great numbers of their men, the Maltese knights being ever ready at hand to repulse them, even to the very gates of the city <sup>b</sup>. But all these losses were inconsiderable, in comparison of that which the fleet and army sustained on the 28th day of October, on which so dreadful a storm of wind, rain, and hail, arose from the north, accompanied with violent shocks of earthquakes, and a dismal and universal darkness both by sea and land, that the sun, moon, <sup>b</sup> and elements, seemed combined together to destroy them; whilst their ships, forced from their anchors by the violence of the winds and waves, either dash and split against one another, or against the adjacent rocks and shelves, in spite of all the united endeavours of pilots and sailors to prevent. Infomuch that in that one night, some say in less than half an hour <sup>c</sup>, no less than 86 ships, and fifteen gallies were destroyed, with all their crews and military stores; by which the army on shore was deprived of all means of subsisting any longer in those parts. Neither was this the only bad effect they felt from that destructive storm; for their camp, which spread itself along the plain under the fort, was, by the violent rains, laid quite under water, from the torrents that came tumbling down from the adjacent hills. Many of the forces, by trying to remove into some better situation, were barbarously cut in pieces by the Moors and Arabs; and several gallies, and other vessels, endeavouring to gain some neighbouring creeks along the coasts, were immediately plundered, and their crews massacred, by the inhabitants (H). <sup>c</sup>

BUT the most dreadful prospect of all was on the next morning, when, the storm being quite ceased, and the light returned, the surface of the sea seemed in some measure covered with the fragments of so many ships, and the bodies of men, horses, and other creatures, swimming on the waves. The sight of which appeared so melancholy and dreadful, that Charles immediately resolved to take the advantage of the present calm, to save himself and the sorrowful remains of his fleet and army; and abandoning his tents, artillery, and all the rest of his heavy baggage, to the enemy, marched directly, though in no small disorder, at the head of his army, towards cape Malabux, in order to re-imbark in those few vessels which had out-weathered the storm. But this Hassan did not permit him to do, till he had made him feel some fresh strokes of his fury and resentment. That subtle Basha, who had caused their motions to be carefully watched, allowed them just time enough to reach the shore, when he sallied out with his garrison, and fell upon them with such desperate fury, whilst they were in the midst of hurry and confusion to gain their respective ships, that he made a fresh slaughter of them, besides a much greater number which he carried away captives; so that they had seen the backs of their last enemies, and were quite freed from all fear and danger from this powerful crusado, before those troops were arrived at Algiers, which had been sent to levy the tribute; and, upon appearing at the metropolis, had nothing else to do but to join in the thanksgiving <sup>d</sup> <sup>e</sup>

been fulfilled, in the defeat of the Spanish general de Vera, and the shipwreck of admiral Moncada; but the third, and most fatal of all, was this of the destruction of the emperor's fleet and armada (6). But might not this turn be designedly given to it, to avoid giving offence to those of his church? Sure it is, that some of them have not scrupled to affirm, that this destructive storm was raised by some great magician, as we shall have occasion to shew in a subsequent note.

(H) Among a number of other instances of these inhuman butcheries, we are told of one, which serves as a taste of the barbarity of those coasters. The vessel belonging to Don Antonio de Carrero, one of the commanders of the Spanish Squadron, being one of those which were forced on shore by the violence of the storm, and split against a rock, a young beautiful Spanish damsel, richly clad, and bedecked with a good number of jewels, was cast on the shore, and fell a prey to one of those monsters of cruelty, who immediately ran to her, and having seized on all her rich ornaments, immediately butchered her; neither her tears, intreaties, nor her her extraordinary charms, being sufficient to move his pity so far, as to let her escape with her life (7).

A favourite nephew of the famed admiral Doria had much the like mischance in his own vessel; and was on the point of undergoing the same dreadful fate, when the emperor, who happened to be a sorrowful spectator of all these disasters, chanced to be apprised of his danger, and immediately dispatched some Italian companies, under the command of Don Antonio de Arragon, who came just in time to rescue him out of the hands of those murderers.

The land forces were in no less danger in their unhappy situation, having neither tents, ammunition, nor victuals, for one day; nor any proper assistance for their wounded; infomuch that the author of the account sent to Pope Paul III. assures that pontif, that he had seen five knights of Malta, and above thirty gentlemen volunteers, wallowing in the mire, their wounds still flowing with their last blood, and lying quite destitute of all kind of assistance (8).

- a and rejoicings, which the governor ordered to be made on that occasion <sup>d</sup>. Soon after this the poor Yusef was not only declared the deliverer of his country, but had a considerable gratuity decreed to him, together with the full liberty of exercising his prophetic function unmolested. It was not long, however, before the Marabouts, and some of the interpreters of their law, made a strong opposition against him, and remonstrated to the Basha, how ridiculous and scandalous it was to their nation, to ascribe the deliverance of it to a poor paltry fortune-teller, which had been obtained by the fervent prayers of an eminent saint of their own profession (1). But though the Basha and his Douwan, seemed out of policy to give into this last notion, yet the impression which Yusef's predictions, and the late accomplishment of them, had made among the common people, proved, it seems, too strong to give way to such an artifice.
- b And the spirit of divination and conjuring is since got into such credit and vogue amongst them, that not only their great statesmen, but their priests, Marabouts, and santouns, have applied themselves to that study, and have dignified it with the title of Mohammed's revelations.

- WHILST the Algerines were making great rejoicings at their unexpected deliverance, the imperial fleet was forced to weather out a fresh storm, which arose against them soon after they had gained their ships; insomuch that they were all scattered from each other, and several of them perished; one of them in particular, which had 700 Spanish soldiers, besides sailors, sunk in the emperor's view, and not a soul of them could be saved, the sight of which greatly affected that monarch, as it gave him cause to fear, that the greatest part of the rest, which were out of sight, might have undergone the same fate. At length, with much labour and toiling, they happily reached the port of Bujeiah, or Bujeya, which then belonged to the Spaniards, whither Hassen, king of Tunis, repaired soon after, with a fresh supply of provisions and refreshments, and met with a gracious reception from the emperor, accompanied with fresh promises of his friendship and protection. Here he thought fit likewise to dismiss the few remains of the Maltese knights and their forces, who embarked in three shattered gallies, and with great difficulty and danger regained their own island. The emperor staid no longer there than till the 16th of November; when taking the advantage of a favourable gale, he set sail for Carthage, and reached it on the 25th of the same month <sup>e</sup>. Thus ended this unhappy expedition; in which, besides the loss of upwards of 120 ships and gallies already mentioned, above 200 colonels and other land and sea officers, and eight thousand soldiers and mariners, either perished by the first tempest, besides those that were destroyed by the enemy on their re-imbarkment, or were drowned in the last storm <sup>f</sup>. As for the number of prisoners it was so great, that the insulting Algerines sold some of them, by way of contempt, even for an onion (K) per head.
- c The Spaniards undergo a fresh storm. The fleet reaches Bujeya.

- AFTER this signal deliverance, the elated Basha of Algiers undertook an expedition against Muley Hammed, king of Tremecen, who had submitted himself to Charles V. in order to be restored by him to his kingdom. But that prince, being now in no condition to make head against him, was forced to procure a peace with him upon his own terms; which consisted in paying him a vast sum of money, and becoming tributary to him; after which he returned to Algiers, laden with immense riches, the greatest part of which he sunk into his own coffers. Hassan was not long after seized with a violent fever, which carried him off in the 66th year of his age.

(1) The reputation and vast donatives which this poor eunuch had gained upon that occasion, had so far raised the jealousy and envy of the whole Maraboutic tribe, that they resolved, at any rate, to retrieve their lost credit upon the ruin of his. To effect which they trumped up one Cid Utica, or, as our Morgan will have him called, Sidi Outedoula, a Marabout, in high veneration for his frequent fastings, prayers, and other holy exercises, whom they affirmed to have continued in the most fervent addresses to heaven, from the first arrival of the Spanish armada, to the day on which the storm overtook and destroyed them; but that having on that day received a fresh inspiration, he went and gave the sea a certain number of strokes with a stick, which immediately after occasioned that fortunate tempest, which he had however forbore to divulge out of a downright spirit of humility.

The credit which the politic Douwan and great lawyers pretended to give to this cunningly devised fable, failed not to raise the veneration of this pretended saint to a high degree; insomuch that after his death a stately mosque was erected over his tomb. Since which time the Marabouts found means to persuade the people, that, in all the like dangers of an invasion, the beating the sea with a bone of that saint would be immediately attended with the like destructive tempest on their Christian enemies (9). It is not however unlikely, that they have had since many occasions for trying the vanity and inefficacy of it.

(K) This is at least affirmed to this day by the Algerines, who add, that the emperor, vexed at his ill success, threw the diadem he had on his head into the sea, as soon as he was got on board, with these words, Let some more fortunate prince redeem and wear it; and that many of their Spanish slaves and renegadoes still give out, that the kings of Spain look upon their crown as forfeited, till they can make themselves masters of Algiers (10).

of his age. After whose death the Algerine militia, without waiting for any farther orders a from the Porte, chose Haji, or Gbaji, an old officer from their own body, for his successor.
This new Basha had not long enjoyed his dignity, before he found himself invaded by a powerful Arabian Cheyk, named Abu Terici, at the head of 20,000 men, whom he had however the good fortune to overcome, and put to a shameful flight. Yet was he soon after obliged to resign his dignity to Hassan, the son of Hayradin, the brother of Barbarossa, whom Soltan Soleyman had been prevailed on to nominate to it; yet was he still respected by the new one, and all the Algerines, not only on account of his late defeat of the Arabian Cheyk, but much more for his gallant behaviour, whilst the emperor's army was besieging Algiers; for which it chiefly was, that they had raised him to that dignity without the Porte's consent<sup>z</sup>. He lived in this credit four years after his resignation, and died in the 80th year of his age. Hassan, b his successor, was born at Algiers, and was now about 28 years of age; and his father Hayradin, a Basha at the Porte, and great favourite of Soleyman, who had not only procured him this government, but obtained him a squadron of twelve stout and well equipped gallies, was welcomed at his arrival at Algiers with great demonstrations of joy. One of the first exploits after his arrival was, upon certain advantageous conditions, to set Abu Zeyen, the younger brother of Abdalla, upon the throne of Tremecen, in prejudice of his eldest brother, who had applied to Charles V. and promised to become tributary to him. To understand the source of this dispute, we must recollect that that emperor had settled Abu Hammed on the throne upon the same terms; who accordingly paid a regular tribute while he lived; but, after his death, his son Abdalla withdrew it from him*. After his decease, his two sons became rivals for the c succession. Abdalla, the eldest, applied to the emperor, and Abu Zeyen to Hassan; who marched accordingly against Abdalla, then upon the throne, at the head of a powerful army, and some artillery; upon which Abdalla, who was not in a condition to make head against their united forces, packed up the most valuable effects, and retired to Auran; so that it was with little or no difficulty, that he placed Abu Zeyen on the throne; who, on the other hand, to gratify him for this signal service, according to their agreement, was obliged both by fair and foul means to raise vast sums of money on his new subjects. After which Hassan immediately returned to Algiers with his forces, after the short absence of a few weeks, laden with a rich plunder and treasure. The new Tremecenian monarch did not long enjoy the sweets of his ill-gotten dignity; he having scarcely been seated one year upon the throne, before he was forced d by the Spanish count de Alcandela to resign it to his brother, and to retire to Fez, as his brother had been obliged to do before to Auran. The count, who was then governor of that place, had procured Abdalla a reinforcement from Don Carlos of 2000 Andalusians; and with these, and a great number of Moors, who came with their chiefs to offer their services to them, and some pieces of artillery, he marched towards Tremecen, and in his way was met with the brave Almanzor, uncle, father-in-law, and prime minister, of Muley Hammed Abdalla, who was waiting for him at the head of 5,000 horse; and, upon his joining him, entertained him and his Spaniards with a dramatic entertainment after the Moorish manner (L). After which both took their way towards Tremecen with their joint forces. Upon their approach to that capital, the Tremecenians sent to beg of Almanzor, that he would not bring the count thither, seeing they e were fully resolved to surrender the place to him, and drive the Turks out of it. To that the general sent answer, that the people, who had been traitors to their prince, deserved to lose their heads, and added, that he was bringing a set of Christian executioners to perform that office. However Hassan, the Basha of Algiers, found means to compromise matters, by sending a venerable fanton to him, by whose mediation a treaty was agreed on between them,

(L) This was a representation of a very late rencounter between one of the Cheyks and his Arabs, with a Turkish party of fuzileers going to reinforce Tremecen, who were defeated by the following stratagem; finding his Arabs unwilling to attack them, he went about to all the Adowars with a halter about his neck, and swore he would never take it off till he had fought with them; but, finding them unwilling to follow him, he dispatched six of the handsomest damsels he could get after them, mounted upon camels, crying out as he rode, Now shall I see what courage these gallants will shew in rescuing such beauteous virgins out of the hands of these Turkish tarpaulins, which set them all on fire for the onset. Upon which he caused a great drove of camels, trained up for such purposes, to be made march before them; which they did with such resifless violence, as he knew would throw the Turks into great disorder; who accordingly were forced, in their defence, to fire upon them as fast as they came; so that, as soon as the Cheyk perceived they had spent all their fire, he immediately advanced, and, breaking through their ranks, easily cut them all in pieces. This warlike piece was not only acted to the life, but decorated with other circumstances; particularly a scene of twelve women mounted on camels, and attended by their cavaliers, who came to compliment the Spanish Don, with the swollen titles of restorer of the realm, protector of the orphans, &c. in Arabic; which was interpreted to him, and accompanied with the loud shouts of the Moors, &c. (11).

a that the Turks should immediately evacuate Tremecen, and have a sufficient guard of horse to conduct them safely to Algiers, which was executed accordingly. After which the count went to lay siege to Mostagan; and Almanzor, who had declined to accompany him thither, marched directly to Tremecen. The Turks, under their safeguard, arrived at Algiers; and Abdalla was restored to his kingdom, though only as a tributary to Charles V.<sup>s</sup>

HASSAN Basha had not been long at Algiers before he received a fresh invitation from the restless Tremecenians to return to them, and even to take upon him the reins of their government, or to put them into such hands as he should like best; upon which he immediately took the field, at the head of 3,000 Janissaries, 1,000 Spahis, and 2,000 Moorish cavalry, under the Mulatto king of Tenez, and some artillery, and took the direct road to Tremecen. Being b come to the river Sagu, about four leagues from Auran, he was met by the Spanish count Alcandela, at the head of 6,000 Spaniards, and as many African and Arabian horse, commanded by the Tremecenian king, which obliged him to halt that night to give his men some repose, intending to attack them the next morning. A bloody engagement would doubtless have ensued, had not a French courier been dispatched to him by two galleys, with a letter from the French king, to condole with him for the death of his father Hayradin Barbarossa, whom a c severe fever had carried off in May last at Constantinople (M). The news of which so afflicted him, as well as most of his officers, that on the next morning he entered into a treaty with Don Martin, the Spanish count's son; by which he engaged to leave the king of Tremecen in quite possession of his throne, and continue a vassal to the emperor, without any further
d molestation from him. The treaty being signed, the Algerines stayed only two days longer in their camp, where they put themselves in deep mourning; after which they returned with their Basha to Algiers. This is the true account of that transaction; though the Spanish authors, after their usual manner, have turned it into a precipitate flight, as if Hassan had not dared to look the enemy in the face<sup>h</sup>. However, the Tremecenians were not at all pleased with this peace: they hated their king on account of his vassalage to the emperor, and his amity to the Christians, besides a great deal of mal-administration which they charged him with. This made them at length apply to the Sharif of Fez, and make him the same offers which they had done before to Hassan, Basha, who accepted them with so much greater readiness, as he had for some time a longing mind after that kingdom, which we shall see in a subsequent chapter. The preparations which he made for that expedition soon alarmed the Algerines, who saw with no small envy the swift progress which those upstart brothers had already made in those parts. Hassan, Basha, accordingly sent an army of 5000 foot and 1000 horse, with ten field pieces, under the command of a Turkish alcajde, and two renegadoes, with orders not to engage the Fezians till they were joined by the Beni Amar, a warlike Arabian tribe in the neighbourhood of Auran. By this time the Fezians, who had got within sight of Mostagan, were not a little surprised to see them making to the same place: so that Abdalla, the Sharif's younger son, who commanded them, seeing himself in no condition to engage, found no other way to avoid it than by turning his horse's head westward, and betaking himself to a speedy flight, leaving his camels and baggage behind him. The Algerines and Arabians, however,
e soon overtook his rear, which was commanded by his brother; and after a bloody fight on both sides, killed the young prince, defeated his forces, and carried his head in triumph on the point of a lance. The news of this disaster no sooner reached Abdalla's ears, than he posted away with his equipage and forces to carry the unwelcome news of it to his ambitious father; whilst the victorious Algerines entered and plundered Tremecen; and, in a general council, resolved to keep possession of that city in the name of their Basha; and leaving the alcajde
Sepher, with 1500 Turks in it, returned directly to Algiers, laden with rich spoil, where they met with a gracious welcome. Hassan caused the head of the young Sharif to be put in an iron cage, and placed on the principal gate of the city, called Bab Azoun, where it continued till an. 1573<sup>i</sup>.

(M) This old warrior, who Vertot says was above 80 years old (12) when he died, had, after his being recalled from his government of Algiers, given himself up to pleasure, and passed the rest of his days and nights with his fairest slaves: so that carrying his debauches too far, he was found dead in his bed of those excesses, to the great grief of Soltan Solyman, who appointed the famed

Dragut to succeed him in the command of the fleet, though without giving him the title of admiral, which he had bestowed on Hayradin (13). However, our author must be mistaken about the age of this last, considering, that his elder brother Aruch Barbarossa was scarce forty-four years old when he died an. 1518.

Algiers, and is recalled.

IN the very same year Hassan caused a tower to be built on that very spot where the emperor <sup>a</sup> had pitched his pavilion, when he made that unfortunate attempt on Algiers formerly mentioned. He likewise laid the foundation for an hospital for the wounded Janissaries, and finished a magnificent bagnio, in imitation of that which his father had built at Constantinople; but this last occasioned the loss of his Bashaship for some time: for having refused to part with the former to Rustan, a proud avaricious Bascha, in great authority at the Porte, he was given to understand, that his denial would soon be attended with the loss of both, as well as of his government of Algiers. To avoid so terrible a blow, Hassan immediately equipped six galleys, and set sail for Constantinople; but took care to leave his government in the hands of the alcaide Sepher, lately mentioned, a person of tried conduct and valour; who, from a mean <sup>b</sup> extract, had raised himself to that height by dint of merit; and who, during the seven months administration, behaved with such prudence and equity, that no one had suffered death, or even corporal punishment during that time; a thing till then scarcely ever known under that arbitrary government. He did moreover begin and complete the great bastion over the mole gate; supply the city with corn and other provisions, which had laboured under a grievous scarcity some time before; and did several other public acts both in Algiers, and in his alcaide-ship of Tenez, in which he died about ten years after, greatly esteemed and regretted. He was succeeded in that of Algiers in the month of April by Bascha Salha Rais, to whom Rustan procured that dignity, in revenge to Hassan, who had tried all possible means to pacify and reconcile him, but in vain.

Hassan succeeded by Bascha Salha Rais.

SALHA RAIS, the fifth Bascha of Algiers, and the first of Arabian extract that the Algerines, <sup>c</sup> in all probability, ever had, or ever will have, as they are now become independant on the Porte, had, among other exploits, accompanied Hayradin Barbarossa on several expeditions, and behaved with such valour and conduct, that he was become his particular favourite; so that his merit was very well known among all the Algerines. The first thing he signalized his new government by, was the reduction of the Soldan, or king of Tocost, or Tuggert, who had lately revolted (N); against whom he marched through part of the Numidian desert, at the head of 3000 Turkish foot, 1000 Spahis, and 8000 other auxiliaries, all with fire-arms, besides two or three field pieces, and other heavy luggage; with all which he arrived within sight of that prince's capital, before he had the least intimation of his being in march against <sup>d</sup> him. In this surprize the young king, not above fourteen, was, however, advised by his prime minister, and easily persuaded, to keep the city gates chained up, in hopes of some succour from his vassals and the neighbouring Arabs, who are mortal enemies to the Turks; but the Bascha battered the walls so successfully, during the first three days, that he made himself master of it by assault on the fourth. A terrible slaughter ensued; and the young prince being brought prisoner, and asked how he dared lift up his arm against the Grand Signor's awful banner, was glad to lay all the blame on his prime minister, who had, indeed, shewn an uncommon zeal against the Turks on that occasion; to reward him for which the Bascha, upon such conviction, caused him to be fastened to a cannon, and blown up into the air. The surviving inhabitants, to the number of 12,000, were sold for slaves, and the city was plundered and left quite desolate. After which Salha Rais, taking the young king with him, marched directly against Wargala, another Numidian principality, which had likewise <sup>e</sup> revolted. Upon his arrival at its capital he found it quite abandoned; the prince having, at his approach, retired with all his subjects and their effects, to some inaccessible deserts; only forty rich negroe merchants, whose camels the fugitives had taken from them, were forced to stay behind; who redeemed themselves at the price of 200,000 ducats worth of timber or gold dust. Salha Rais immediately dispatched a courier on a swift dromedary to the fugitives, with solemn promises, that if they would return, and continue faithful tributaries for the future, they should receive no injury for what was done; and, upon their return, kept his promise inviolably with them, not, however, without threatening them with another visit, in case they broke their own again; in which case they would find to their cost, that the Turkish <sup>f</sup> Algerines were not to be trifled with<sup>1</sup>. On his return, as he passed through Tuggert, he generously set the young king of it, with other prisoners, at liberty, on the same conditions and warning; and, if Marmol be right in his account, brought to Algiers fifteen camel loads of gold dust, besides a great deal of other valuable plunder<sup>m</sup>; and, in his way, rebuilt the now neglected castle, of which we may have occasion to speak further in the sequel.

(N) This prince, whose territories, the Spanish writers tell us, consisted of a very considerable city, and about thirty large towns and villages, lying upwards of 150 leagues south of Algiers, and producing the finest dates, was obliged, among other things, to send an annual tribute of fifteen black female slaves to the Algerine Bascha, but had now refused to continue it (14).

(14) Marmol, Haedo, Morgan, Alg. vol. ii. c. 8.

- a On the next year he equipped a fleet of forty galleys, brigantines, and other vessels, and A. D. 1553. made a descent on Majorca, where he met with so warm a reception from the islanders, that he lost, according to the Spanish writers, near 500 of his men, and among them some of his best officers. His next attempt was on the Spanish coasts, where he found every place likewise ready to give him the same welcome: at length, sailing towards the Streights mouth, he saw four or five Portuguese frigates of war, newly come from Lisbon, with Muley Abu Hassan, king of Bedez, vulgarly Velez, a pretender to the crown of Fez; who, after a vigorous defence, was taken prisoner, with about twenty of his Africans, and the greatest part of the Portuguese: with these he steered directly towards the Pennon de Velez; where the alcaide Meusa governor
- b for the king of Fez, thinking that he was come to attempt that strong fortress in favour of his prisoner, the king of Bedez, sent him offers to surrender it to him; to which the generous Basha answered, that being in alliance with his Fezian majesty, he was so far from a design of violating it, that he came to make a present of those prizes he had taken from his enemies; and that he was carrying his rival, who had been begging the assistance of Christian princes against him, prisoner to Algiers, in spite of all the advantages with which he offered to buy his friendship; adding, that all he required of him in return was, that he would not suffer his Fezian subjects to molest him in the quiet possession of the kingdom of Tremecen (O); but that the river Mullujah might continue still the boundary between Fez and Algiers, and that neither side may cross to disturb the other. This message, together with the captures and
- c cannon, he desired that governor to deliver to his master, and then set sail for Algiers °.

- By this time the two Sharifs had made such progress, and gained such power in those parts of Barbary, as justly raised the jealousy of Salha Rais; who, under pretence, true or false, that some Tingitanians had, by their order, crossed the Mullujah, and committed some depredations, raised a considerable army of horse and foot, and, with ten or twelve pieces of cannon, marched directly to the city of Tessa, or Tedza, about eighty miles short of Fez, where one of them waited his coming, at the head of forty thousand horse, and the same number of foot; an army sufficient to have dismayed a less brave commander than Salha Rais. But it is more probable that he chiefly depended on some alcaides in the enemy's camp, whom he had secured in his interest: for the onset had no sooner begun than several of them wheeled about
- d to him; upon which the Sharif was put to flight with a considerable loss. The Basha having left a garrison of 200 Turks in Tedza, led his troops on to Fez, where he attacked the Sharif afresh, who had by that time recruited his army. Here he gave him a second overthrow, and pursued him so closely into the new city, that he entered it at one gate, at the very time the flying Sharif was marching out at another, in order to retire to Morocco. The city was plundered as usual, only the Jews redeemed themselves with the round sum of 300,000 ducats. One royal courtesy, to use Haedo's words, he shewed to the chief wife of the Sharif and her two daughters, who were fallen into his hands, whom he caused to be used with all possible respect, and to be safely conducted to Morocco °.

- e He staid in that city near two months, till he had fixed Muley Abu Hassan, whom he had caused to be proclaimed king, upon the throne, and reconciled him to the alcaides, and then returned in triumph to his own capital. Soon after which, the governor of the Pennon Velez, afraid of the Fezian king's resentment, quite abandoned that fortress; of which the Algerine squadron having got notice, seized upon it without opposition, and left a garrison of 200 Turks in it; for which signal service they were amply rewarded by the Basha.

On the next year Salha Rais raised a new army, and equipped a large fleet, in order to lay siege to the city of Bujeyah (P). About which time Signior Strozzi, the Maltese admiral, arrived 1555. Salha Rais began sieges Bujeyah.

(O) We have seen a little above how the Algerines got possession of that kingdom under the bashaship of Hassan (15). As for Muley Hammed Aben Zeyen the then king of it, they let him enjoy the title, upon condition that he delivered up all the fortresses of it into their hands; to which he was forced to submit; and continued to live in friendship with that Basha and his successor Rais to his death.

Marmol, however, tells us, that the grievous oppressions and bestialities which they committed every where some years after, made the unfortunate prince so uneasy, that he began to apply again to count Alcandela for fresh assistance; but the Algerines, who got intelligence of it, raised such a storm against Hassan, Basha, as if he connived at it, that he was forced to put an end to it, and obliged that prince to retire to Auran with his family; where having lived about three years, in expectation of being again restored to his dominions by that governor, he was carried off by a contagious distemper, leaving only one son, six years old, on whom Philip II. king of Spain, bestowed some lands in Castile for his subsistence: since that time Tremecen hath remained in the hands of the Algerines (16).

(P) This fortress, of which we have elsewhere spoken, is, by most European writers, called Bugia. It stands about thirty leagues due east from Algiers, at the foot of a hill, and is commanded by several eminences, and was taken from the Moors by Don Pedro Navarro, an. 1510, and was still in the hands of the Spaniards, as well as that of Auran, taken by the same admiral; both arrived with orders from the Porte, that he should assist him with what galleys he could spare, a in order to assist the French king, Francis I. against Philip II. king of Spain; to whom the Basha was forced to lend 24 large ones, well provided and manned, which greatly lessened his naval strength. This was in some measure made up by a reinforcement which he received from the king of Cuça of 30,000 Arabs and Moors. Upon his arrival before the place, he made no delay of cannonading it from two eminences that commanded it; one of which he directed in person, and the other was committed to a Greek renegado. Whilst this was doing, a Spanish galleon arrived with a supply of men, money, and provision for the garrison; but was soon after sunk by the cannon of one of the batteries. By the eighth day of the siege, the fort El Vergelette being become indefensible, and most of its garrison being slain, the rest retired into the town. In six days more, the other had suffered so much by the besiegers cannon, that it was forced to do the same. Soon after which the governor, Don Alonso de Peralta, surrendered the town upon honourable terms, though king Philip caused him to be beheaded for it soon after his arrival into Spain. Salba Rais made a great number of slaves and rich plunder, which he sent to Algiers by sea, whilst he and his land forces returned thither by land, after an absence only of two months. Thus was this considerable place regained from the Spaniards, after they had held it 35 years<sup>1</sup>. We have elsewhere taken notice of a change that happened immediately after the surrender of it; viz. that the Weyd-el-quebir, which runs by it, and had its mouth choaked up with mud at the time the Christians held it, so that no vessel could enter; but that it was quite cleared up by the violence of the rains which fell the following winter, and carried all that mud and sand into the sea<sup>2</sup>. Towards the end of the year, the Basha sent his son Mohammed to the Porte with the news of his success, and some very considerable presents; all which met with a gracious reception, and obtained in return a reinforcement of 40 galleys and 6000 Turkish soldiers, which were to be employed on a private expedition the following year.

THEY set sail accordingly the next May for Bujeyab, whither the Basha repaired with thirty more galleys of his own, and four thousand men, on this intended expedition; which he, however, kept as private as he could, though it was suspected to be against Auran. The rendezvous was to be at Temendefust, vulgarly Metafuz, four leagues east of Algiers; where he was scarcely arrived, before the plague, which then raged violently in that metropolis, broke out in his groin, and, maugre all the remedies that could be used, carried him off in twenty-four hours. It is hardly possible to express the concern and regret which his death spread over the whole fleet: they immediately set sail for Algiers, where they buried him among the Bashas, his predecessors, in a sepulchre near the sea side, over which his unfortunate successor, Hassan Corso, his own brave renegado, caused a handsome dome to be erected, which was some years after much embellished by his own son Mohammed, who also became Basha of Algiers<sup>3</sup> (Q).

Janissaries.

IMMEDIATELY after his interment, the Algerine soldiery chose his favourite renegado, Hassan Corso, a native of Corfica, in his room, till they received further orders from the Porte. He was no less beloved by the Janissaries than he had been by the late Basha, under whom he had served as Beyler Bey, or captain general of the land forces, with great reputation; and yet so modest, that it was with no small struggle that he was prevailed upon to accept of the Bashaship. Soon after which, the fleet sent from the Levant, who were not yet apprised of Salba Rais death, arrived at Algiers; where it was resolved, in a grand council, that the news of it should be dispatched to the Porte with all speed and secrecy; after which they were immediately to steer for Auran, without waiting for an answer from the court. They sailed accordingly, with all necessaries for the siege, but had scarce began their hostilities against the outworks, when orders came from the Porte, expressly forbidding Hassan Corso to begin the siege; or, if he had, enjoining him to raise it out of hand: the Grand Signor, it seems, not hoping for the same success under that new Basha as he did under the old<sup>4</sup>. These orders, though brought by the famed renegado Ochali, were received with great heart-burning by the whole fleet and army, who looked upon themselves as sure of success, the garrison of the place being which were looked upon as thorns in the Algerines sides; Bujeyab in particular was defended by two castles, one built on the brow of a hill by Charles V. called since the Emperor's Castle; the other, called El Vergelette, commanded the mouth of the port; but neither of them in a condition to stand it out long.

(Q) Salba Rais died in the 70th year of his age.

He was of a middle stature, corpulent and swarthy, steady in all his resolutions, sedulous in all his warlike concerns, and successful in all his enterprizes (18).

We are obliged to omit several of his other wars, particularly that against the brave Moer, Beni Abba; being content, in a work of this extensive nature, to confine ourselves to the most interesting transactions.

a then very weak. Nevertheless, as they dared not disobey them, they immediately broke up, and returned to Algiers by land and sea as they came.

Corso had hardly enjoyed his dignity four months, before news came that eight gallies <sup>Tekelli sent</sup> were bringing a new Basha to succeed him: viz, the famed Tekelli, a principal Turk of the <sup>viceroy but re-</sup> Grand Signior's court: upon which the Algerines came to an unanimous resolution not to admit <sup>jected.</sup> him into their territories, but to continue Hassan Corso in his government, and to send notice of their resolutions to the Porte. Accordingly orders were forthwith sent to the alcaides of Bujeyah and Bona, on no account to let him come to land; and, in case he attempted it by force, to fire upon him; and let him know, that they were fully determined not to receive him as their viceroy. Those two governors punctually obeyed those orders; and Tekelli was repulsed from Bona and Bujeyah, and last of all at Algiers; which drove him into such confusion and discontent, such complaints and menaces, that the Levantine fleet, which was still at anchor there, began to fear the consequences of such an obstinate refusal. And as there never was a good understanding between these and the Algerine Janissaries, whose singular privileges they envied, but could not enjoy<sup>u</sup>, they agreed at length, unknown to them, to introduce Tekelli by stratagem.

They begun with expressing some fears, lest the new viceroy, provoked at their opposition, should come and set their gallies on fire in the night, as they lay unguarded and disarmed in the port, which would infallibly ruin them: but, said they, if you Janissaries will take care of the town, we will undertake that of the fleet, and keep a strict and armed watch on board our vessels, and so be safe on all hands. This being readily agreed on by both sides, their next advice was to send Tekelli notice of their resolution to oppose him one and all, and to insist upon his immediate leaving of their coasts: to this they also readily agreed; and Chaloc, called by the Spaniards Xaloque, their admiral, was appointed to carry the message to him.

He went accordingly; but, instead of the message, gave him a long detail of the arrogance, cruelty, and tyranny of the Janissaries, and of the necessity there was of suppressing their power, in order to prevent their shaking off their dependance on the Porte. Tekelli greedily listened to him, and gladly approved of the method he proposed to introduce him into the town. The darkness of the night favouring them, they came with their gallies to the mole gate, where they found the Levantines in swarms upon the marine, armed and ready to assist him. All this time the Algerine Turks slept safely, as they thought, in their beds, little suspecting what was doing on the sea-side; when Chaloc, entering the town at the head of 300 men, introduced Tekelli into the old palace, till the new one could be evacuated; immediately after which the whole city was alarmed with the shouts of the Levantines, Long live Soltan Ottoman, Tekelli, Tekelli. This soon roused up the Janissaries, who came armed out of all their quarters; but finding themselves overmatched, were glad to make as speedy a retreat. Tekelli seeing every thing succeed to his wish, marched directly to the new palace, attended by about 2000 musqueteers, and was met at the porch with great submission by Hassan Corso, who came to welcome him, and to assure him, that the part he had had in that transaction was wholly through compulsion, and against his will. To which excuses e he vouchsafed no other answer than an angry disdainful look, and ordered him forthwith to be secured.

MORNING no sooner appeared than he dispatched two gallies, one to Bujeyah, and the other to Bona, to bring the two alcaides prisoners; after which he entered into a strict enquiry <sup>Italian Cor-</sup> about the ringleaders of the revolt; but his predominant passion, avarice, seemingly getting <sup>so's cruel</sup> the better of his resentment, he readily accepted of all the bribes that were offered on all sides, and promised that he would put none to death, but the renegado Corso and the two alcaides.

f ACCORDINGLY, a few days after, the unfortunate Corso was condemned to the Chihun, or hook, a dreadful punishment, formerly described<sup>w</sup>, on which he hung by the right ribs three whole days, and expired in the most exquisite torture (R).

(R) It being then the month of October, and the season excessively cold, we are told (19), he continued begging of the Christian slaves that passed by, for God's sake, that they would throw something to cover him; but, as there are guards all about, none dared venture to approach him.

Thus died that brave renegado, if any of that class deserve that title, in the thirty-eighth year of his age, and in the fifth month of his Bashaship; a dreadful instance of fortune's inconstancy. He was interred near his old master and predecessor, Salba Rais: where his own renegado and generous avenger, Tufis, erected handsome cupola to his memory (20).

THE next that fell a sacrifice to the inexorable Tekelli was Alifardo, a Sardinian renegado, and a governor of Bujeyah; who, being reckoned immensely rich, underwent the most cruel tortures of bastinadoing, burning, scarifying, &c. in order to make him discover his wealth, and was at last impaled alive: the governor of Bona was likewise condemned to be impaled; but by the intercessions of some of the Algerine grandees, and a good round sum, had the good fortune to obtain his pardon; notwithstanding which, the cruelty of the new Basha to Alifardo, and the ignominious punishment of the brave Corso, their favourite Basha, raised a general resentment among the Janissaries <sup>x</sup>.

BUT none took it more at heart than his own renegado Yusef Calubres, mentioned in the last note, who was then governor of Tremecen; who no sooner heard the news of it, than he resolved at any rate to revenge his death, or perish in the attempt. The Turks which he had under him, and who were no less exasperated at Tekelli's cruelty, were easily persuaded to join with him in it; upon which he sent word to some of the principal officers of Algiers, that if they would assist them, or only promise to stand neuter, he would engage to free them from that tyrant. The plague then raged furiously at Algiers, which obliged him to remove to an old demolished town near the sea, about five miles westward, and this appeared very favourable to their design. Upon which Yusef, with 300 Turks and renegadoes, some say 600, marched with such speed and secrecy, that he appeared before Tekelli's pavilion before he had the least notice or apprehension of it (S). The fright which it threw him in would not permit him to consult his safety by any other means than a hasty flight, to which he betook himself, accompanied only by a few servants: but upon his appearing before the town of Behazou, he was still more surprised to find the gates shut against him by the Janissaries, which threw him into such a despair, that he betook himself with all possible speed to an eminence near the sea, about a mile and a half west of Algiers, where he took sanctuary under the dome of a famed saint that lies buried in it. Yusef, who had followed him closely all the way, was got there by that time he was dismounted from his horse; and, without any regard to the place, pierced him several times with his javelin, and left him weltering in his own blood. This action was highly applauded by his and all the Janissaries; and, upon his entering into Algiers, he was received with universal acclamations, as their deliverer from the tyranny of Tekelli, who fell a just sacrifice to his avarice and cruelty, in the fiftieth year of his age, and third month of his viceroyship <sup>v</sup>.

Basha, and dies.*

YUSEF, al. Joussouf Calabres, a Calabrian renegado, was, for this signal service, unanimously chosen Basha of Algiers, without the consent or knowledge of the Porte, towards the latter end of December; but had hardly reigned six days, before he was struck with a pestilential carbuncle in his groin, which carried him off in less than twenty-four hours, in the 26th year of his age, to the great grief of the Algerines, especially of the Janissaries, who caused him to be buried in the same grave with his late patron, the unfortunate Hassan Corso <sup>z</sup>.

AFTER his death they contented themselves with chusing a deputy only to succeed him, till the Porte's pleasure was known; and the person pitched upon was a considerable Turk, named Chajab, al. Tajab, who entered on his government with the new year, and behaved with singular prudence during the six months it lasted; and, upon the arrival of the new Basha from the Ottoman court, quietly returned to his former condition of a private man, till he was some time afterwards raised to the regency.

THIS new viceroy was the son of Hayradin, who had been forced to go to Constantinople, to justify himself against his inveterate enemy Rustan, Basha, and had the address to get himself replaced in his Algerine government. He arrived accordingly about the end of June, and received some days after the news that the Sharif had lately defeated and killed Muley Abu Hassan, whom Salba Rais had settled on the Fezian throne, and was got to Tremecen at the head of a powerful army: upon which he marched out of Algiers, at the head of 6000 Turks and renegadoes, besides 16 Arabs and Moors; and, being got within four days march from Tremecen, had the news sent to him, that the Sharif had fled towards Fez, as soon as he heard of his approach; upon which he turned out of the road to Tremecen, resolved to pursue him to the gates of his capital. There he found him waiting for him, at the head of a powerful army, in battle array. A bloody fight ensued the next day, in which the Algerines, who were vastly inferior in number and strength, were so severely beaten, that the Basha thought fit to retire on that very night, leaving a considerable number of fires to conceal his flight. He took his way northwards with such silence and privacy, that the enemy had no notice of it till late

(S) This quick march is so much the more surprising, as it was then about Christmas, the roads very bad, and Tremecen is above 300 miles west of Algiers: but, it is said, that he disguised his design, under pretence of raising of the usual tribute in the provinces of that kingdom nearest to Algiers, by which he might advance still nearer to the capital without giving any suspicion. However, one method he took to prevent a discovery, which was, to order all the Moors he either met with or overtook to be fastened to trees.

a the next morning ; and the Sharif let him go unmolested till he had recovered his shipping, in which he failed back to Algiers, much displeased with his ill success.

THE next year proved more glorious to the Algérines, though fatal to the Spaniards, by the death of the brave count d' Alcandela, and his son Don Martin de Cordono, in their unfortunate expedition against Mostagan, or Mostaganem. Besides the loss of those two brave warriors, and a great number of other noble Spaniards, a great many thousand more were made prisoners, and doomed to a most dreadful captivity. This sad disaster was chiefly owing to the count's redundant bravery. He had obtained a fresh supply of 12,000 men from the king his master, one half of which could only be transported at one time into Barbary, and arrived about the middle of June; the rest, commanded by his son, were to follow after, on the return of the transports, and did not arrive till the August following. Had he immediately marched with the first troops from Auran to Mostagan, which are but twelve or fourteen leagues asunder, as he was advised to do by several of his best officers, he would have found the place so weakly guarded, that he might, in all probability, have made himself master of it with little expence or difficulty ; whereas his staying for the rest of his troops, and moving by slow marches, gave the neighbouring Moors time to form a camp of 6000 horse, and 10,000 foot, and to join the Algerine Basha, who, at the head of 5000 Janissaries and 1000 Spahis, with twelve field pieces, had come within sight of the place before the Spanish army had fate down before it. So that now he was obliged to engage the Turks at a great disadvantage ; whereas, had he gained the town before their approach, he might have expected them either within or without it, as he saw occasion : but his excess of courage made him overlook that good council, as it would lessen his glory in proportion as it lessened his danger. The consequence of which was, that he lost the battle with his life, his army being totally routed, and more than 12,000 Spaniards made captives : among whom was his son, the brave Don Martin, marquis de Cortes, and a great number of noblemen and gentlemen. This fatal battle was fought on the 26th of August ; immediately after which Hassan, Basha, returned to Algiers, laden with laurels and spoils <sup>a</sup> (T).

ON the next year he was obliged to march against Abdalazis, prince of the Beni Abbas, <sup>Hassan marches against the Beni Abbas;</sup> who inhabit the mountains, and had discontinued to pay the usual tribute to the Algerine state. Before he proceeded on this expedition, observing that Algiers now swarmed with Christian slaves, especially since the battle of Mostaganem, he caused a standard to be set up in the bagnio, in which his own, who were no less numerous, were lodged, with a proclamation, that if any of them would turn Mohammedans, they should have their liberty, and enter into present pay, and be sent to fight against the king of the Beni-Abbas : upon which, great numbers of them, Spaniards especially, gladly embraced his proposals ; by which means he soon got an army of 6000 Turkish foot, 1000 Spahis, besides 9000 Arabian and Moorish cavalry. Abdalazis's forces were in no respect inferior to his, either for valour, discipline, or arms ; nevertheless the war was soon at an end, by an unfortunate musket-ball which went through his breast, notwithstanding his being always armed with a double coat of mail : his fall having so disheartened his troops, that his brother, who succeeded him, was glad to clap up a peace with the Basha ; which, we are told, he obtained, without engaging himself to pay the arrears,

(T) Marmol, who has given us a longer detail of this unfortunate action than our limits will allow us, and hath endeavoured to represent almost every circumstance of it more in favour of the Spanish count than our Spanish author, tells us, among other things, that he had no more than 6,500 men to oppose the Turkish army ; next that the want of provisions, and especially water, occasioned a great faintness, murmuring, and disorderliness amongst them ; and, lastly, that as he was attacking the enemy with his usual bravery, at the head of a small party of his men, his frightened horse rearing himself up, threw him flat on his back on the ground, where he was trampled to death by the enemy ; whilst his cowardly troops, instead of assisting him, only consulted their safety by flight.

Yet maugre all these palliatives, he has been obliged to give us some other particulars, which do but too plainly prove Haedo's reflection, that his excessive courage occasioned his overthrow : for, when informed by his son of the arrival of the Algerine Basha and his Turks, and advised by his council to fall upon them that very night, as they could not but be very much fatigued by their long marches, by which means he might easily rout them, and seize on their provisions, to enable his famished troops to go on with the siege, he only answered, that it was not at all convenient ; and when they represented to him, that if he did not, they would certainly attack him the next morning, he readily answered, they dare not ; if they attempt it, they are all lost : and, without acquainting them with his design, ordered his troops to be furnished with match and powder, and, after midnight, to decamp, and march to Mazagran with all possible silence ; which was executed with such precipitation, that a great number of their sick and wounded were left behind, and their doleful outcries were distinctly heard, while the garrison from the town were cutting them in pieces. He adds another instance of his martial rashness ; viz. that when he found it impossible to rally his scattered troops, he rushed, sword in hand, into the thickest of the enemies ranks, at the head of a small number of them, and crying out St. Iago, St. Iago, the victory is ours, the enemy is defeated ; soon after which he was thrown by his horse and trampled to death (21).

or even to continue paying the usual tribute to the Algerine republic <sup>b</sup>. The most probable motive of which singular condescension in the Basha, we shall offer to our readers in the margin (U). As for Abdalazis, or, as others call him, Abassi, he is celebrated by most historians of his time for his signal valour and conduct, and was for this in high esteem and friendship with Hassan, Basha. One remarkable instance of his bravery, which we cannot pass over in silence, is that which he shewed in that famed battle, wherein the Sharif's eldest son, Muley Cadder, who had made himself master of Tremecen, was slain. Hassan Corso commanded at that time the Algerine army; but finding his men averse to an engagement, and he declining to give the enemy battle, after a severe, but ineffectual reprimand, repaired to his own troops, rushed boldly on the Sharif's army, and, with his own hand, struck off the head of his son Muley Cadder abovementioned, who commanded in chief, and carried it in triumph to Algiers; by which the Turks became masters of Tremecen. In this last action of his life, he is reported to have stood the fire of the whole line of the Turkish foot before he fell; and in all others he always behaved with a surprising conduct and intrepidity. The only thing in which his character is justly blamed, is his revolting against the Algerines at this time, when he had received the greatest marks of friendship from Hassan, Basha, from the time of his return to his viceroyship; some of which were reckoned, indeed, very impolitic: for he had not only bestowed upon him the town of Mefila, bordering on the Numidian desert, with all its revenue, and presented him with some pieces of cannon, which Salba Rais had left there on his return from Tugurt, but had furnished him with engineers to convey them to Alcala, his capital town on the mountains. His revolt and ingratitude could not, therefore, but highly exasperate him; and though he made peace upon so easy terms, he forgot not to build some fortresses in such parts as would most effectually curb and keep him under, and, in due time, bring those mountaineers under their former vassalage. About this time the company of Marsilian merchants began, probably with his permission, to build a fort on these coasts, at some small distance from Calle (where the French have since settled themselves) that it might serve them both for a magazine for the corn they purchased in those parts, and for a refuge for their pearl fishery men. But it was some years after demolished by the Algerine forces, by order of some of his successors, under pretence that the French there had bought all the corn, which had caused a famine in their kingdom *.

ANOTHER impolitic piece of complaisance Hassan was guilty of, which proved of worse consequence to him. He had married the king of Cuco's daughter, and Alicaid, his favourite renegado, his niece; in consequence of which affinity, he permitted his subjects to come in droves, and buy ammunition at Algiers; a privilege that had never been granted to them, and of which they were so excessively glad, that the streets of that metropolis swarmed with those mountaineers, insomuch, that above 600 on a day have been observed to have gone out of it laden with those warlike commodities; which created such a jealousy in the government, that the Janissaries raised an insurrection, seized on the Basha, his renegado, and another of his chief officers, and sent them in irons to Constantinople, and accused him to the Porte of having a design to make himself king of Algiers (W); which was the more likely to be true, as they had tried all other means in vain to oblige him to recall his permission. In the meantime Bosnoc Hassan, Aga of the Janissaries, and Couza Mehemed, the Beyler-Bey, or general of the land forces, took the joint administration of the state.

HASSAN being arrived at the Porte, easily found means to clear himself and his two companions, and was accordingly set at liberty with them. But a new viceroy being sent to Algiers, * TASSY'S Hist. d' Algiers, lib. i. c. 9.

(U) The Beni-Abbas have in their mountains sundry narrow passes, through which the Algerine troops must pass, whenever they go their eastern circuit (22); so that whenever any quarrel or dispute happened between them, they immediately stopped their passage, which obliged them to take a vast, long, tedious, and difficult compass, through the streights of the Numidian deserts, which were inhabited by a brave martial tribe of Arabs, called Mautbi, which made it still more dangerous, as these last were seldom or never at peace with Algiers, and often terribly annoyed them in those narrow defiles: for which reason it was ever of the greatest importance, and is so to this day, for the Algerines to secure the former of these streights, either by keeping the Beni-Abbas under tribute, or, if that could not be done, by being at peace and in friendship with them, as it is likely to have been the case at this critical juncture (23).

(W) This jealousy and resentment was far from being ill-grounded, seeing those Highlanders are reckoned the most expert marksmen in all Africa; and among whom it would be a difficult matter for a young fellow to get a wife, till he was expert enough to shoot at a mark with a single ball with great dexterity and exactness; and are so extremely curious, that they will hardly touch the barrel or lock with their naked hand for fear of soiling them. It was, therefore, very impolitic and dangerous in him to suffer them to provide themselves with such quantities of fire-arms, which they might in time turn against him or his successors, unless he had formed some private design like that they accused him of (24).

a was no sooner arrived than he caused the two officious deputies to be seized and sent to Constantinople, where they quickly after lost their heads <sup>d</sup>.

THIS new Bascha was named Abamed, vulgarly Achmet. He was a great favourite of the Soltan, and a man of such known insatiable avarice, that, upon his arrival at Algiers, all ranks of people came in shoals to make him presents; all which he the more greedily accepted, as he had bought his dignity by dint of the money which he had heaped together during the several years he had been Bostanji Bashee, or head gardener to Soltan Solyman II. He enjoyed it, however, no longer than four months; and, after his death, his lieutenant Tajah took care of the state another four months, when Hassan was sent a third time viceroy of Algiers: such was his merit, and the esteem Solyman still bore to the memory of the two famed Barbarossas, b his father and uncle. He came accordingly about the beginning of December, attended with ten royal gallies, which that monarch had ordered his high admiral Phiali, Bascha, to furnish him with; and such was the joy of the Algerines at his arrival, that the very women appeared on the terrasses and balconies to welcome him.

HE spent the rest of the year in raising such an army as no Bascha before him ever had; it consisted of 15,000 Turks, renegadoes, Morescopes, &c. all musqueteers, 1000 Spahis, besides 10,000 horse, which the king of Couco, and other Cheyks, had furnished him with. His fleet was not inferior to his army, consisting of thirty-two gallies and galliots, all well manned and equipped, besides three French vessels laden with biscuit, oil, and other provisions. With this great armament he set out on the February following, with a design to make himself master
c of Marfa-al-quibbir, and its spacious port; and, on the 3d of April, began the siege of it in form, intending, immediately after the taking of it, to attempt that of Auran, which is but about a league from it. This last was commanded by the count d' Alcandela, who had succeeded his father; and the former by his brother Don Martin de Cordova, who had obtained his liberty at the price of an immense sum from the Algerines, and made now a most gallant defence against the Turks. The Algerine fleet arrived soon after that brave governor had thrown himself into the town: so that it was attacked both by sea and land with such desperate bravery, that they had made several considerable breaches both in the forts and town, some of them wide enough to have been entered on horseback. The Turkish standards had been several times
d planted on the ramparts, and as often dislodged. The attacks were daily renewed, and continued for several hours, fresh men being still sent to supply the place of those who were either wounded or over-tired, without diminishing the ardor and courage of the besiegers. Notwithstanding all which surprising bravery, the town, now in some measure reduced to ruins, must have fallen shortly into the besiegers hands, had not the Bascha been forced to break up with the utmost precipitation, on the news that the famed Genoese admiral Doria was approaching, with a powerful succour from Genoa, Naples, and Sicily. He arrived at Algiers on July next, and found the whole city in tears and lamentations for the loss of their relations and friends, who had perished at the inauspicious siege; whilst he, who, doubtless, naturally partook of the ferocity of the Barbarossas, silently rejoiced that it had rid him of so many inveterate enemies, especially among the turbulent Janissaries; and it is plain by the sequel that he
e was actually premeditating such another expedition, as would quickly rid him of all the rest <sup>e</sup>.

IN the mean time the Christian armada having missed its aim of intercepting the Algerine gallies, bore away for Pennon de Velez, their common lurking place, in hopes to ferret them out of it; but in their attempt received such an unexpected repulse from the handful of Turks that were there in garrison, that they were glad to sail away re infecta, and with no small loss and disgrace. On the next year the Algerines received a considerable damage and mortification by the loss of the Pennon de Velez; a place, till then, justly looked upon as impregnable; and which, in all probability, would have continued so, had it not been basely abandoned by their governor: but of this we have already given a full account, to which the reader may f recur <sup>f</sup>.

THIS loss was greatly regretted by the Algerines and their Bascha, as well as by Soltan Solyman, especially against the brave knights of Malta, who had had the greatest hand in the reduction of it. So that he was at length persuaded by his viceroy, as well as by the famous corsair Dragut, to undertake the conquest of that island (X). But of the ill success of this expe-

(X) What chiefly determined that wavering monarch to it, was the loss of a Turkish Maon, of a monstrous size and strength, and laden with an immense treasure from the east; and which the Maltese gallies made a prize of, after a desperate fight on both sides, on their return from the taking of Pennon de Velez, between the islands of Zant and Cephalonia (25).

dition we shall speak more fully in the subsequent history of that island and order. All that a need be said of it here is, that the Turks being forced to abandon the siege at the approach of the Christian armada, Hassan, Basha, returned with his twenty-eight galleys to Algiers, where he arrived about the beginning of October. From that time, till about a year and a half after, nothing of consequence occurred; but then, about the middle of February, eight galleys arriving at Metafuz from the Porte, he was soon after given to understand, that they were conveying Mahamed, Basha, the son of Salba Rais, to Algiers; by which he rightly concluded, that he must now take a final leave of that government; and, though contrary to custom, immediately evacuated his palace for his successor, whom he likewise presented with the noble bagnio he had built in that metropolis, besides a great number of Christian slaves; most of them noted artists in several faculties. He arrived soon after, with all his wealth, at Constantinople, b where he lived only three years longer. He died in the 50th year of his age, and 8th of his last Bashaship, and was buried under the same cupola with his father, leaving two sons behind him; the eldest of whom, named Mahamed, Bey, married the following year the daughter and heir of the famed corsair Dragut, who had been killed before Malthe (Y); and the youngest, whom he had by the king of Couco's daughter, and whom he left with his mother at Algiers at his departure thence for Constantinople s.

His successor, Mahamed, upon his arrival, performed several public-spirited deeds, which gained him the love of all the Algerines. He not only supplied that country with provisions, under the scarcity of which it had laboured for some time, but freed the roads from the swarms of robbers, which, in a great measure, occasioned it, insomuch that scarce a day passed without some public execution. And so little occasion was there for his martial genius, that he c employed great part of his time in hunting and hawking. The only expedition which called him abroad was to quell an insurrection at Constantina, the capital of the eastern province; where the governor, having attempted to force a young damsel from her parents, the citizens had driven out the whole Turkish garrison, except some few Turks which had been slain in the tumult. His presence soon reduced the mutineers; but his untimely severity, in selling all the inhabitants for slaves that fell into his hands to the highest bidder, was highly resented; and, in less than a year, cost him the loss of his government, notwithstanding the signal services he had done to that republic, besides those already mentioned. For it was, by his prudence and address, that the Fanissaries and *Levantine*s, two distinct bodies, till then eternally d jarring, to the no small disturbance and detriment of the state, were at length reconciled by being incorporated together. A bold stroke of politics this was, which paved the way to that independency and power which the republic hath since gained over the Porte, and the rest of the states of Barbary. He likewise added some considerable fortifications both to the city and castle; and seemed to have nothing so much at heart as to render that place impregnable; which may, in all probability, be the cause why the Porte, ever jealous of its dependants, did deprive him so soon of his government. However, whilst he was thus consulting how to advance the Algerine power and wealth, a bold Spanish adventurer, named John Gascon, a native of Valentia, was hatching a design against him; which, if it had taken effect, would c have occasioned the destruction of all his corsairs, and an infinite deal of mischief. It was no less than to surprise the whole piratic navy in the bay, and set them all on fire in the dead of night, when they lay defenceless and in their first sleep; and for this he had obtained not only king Philip II's permission, but proper vessels, mariners, fire-works, and all other materials necessary for the execution of his plot. With these he set sail for Algiers, at the most proper season; viz. in the beginning of October, when most, if not all the ships, lay at anchor in the harbour, and easily sailed near enough, unsuspected, to convince himself of it with his own eyes, and to view the port and their manner of riding, in order to catch them napping, at a time when the greater part of their crew were dispersed here and there in their quarters along the marine. He came accordingly, unperceived by any, to the very mole gate, and dispersed f his men with their fire-works; but, to their great surprise, found that they were so ill-mixed,

(Y) This young gentleman, whom Hassan had by a beautiful Corfican renegado, commanded a large gally of his own, being closely pursued by the marquis of Santa Cruz, general of the Neapolitan galleys, at the siege of Nazarin in Morea, was so mortally detested by his slaves on account of his inhuman disposition, that, as soon as they perceived the Neapolitans ready to board him, they immediately fell upon him, and tore him all to pieces before the marquis could come near enough to prevent it; and with him, in all likelihood, the family of the Barbarossas became extinct, since we do not hear of any issue either he or his brother left behind.

As to his marriage with Dragut's daughter, we take it from Haedo. Vertot not only takes no notice of it, but affirms, Hassan, his father, to have married her; but this last must be a mistake of that otherwise exact author, since he calls him there a young hot-headed Turk;
whereas Hassan was twenty eight years old when he was made Basha of Algiers the first time, which was above twenty years before the death of Dragut (26).

- <sup>a</sup> that they could not, with all their art, make them take fire (Z). In the mean time, Gascon Galcon's fire-works fail him; his bravado at the city gate; took it into his head, by way of bravado, to go to the mole gate, and to give three loud knocks at it with the pomel of his dagger, and to leave it fixed by the point into it, that the Algerines might have cause to remember him, which he had the good fortune to do without meeting with any opposition or disturbance: but it was not so with his men, who, finding their endeavours unsuccessful, began to make such a bustle as quickly alarmed the guard posted on the adjacent bastion; from which the uproar spread itself through every part of the garrison. Gascon finding himself thus frustrated, and in the utmost danger, had no other way left but to ply his oars and sails, and speed away with all possible haste. By this time the Basha, being apprised of the design, ordered four of his best gallies to go in pursuit of our Spaniard, with forced to sail away with all speed.
- <sup>b</sup> express order not to return without bringing him some satisfactory account of at least one of their vessels. Whilst this was doing at Algiers, the Spanish brigantines had made such speed in their retreat, that they found themselves twenty leagues off; and thinking themselves now past all danger, being quite tired and fatigued, began to slacken their oars and take some rest. They had not long enjoyed this respite, before that in which Gascon was, perceived one of the four galliots above-mentioned, making all the sail they could after them, and gaining ground every minute; so that they were again forced to ply their oars with the utmost fury and dread. This they had continued near eight miles, when, finding themselves overtaken, they were forced to surrender. The captain, who commanded the galliot, was a Greek renegado, named Delli Rais; who was no sooner apprised that Gascon, the captain and contriver of that design,
- <sup>c</sup> was in his possession, than he immediately tacked about for Algiers, without troubling himself farther about the rest, rightly judging that he was bringing the most welcome prisoner to Mahamed, Basha.
- ACCORDINGLY as soon as he was delivered up into his hands, Mahamed ordered a gibbet of considerable height to be erected on the spot where he landed, and ordered him to be hoisted up, and hung by the feet to a hook, that he might die in the most exquisite torture; and to shew his resentment and contempt of the king his master, ordered his commission to be fastened to his toes. The sentence was punctually executed, and the Basha's severity highly applauded by the exasperated Turks; whilst the prisoner, our author says <sup>h</sup>, bore this dreadful punishment with the patience and constancy of a martyr; for such he really reckoned him.
- <sup>d</sup> He had not, however, hung long in that excruciating misery, before Delli Rais, the renegado captain, who had taken him, came at the head of a number of other corsair captains to Mahamed, Basha; and, in the strongest terms, represented to him the injustice and cruelty it A strong representation in his favour. was to condemn prisoners of war to such dreadful punishments, alleging, that it was the ready way to provoke the Spaniards, and other enemies they fought against, to make the same reprisals; so that it might one day be their fate to be treated in the same inhuman manner, unless he immediately ordered his prisoner to be taken down, and proper care taken of him. They added, that as to the stratagem which he had contrived against them, it was no more than what one nation practised against another, and what they themselves would gladly try against any enemy, were it in their power.
- <sup>e</sup> By these and such like arguments, they at length prevailed on the Basha to comply with their request; and Gascon was not only taken down, but conveyed into the royal bagnio, where he was carefully attended by some Christian surgeons, and visited, out of curiosity, by people of all sorts and persuasions: but it was not, it seems, his fate to escape so well; great murmurings arose soon after among the people, which made the Basha repent of his lenity; and two days were scarce past since his release, before some Moors came, who pretended to be just arrived from Spain; and, whether true or false, affirmed, that it was the common talk and belief there, that the Algerines dared not hurt a hair of Gascon's head, lest their armada should come and blow their town into the bottom of the sea. At which the too credulous minister was so exasperated, that he ordered the unhappy Valentian to be brought forth, and hoisted up
- <sup>f</sup> by a pulley to the top of the execution wall, and let down again upon the Chinghun or hook; which, in his fall luckily took hold of him by the belly, and gave him such a mortal wound, that he expired without the least groan: nor did the Basha's resentment stop there; for he ordered the body to hang there in terrorem, as it actually did, till, being partly wasted, some slaves ventured to take it down in the night, and buried it privately in the Christian cemetery without the western gate. Thus ended the ill-timed project of the unfortunate John Gascon, which yet hath procured him a place among the Spanish martyrs. Our author mentions many instances of such kind of martyrdoms, which only serve to display the cruel and irradicable hatred which reigned at that time between the Morescos and the Spaniards; but which by no means disculpates the latter from the inhuman reprisals which they made on the former, if they were not the first aggressors: for if the evil grows still more desperate and incurable, unless one side think fit to put a stop to it, of whom may it be more reasonably expected, the Christians or Mohammedans? Nevertheless, if we look so far back as the time in which those mutual barbarities begun to be suppressed, we shall find that the Turks bid fair for having shewn the first example of lenity and humanity towards their captives and slaves.

made against the Basha to the Porte.

Ochali sent thither.

BUT to return: whilst Mahamed was exercising a quite opposite behaviour at Algiers, as he had lately done at Constantina, some of the inhabitants of the latter found means to lay their complaints before the Ottoman court; which, either mistaking such arbitrary tyranny in a substitute, or, perhaps, liking still worse the public spirit which he had shewn towards the Algerines, immediately sent thither the famed corsair Hali Fartaz, commonly known by the name of Ochali, in his room<sup>i</sup>, before he had governed that state full fourteen months (A).

OCHALI, commonly called in contempt Hali Fartaz, or the scald head, an obscure native of a poor village in Calabria, who from a slave and renegado (B), raised himself to the dignity of Basha by his valour and merit, if this last can be properly ascribed to an apostate, arrived at Algiers about the beginning of March, 1586, the following year; about which time the war against the revolted Morescos in Granada was at the hottest. So that, upon his arrival, he was strongly solicited by them for assistance against the Spaniards, and freely gave leave to all that would go adventurers at their own expence; but refused to send them any himself, alleging, that it more concerned him to defend well his own state, than to interfere with the affairs of others. And when great numbers of Algerines, who had engaged in that quarrel, had embarked a vast quantity of arms for that purpose, he would not suffer them to go; but, with much intreaty, consented, that those, who had two of a sort, should send one of them, provided it were done gratis, and not for lucre; and ordered they should all be carried to a certain mosk, that he might be a witness of their zeal for the cause. But here again, finding the quantity too great, he caused part of them to be conveyed to the city arsenal, and permitted the rest to be shipped away. In this first year he likewise laid the foundation of the fortress, called Babel-weyd castle; of which we have spoke in the beginning of this chapter<sup>k</sup>.

kingdom of Tunis;

IN the next year he signalized himself by the total reduction of the kingdom of Tunis, then under the protection of Spain, to the obedience of the Ottoman empire; of which transaction a full account will be given in the next chapter. Towards the close of the year, as he was

(A) Mahamed, Basha, was about fifty years of age when he was forced to quit his government, but went and served the Grand Signor against Don John de Austria, an. 1571, who defeated the Turkish fleet; and being then taken prisoner, with several other great officers, was sent to Rome as a present to pope Pius V. but was not long after exchanged for some Christian cavaliers, who were made prisoners at the taking of the Goletta (28).

(B) This surprising man made his first appearance at Algiers in the condition of a slave, having been taken prisoner at sea, and sold to an Algerine corsair; but in so wretched a state, so full of vermin, scabs, &c. that he was shunned by his fellow slaves. In a short time his patron, finding him industrious and sturdy, took him from the oar, and made him boatswain of the ship. He turned Mohammedan, that he might be upon the par with, and revenge himself on, the Lewantines that had affronted him; and having gained his liberty, and picked up some money to purchase part of a brigantine, he went on the cruize, and soon got to be master of a galliot, and passed for one of the best and boldest corsairs in Barbary. He became a great favourite to the famed Dragut; and from this time became known by the title of Hali Rais, especially with the Porte, whither he was sent to solicit fresh succours against the duke of Medina Celi, and the Christian armada, and obtained a reinforcement of 100 royal galleys, commanded by the famed admiral Phiali; of which expedition we shall speak more fully in a subsequent chapter, and only take notice, that Dragut and Hali Rais gained no small honour in the defeat they gave to the Christian fleet, an. 1560. He accompanied him five years after to the siege of Malta, where both signalized themselves; and when Dragut was there slain, the great admiral named him his successor in the government of Tripoli, in which he was soon after confirmed by the Porte. Thither he carried the body of his old friend and benefactor, and buried him in a manner suitable to his rank; and there he took possession of all his galleys, arms, treasure, slaves, and other effects, which were likewise confirmed to him by the Porte. During the two years and a half of his government, he acquired fresh wealth and reputation by the frequent and dreadful depredations which he made on the Christians along the Mediterranean coasts, especially those of Naples, Sicily, and Calabria. In the course of all his successes he forgot not his friend Phiali, but sent him continually some noble presents; for which grateful returns, that great admiral, upon the recal of Mahamed, Basha, from Algiers, procured him that government from the Grand Signor (29). So that he, entering that metropolis in a capacity and equipage vastly different from that in which he was brought in thither at first, we thought our readers would not be displeased with this short account of his strange advancement, and the various steps by which he climb'd up to it. We shall only add, that the name of Ochali is a corruption of Ali al-ali, or Ali the renegado; a term of reproach, which seldom fails sticking close to those who have apostatized. We shall, however, give him no other appellative henceforth than that of Ali, or Hali, Basha.

(28) Haedo, Morgan, &c.

(29) Iidem ibid.

- a entering in triumph into that metropolis, he was met by many of the Arabian Cheyks, who came to congratulate him on that occasion, to whom he at first gave a very kind reception; but to their great surprise, acquainted them, a day or two after, that he expected they should pay tribute to him, and help to bear the charges of the government's defence against all enemies, foreign and domestic. At which they were so shocked, being always used, till then, to be courted for their friendship and service, that they frankly told him, he must never expect any tribute from them, but what he should extort from them in the field, and lance in hand; for no where else would they part with one single asper to him. This answer did no less surprise our proud Basha; but, as the case then stood, he thought it the wisest way to disguise his resentment.
- b HE continued the whole year at Tunis to settle the affairs of that kingdom; and, in February next returned to his own government, after having left there, as his viceroy, a Sardinian renegado, named Ramadan Sardo, who became afterwards Basha of Algiers. He likewise appointed another renegado, named Mahamed Neapolitano, to act as field general, and garrisoned the city with 3000 Turks; after which, taking his journey by land, he arrived at Algiers about the middle of February. His design was not to stay longer there than till he got all his captains and gallies ready for an expedition, which was quickly done, as he had sent them orders beforehand; and with these he sailed directly for Constantinople, to solicit the Soltan for a fleet, in order to retake Goletta from the Spaniards; without which he could not keep long in the possession of Tunis, being the castle and main strength of that capital. This at last was
- c the pretended design of this excursion; but on a sudden he altered his course, to intercept four Maltese gallies, which were then sailing in the chanel between Malta and Sicily. The Maltese finding themselves surprised, agreed that it was the best way to try to escape; upon which three of them fled with all their sail and oars; and that, called the St. Ann, was the only one that engaged, and maintained a most desperate fight against eight of the Algerines during the space of two hours and more, and did not surrender till every one of the knights, and the greatest part of the equipages were either slain or disabled. From thence the Basha sailed in pursuit of the other three, two of which they overtook, and fought with the same success; and found them laden with abundance of rich merchandizes, besides some hundreds of fettered rowers, most of them Moors; and with those rich prizes sailed back directly for Algiers, where
- d he caused to be hung under the arch of the marine gate most of the Maltese shields and bucklers, together with the image of St. John, taken from the poop of their admiral's galley, as trophies of his victory. This did not hinder his being greatly embroiled with his soldiery, and being several times in danger of his life, on account of their not being duly paid according to their establishment; an omission which a viceroy of Algiers ought carefully to avoid by all means: instead of which, he suffered their resentment to rise to such a height, that he would, in all likelihood, have been assassinated, had he not kept himself closely shut up in his own palace, till he could get another fleet equipped, and made the best of his way after a new cruize. It was the month of April, the weather very boisterous; so that having the wind full in his teeth, and the incensed Janissaries at his heels, he was forced to spur his rowers to such a degree,
- e that some of them expired at the oar of his own galley before he could get out of their reach. As he was sailing towards the Levant, he received orders from the Porte to come and join the Turkish armada with his gallies at Coron in Morea, which was designed against the island of Cyprus, which he did with all possible speed, having twenty stout vessels, well manned and equipped, and where he was received by the rest with great joy, they being exceedingly glad to have such an expert sea commander to accompany them. It was in this expedition that the famed battle of Lepanto was fought, which proved so glorious to the Christians and so fatal to the Turks; and in which Hali, Basha, who commanded the left wing, came off alone with honour. Among other of his exploits, he engaged the Maltese Soltana with such fire and fury, that most of her knights being either slain or disabled, he boarded and carried her off;
- f and though he was afterwards forced to abandon her upon the total defeat of the Turks, yet he took care to secure the great standard of the order, which not only gained him great honour, but likewise served him in great stead: for, before he could reach Constantinople, to which he repaired after the fight, the Janissaries had preferred such grievous complaints against him as might have proved fatal to him. But when, upon his appearing before the grand Signor, he laid that standard at his feet, instead of a reprimand he was loaded with caresses and applause, and confirmed in his viceroyship of Algiers, with permission to govern that state by his favourite Memmi Corso, whom he had left there as his deputy, when he fled from the fury of the Janissaries, and had behaved himself with such prudence and moderation, that he had kept every thing in quiet during his absence, and gained the love of the militia<sup>1</sup>.
- g HALI, Basha, obtained soon after, by the interest of his patron, Phiali, a fleet of 230 royal gallies, with the title of Captain Basha; with which he sailed from Constantinople the following and success at

Arab Ach-

June. He soon overtook the Christian armada, and boldly challenged them to a second engagement; but these, for what motives is not easy to guess, unanimously declined it; by which, says our author, the Basha acquired near as much honour as if he had gained the victory over them<sup>m</sup>; and, at his return, became a greater favourite to the Porte than ever. But whilst he was on this expedition, the Soltan, who, it seems, had given him leave to retain the title of Basha of Algiers, was soon after prevailed upon to bestow that government on Arab Achmed, a native of Alexandria, but of Arabian parents; who sailed accordingly to Algiers in the month of March, attended by six Ottoman gallies.

Sent to the siege of Goletta ;
and succeeded by Ramadan Sardo.

At his arrival he found the people under dreadful apprehensions of a visit from the victorious Christian armada; and immediately applied himself to repair the old, and to add some new fortifications to this place; levelling to the ground a large and beautiful suburb without Beb-azoun gate, pulling down the gate, with part of the city wall, and rebuilding it with great improvements. In these, and other embellishments and fortifications (C), he employed the two years and two months of his government; which is the more remarkable, because the city laboured all that time under a grievous pestilence, which carried off near one third of its inhabitants. He took care, however, to secure the love of the militia, by paying them duly, and by other acts of complaisance, lest their prejudice against him, as an Arabian, should bring any insult or murmuring against him; but he was no less severe, even sometimes to a degree of barbarity, towards the Moors, poor patient slaves, who dared not complain. Towards the end of May he set out of Algiers with three of his own, and some of his friends gallies, being ordered to go and assist his predecessor, Hali, Basha, at the siege of Goletta; and, at the close of the same month, arrived his successor, Ramadan Sardo, a renegado of Sardinia, whom, as hath been already hinted, Hali, Basha, had left his deputy-governor in the city of Fez, as the properest person to keep that new conquered city in due subjection (D). This man, it seems, was so well beloved by the Algerines, that they had sent a deputation to the Porte, to intreat the Soltan, that if he recalled Arab, Basha, he would send them no other governor than Ramadan Sardo. At the head of those deputies, was Memmi, Rais, late admiral of Algiers, and a great favourite at the court; who, without any difficulty, obtained his request: and Arab, Basha, was ordered to the siege of Goletta, to make room for Sardo at Algiers. All this was done without his knowledge, insomuch, that the news of his advancement came to him at Kayrwan, where he still resided, by a courier sent to him by his friend Memmi from Fuza, where he had just then cast anchor.

RAMADAN received them with no less surprise than joy; and having left a renegado of his now to supply his absence, till the arrival of the Captain Basha with the Ottoman fleet, set sail directly for Algiers, where he was received with the greatest demonstrations of joy. His first care was to make the best preparations he could to assist his predecessor both at Goletta and Tunis, and Muley Moluch, in an expedition into Tingitania, according to the instructions he had received from the Porte. And, upon hearing of the arrival of the Captain Basha with the Turkish fleet at the bay of Tunis, about the end of July, he immediately dispatched thither his admiral, Memmi, with nine large gallies and galliots, well manned and provided; his predecessor being already departed with another squadron for the same service. The success of which was, that the Spaniards were expelled that whole realm with considerable loss, as will be seen in the next chapter.

A LITTLE before the beginning of the next year he set out, at the head of 6000 Janissaries, 1000 Zowvowa, or mountaineers, 800 Spahis, and twelve field pieces, for the kingdom of Fez, where he was to assist Muley Moluch against Muley Mahamed, king of Fez, who waited

(C) Among the former we may reckon the Fanar, or lantern, upon the island before the city, and standing on the castle, built formerly by Barbarossa, and which is still there to be seen; and the two noble fountains which run with a constant stream, the one without the gate Beb Azoun, and the other without that called Babel-veyd, which receive their clear water from a multitude of fine springs, which run down from the adjacent hills.

Among the latter we shall only mention the stout fort or bastion near the Beb Azoun, where the town is most liable to be attacked by land, which bastion is at that point of the city wall which runs out into the sea (30). He was seldom seen abroad without either a half pike or a cudgel in his hand; which he was very prone to make use of upon all occasions, agreeable to his original occupation of a driver. He was very cruel, not only to the Moors, but much more so to the Christian captives; of which our authors give us some shocking instances, which we shall spare ourselves the trouble to transcribe (31).

(D) This person had raised himself from a slave to that dignity, by his sense and good conduct. His patron, finding him a very ingenious boy, sent him to the renegado school, where he soon became master of the Arabic and Turkish tongues, read and writ to admiration; and, after having followed traffick for some time, his good qualities gained him the affection of Hali, Basha, who adopted him, and left him Kiayah, or lieutenant of his new conquest, where he behaved with great prudence and conduct till an. 1573, when Don John of Austria retook the city, and forced him and his Turks to retire to Kayrwan, as we shall see in the next chapter (32).

- a for him, at the head of 30,000 renegadoes, and a considerable number of Moors; all furnished with fire-arms, besides about 30,000 horse, well mounted and equipped; whilst Ramadan, at the head of his own forces, was met in his way to him by a reinforcement of 6000 Arabians and Moorish horse. We have seen in some former chapters a full account of the state and strength of this opulent city, as well as of its several reductions under different powers*; and shall only observe here, that it proved so much to their advantage and satisfaction (the young Sharif being abandoned by most of his forces, and forced to betake himself to flight) that, though he was at no farther expence or trouble than shewing himself at the head of his army, yet the grateful, and now overjoyed Muley Moluch, failed not to reward the Algerines and Arabs in a most generous manner; insomuch that the lowest groom among them did not go
- b ungratified. Among the presents which he also made to Ramadan, or, as it is commonly <sup>Muley Moluch's</sup> styled, to the Grand Signor's standard, was a purse of 300,000 ducats, with a considerable <sup>present to</sup> quantity of valuable rarities, and ten Christian slaves, which had belonged to this now van- <sup>Ramadan,</sup> quished Muley Mahamed.

RAMADAN returned to Algiers in March, and was received with as great applauses by his people as if he had gained a complete victory: but continued no longer in his viceroyship than till the 29th of June of the following year; when, to their inexpressible sorrow, and general murmuring and discontent, he was forced to resign it to Hassan Venedic, <sup>1576.</sup> Basha, a <sup>1577.</sup> Venetian renegado, a man of the most opposite character, after he had governed Algiers three years and one month, with so much justice and equity, that not one single complaint had <sup>Ramadan re-</sup> been heard against his administration: and the Porte was so sensible of his merit, that he met <sup>called, and</sup> with a most gracious reception; and was quickly after promoted to the Bashaship of Tunis<sup>d</sup>; <sup>sent Basha of</sup> where we shall hear more of him in the next chapter.

- HASSAN VENEDIC had been taken a slave, when a boy, by the famed Dragut; and from <sup>succeeded by</sup> him passed to his heir Hali Fartaz; and had imbibed so much of their haughtiness, avarice, and <sup>Hassan Ve-</sup> cruelty, that when he came to his government of Algiers, he met but with a cold reception <sup>nedic;</sup> there. He began his administration by some very tyrannic acts; the first of which was to compel all that had any slaves, from whom a good ransom might be expected, to sell them to him at a little more than prime cost. He next exacted a fifth, instead of the usual seventh part of all prizes taken by the corsairs. His next step was to monopolize all the corn, of which there
- d was then a great scarcity, oil, butter, honey, fruit, &c.; insomuch that the Fanissaries were not afraid to tell him to his face, that there was nothing to be bought in the markets but what was his, except onions and cabbages. He exercised the same tyranny on the Arabs, and African subjects abroad, on whom he levied a much heavier tribute; and what made it still more insupportable, obliged them to pay it in wheat and barley, of which there was a great scarcity, and retailed it at an exorbitant price. With the same avaritious view he turned butcher, money-changer, broker, &c. in all which he added cheating to extortion, not only towards the Algerines, but to all the foreign merchants; and had reduced the Algerine state to the most contemptible and miserable condition that it ever had been in. All these, and a great variety of other tyrannies and oppressions, the Turks bore with surprising patience, till he took it at length into his
- e head to curtail their stipends; upon which they preferred such grievous complaints against him to the Porte, and exposed all his cruelties, injustice, and extortion, in such lively colours, that he was soon recalled, and a new one sent thither in his stead, after he had been suffered to reign three whole years and a quarter<sup>e</sup>.

THIS new Basha was called Jaffer, Aga, an Hungarian renegado (E), who arrived at Al- <sup>and he by</sup> giers about the end of August, at a time when that metropolis, as well as the whole country, <sup>Jaffer Aga.</sup> was <sup>1580.</sup>

(E) He had been taken prisoner by a body of Turks, with his mother, and two other children; and brought from Hungary to the Porte, and presented to the Soltan, who caused him to be made at once an eunuch and a Musjelman, and committed the care of the infant prince his son to him. In which, as well as in all other posts he was advanced to, he gave the most shining proofs of his singular prudence and justice, and of his generous disposition to all mankind, except criminals. In consequence of which he had often expressed his utmost dislike and abhorrence against the rapacious behaviour of his predecessor; who, notwithstanding the many crimes laid to his charge, had the good fortune to come off scot free, on his return to the Porte (though not without being forced to refund some of his ill-gotten wealth amongst the courtiers), and to be, not many years after, nominated to the same government: where we shall find him again acting the same part.

MOD. HIST. VOL. VII.

During his first his viceroyship, there flourished at sea a famed corsair, named Morat Rais, and surnamed the grand. He was a native of Albania, and born of Christian parents; but fell into the hands of the Algerine corsair Kara Hali, who made him turn Turk, and brought him up in the piratical trade under him; in which he became so famous, that we cannot avoid giving a short account of some of his most considerable exploits against the Christians. One of the first was in a small brigantine, with which he rowed to the Spanish coast, and got back to Algiers in seven days with 140 Christian captives; which gained him a great reputation with the Algerines, and his own patron. His next was with Hali Basha against the Maltese; in which he had the courage to engage the Soltana, and was like to have been killed by him, for robbing him of that glory. So successful was he in all his excursions against Christendom, that he became formidable on those seas. Insomuch that, in was reduced to the greatest misery by a raging famine; insomuch, that 8,000 Arabians and a Moors are said to have died in the streets for want, within the space of six weeks, chiefly thro' the avarice of his predecessor. Notwithstanding which he let him depart quietly, on the September following, with all his immense wealth, amidst the loudest curses and execrations of the people; though he did not delay applying himself to the most expeditious means of relieving their present distress. The first step he took was to proclaim a free access to that port for all Christian merchants, both to carry on the usual commerce, which had been greatly obstructed by his predecessor, and likewise to treat about the redemption of captives, which proved an effectual spur to promote the other, and to bring in a speedy supply of corn, and other provisions; for having upon his arrival, sent for the fathers of the redemption, and all the Christian merchants that were there, he desired them to write to all their Christian correspondents about it, assuring them, b that they had not now a rapacious Hassan to treat with, but one that would deal with them with all possible justice and equity; for that, being incapable of having any children, he had not the least desire to accumulate riches, but rather to gain the love and good wishes of all under him, by his moderation and benevolence.

He proved as good as his word; neither did this his generous disposition make him in the least remiss against those who deserved a contrary treatment; so that, from the very first year of his government, he began to give some instances of his severity against them; and displaced his own Kayia, or lieutenant, on account of some just complaints preferred against him.

against him.*

In the year following, the Aga of the Janissaries, who was likewise come with him from the Levant, being accused of bribery and extortion, he caused a Douwan to be convened, and got c him condemned and despoised by a great majority<sup>a</sup>. Notwithstanding which prudent caution, both Aga and Kayia, provoked at their own disgrace and his severity, soon after formed such a conspiracy against him, as was like to have proved fatal to him. It was no less than getting him assassinated. After which the former was to step into his government, and the latter was to succeed him as Aga. A wealthy Moorish merchant was to have supplied them with money to bribe the assassins; for which, besides extravagant interest for it, he was to be put into some considerable post. Ben Delli, the treacherous Aga, had already gained so many Janissaries, that he thought he might venture to propose the matter to a meeting of their officers; but, to his great surprize, four of the principal of them cried out, that they would rather be cut in pieces, d than prove traitors to the Soltan, and his worthy Jaffer Aga. The consequence of which was, that those who had engaged already in the plot began to relent, and the Aga was immediately clapped in irons, and the news of it sent to the Basha; who caused the Kayia likewise to be seized. A grand Douwan was convoked, in which, though the two grand traitors had many friends, yet none dared to speak a word in their behalf; upon which they were both condemned, and privately strangled in a vault on the night following, which was the first of May. The officious Moorish merchant fled at the news of it, but purchased his safety soon after at the expence of 30,000 ducats, the sum he had offered to advance to the traitors<sup>b</sup>.

BEFORE the end of this month arrived at Algiers the Captain Basha Hali, at the head of six royal galleys, from the Porte, on an expedition against the Sharif of Morocco, who was sus- e pected of being treating of an alliance with the king of Spain against the Ottoman interest. This Captain Basha, who had been the greatest friend and supporter of his favourite Hassan, the late viceroy of Algiers, had suffered himself to be so incensed, by the vile insinuations of that renegade, against his successor the noble Jaffer, that he did him all the ill offices he could, by virtue of his present commission, taking from him a great number of slaves, vast sums of money, and other pretended necessities for his present expedition; all which Jaffer was forced to submit to. But, when he came to order the Janissaries to march westward to his assistance, which the year 1578, he could equip eight galliots of his own, with which he set out; and, in a little time, brought back with him the St. Angelo, and the Capitana of Sicily; which were conveying the duke of Terra Nova, late viceroy of that island, into Spain, with all his family and equipage. In the same year he made a descent into those of Majorca and Iwica, where, though stoutly repulsed, he brought away a good number of slaves; then attacked a rich Genoese ship near Alicant, with 90 Christians on board, all which he brought to Algiers, twelve days after his departure. In the year 1580, a few months before the arrival of Jaffer Aga, he surprised two gallies belonging to Pope Gregory XIII. on the coast of Tuscany. One of them, which was the Capitana, was the pontif's newly created admiral, who was then taking his pleasure in St. Stephano, and both of them had a great number of monks, priests, and other considerable prisoners, as well as Turkish and Moorish captives; all which he brought safe to Algiers.

In the year 1581, he attacked two rich Portuguese ships; one of which he sunk, and took the other, after a desperate engagement on both sides; in this last, besides a great number of captives, he found a million of ducats in specie, all which he brought to Algiers; where we shall find him soon after stripped of a good part of his prize by the Captain Basha, and slaves, under pretence of forwarding his expedition against the Sharif (34).

a he did chiefly in revenge to the complaints they had preferred against his favourite Hassan, they all unanimously refused to stir a foot, unless he produced the emperor's express orders for it. And when he told them, that they were only verbal, but that he could soon procure a written one, they bad him do so, and then they would obey, and not till then. This obliged him to send another renegado to the Porte; but they would not suffer him to stir out of Algiers, without a deputation from their own body, which he dared not refuse. So they deputed the chief Marabout, a person in high veneration, with letters to the Porte, representing the danger of sending Hali Bascha against the Sharif, from whom they had as yet received no injury or insult; seeing, if he should so far succeed as to expel that prince out of his kingdom, it would be no difficult matter for a renegado of his aspiring and ambitious temper to make himself master
b of all Barbary; especially as another renegado of his own was then Bascha of Tripoli. Whilst these dispatches were sending to the Porte, arrived the fortunate Morat Rais, mentioned in the last note, with his rich capture, of which the Captain Bascha seized on a considerable share, in order, as he pretended, to help the carrying on of the Tingitanian war. But, towards the end of July, he had the mortification to receive an express order from the Porte, on pain of losing his head, to desist from his expedition; so well had the Algerine deputation succeeded there: so that he was immediately obliged to depart with his fleet, and arrived at Constantinople towards the close of October<sup>d</sup>. Yet such was the inconstancy of that court, that, in spite of all the representations that had been made against him, and of all the crimes that had been laid to the charge of his favourite Hassan, he found means to get him nominated a second time
c viceroy of Algiers, as the only means he had to mortify and revenge himself against the Algerine Janissaries; and that vile and rapacious renegado was once more promoted to that dignity, to the great regret of all the militia, and the rest of the people; who had conceived a no less just esteem for their worthy Jaffer, though he had not been above two months with them, than abhorrence against his successor, under whose former administration they had suffered so long an oppression and tyranny.

It will not be thought foreign to our Algerine history to take notice, that it was about the beginning of September, of this very year, that queen Elizabeth granted her patent to our first d Turkey company, which then consisted only of four eminent merchants of London; viz. Sir Edward Osborn, Mr. Thomas Smith, Richard Staper, and William Garret; which patent was signed on the 11th day of that month at Westminster. And, on the following year Mr. Hard-bane, or, (as others write his name, Hardbroien, or Hardbourne), was sent first ambassador from her majesty to the Ottoman Porte, where he met with a splendid reception from Soltan Morat III. who likewise granted to our nation sundry considerable privileges, which the reader may see in the authors quoted in the margin<sup>e</sup>. At which time his excellency Mr. Hardbane appointed Mr. John Tinton consul at Algiers, who was the first that ever bore that character<sup>f</sup>.

BUT to return to our new Bascha; he arrived at Algiers towards the end of May of the same year, attended by eleven gallies, seven of which were his own, and the rest the Captain Bascha's. Not long after came in Morat Rais with upwards of 500 Spanish captives of both sexes, which e he brought from the coasts of Spain. Upon which the new Bascha took occasion to call together all the other Algerine Rais or captains, and told them, that they were all, except this Morat, a pack of idle cowardly drones; that he himself would shew them how to go a cruising, and ordered them to get all their vessels ready, which was quickly done; so that 22 gallies and galliots were equipped, to which he joined his own eleven. These all set sail together towards the coasts of Sardinia; where they made descents in several towns, as they were directed by f their Sardinian slaves, who were, for the most part, ready to sacrifice their country for the sake of regaining their liberty (F); and from which they brought away above 1,500 captives. Thence they sailed towards Genoa, where they broke into a town called Sori, whence they brought away about 150 more; of which prince Andrea Doria, who arrived at Genoa the night before, getting intelligence, he sailed in pursuit of him with his seventeen gallies; but Hassan, getting the wind of him, struck away for the coasts of Provence. We need not tell our readers, that in all these expeditions, how cautiously soever carried on, they frequently meet with a stout repulse, and lose many of their men, which are either killed or taken. Those maritime towns

(F) It is we find a common, though melancholy, practice among those slaves, of all countries, to betray their own native place, and occasion the captivity of perhaps some hundreds of their own countrymen, or even townsmen, for the sake of obtaining their own freedom; so that these wretches will offer themselves of their own accord, to direct them the way to it. But as some of them, out of remorse, have tried to make their escape before the ship could reach the place, it is now a common rule amongst those corsairs, to pinion those volunteers very closely, and to give the end of the rope that ties them in charge to three or four Turks, from whom they are not to be released, till they have performed their engagement (36).

being accustomed to such visits, easily taking the alarm, and raising a numerous posse of horse <sup>a</sup> and foot to oppose or pursue them; the very women, on such occasions, pelting them with large stones from the tops of the houses, and killing them in the streets, as was the case in this expedition we are speaking of. But his most profitable excursion was on the Spanish coasts, to which he had been invited by the Moreiscos, from whence he transported no less than 2,000 men, women, and children, with an immense wealth, into Barbary; and was liberally paid for his trouble. In his return he met with a Ragusan trader, laden with corn, whom he obliged to redeem himself, and cargo, at the price of 9,000 ducats; and being all now well satisfied with their good fortune, he led them triumphant into Algiers, after having been near three months out; and then asked his captains, Who was the better corsair, he or they? <sup>b</sup>

AFTER this we hear nothing of any extortions or cruelties at home; perhaps he was afraid <sup>b</sup> of fresh complaints being sent to the Porte. But what wealth he could not amass by that, he did in the trading way, being represented as a very notable merchant, tho' far from a fair dealer. This did not, however, hinder his being recalled, sooner than he could have wished; at the news of which he could not refrain from tears. However, before he went away, he granted a pass to one Singleton, an English merchant, which hath been preserved to us by the authors lately quoted <sup>h</sup>; and which, giving us some insight into our affairs in those parts at that time, and being written in a style agreeable to his haughty disposition, our readers will not be displeased to see at full length in the margin (G). He departed in the month of May with his own gallies, which he had augmented by that time to twelve, together with the four which had brought the new Basha to his new government of Tripoli, to which he was commissioned by the Porte, after a short administration of less than one year at Algiers. We find little more of him, except that he staid two whole years at Tripoli in great credit; after which his patron, who was now grown aged, and willing to retreat, obtained for him the commission of Captain Basha, in which post he did great damage to the Christian merchants, and was at length poisoned at Constantinople by the famous renegado Cigala, who succeeded him in that post <sup>c</sup>.

THE new Basha was called Memmi Arnaud, that is, the Albanian; but not the same whom we have had occasion to mention a little higher, as admiral of Algiers, but another of the same name and country, as we shall see in the sequel. He formerly belonged to Kara Hali, Morat Rais's patron, and was become a famous corsair, and had behaved with so much prudence and conduct, that, upon the Soltan's removing Hassen from Algiers to Tripoli, the Captain Basha recommended him as a proper person to succeed him in that government. He was accordingly sent thither, as hath been already hinted; and, after his arrival, gave signal proofs both of his great capacity and strict justice; so that he failed not giving great satisfaction, not only to the Algerines, but to those Christian merchants who traded with them. On the second year of his government, Sir Edward Osborn, then lord mayor of London, having been informed, that some of the Algerine corsairs had engaged and sunk one of the ships belonging to the Turkey company, contrary to the treaty of commerce concluded at the Porte, sent him a letter of complaint, the substance of which the reader may see in the margin (H), by which he may judge what <sup>d</sup>

- a what regard that piratic crew paid to the orders of the Soltan. On September following, the queen was pleased to write another letter to the Grand Signor on the same subject; in which, besides the complaint above-mentioned against the Algerine corsairs, another was subjoined against the Basba of Tripoli, who had seized on an English ship called the Jesus, which came thither to buy oils: which produced an express order from the Soltan to that Basba for the restitution of the said ship and effects, on that same year; and a fresh one from the English ambassador to him, dated January of the following year, to the same purport<sup>k</sup>. But whether these orders were complied with or no, we are told. But we meet with, in the same author, another express order from the same Soltan, directed to the viceroys of Algiers, Tunis, and Tripoli, dated June 1, 1584, for the quiet passing and repassing, &c. of her majesty's subjects through all his dominions; for the further particulars of which we shall refer our reader to the authors above quoted, where he will find several other valuable pieces relating to the same subject, which we cannot allow room for in this extensive work. On the year following Morat Rais, being, as is most probably conjectured, spurred on and directed by some Christian slave or renegado, ventured, the first of all the Algerine and other Barbary corsairs, to sail thro' the Streights of Gibraltar, and out of the Mediterranean into the Atlantic ocean, and thence to the Canaries. His squadron had just reached the height of those islands, when his pilot told him he was afraid they had overshot the mark; upon which Morat told him, that, though he had never been there, he was sure that they were in the right road, and bid him steer on; soon after which they got sight of Lancelota. They staid at some distance, till night prevented their being perceived; and then made a descent into the island with 250 fuzileers, where they ravaged without opposition, and carried off, besides a considerable plunder, about 300 captives, among whom were the mother, wife, and daughter, of the governor, the count himself narrowly escaping being one of the number. This done, Morat, as usual in such cases, stood aloof, and hung out the flag of truce, for the islanders to come and redeem what they pleased, or could, of his captives; so that none staid behind, but those who were either friendless or penniless. How many and how much he got by those that were redeemed, we are not told; but, in his return, he was informed, that the admiral of the Spanish gallies, Don Martin Padilla, was waiting for him at the Streights mouth, at the head of 18 sail, to punish him for his insolent attempting to sail where no Barbary corsair had before ventured. Morat, though naturally rash, yet though it more adviseable, at this juncture, to retire to Larach, a Morroco sea-port, where he continued near a month. At length, taking the advantage of a stormy night, when he rightly supposed the Spanish admiral would take shelter in some port, he ventured to sail through the Streights; and, being got over them, fired a gun, to give him notice that he need wait no longer for him. In his return he met with Memmi Basba, who acquainted him with the news of his son's death, which so affected him, that he sailed directly for Algiers, after an absence of four months. But neither the loud welcomes he received there, nor the congratulations he met with on account of his being the first conductor into the Atlantic, could console him for the loss of his darling son<sup>l</sup>. We find nothing else worth mentioning concerning him, during the two years of Memmi's government, except that his rapacious successor Achmed, upon his arrival, exacted a fine of him of 30,000 ducats; which not being well able to pay, he was forced to get away privately to Temendefust in one of his gallies, leaving his wife and children behind; whom that griping Basba, however, suffered to follow him in another galley. This unexpected favour so highly obliged Memmi, that he generously sent him 25,000 ducats by the same galley, with a note for the rest, for which his namesake and countryman Memmi Arnaud, the admiral formerly mentioned, and the brave Morat Rais, became sureties. After this he set sail from Temendefust to Tunis, the new government to which he had been commissioned by the Porte; where, having governed three years, he was removed to Tripoli, of which he was twice viceroy; and in both governments gained the love and applause both of the soldiery and people, by his justice, courteousness, and affability, which he extended even to Christians, contrary to the practice of most renegadoes<sup>m</sup>.

ACHMED, a native Turk of noble descent, but extremely haughty and avaritious, purchased the a viceroyship of Algiers with a large sum; no wonder therefore he began his government by such a violent extortion on his predecessors. The next thing he did was to forbid his cruising captains to stir out, till he himself was ready to sail at their head, and make such another expedition against the Christians, as Hassen Basha had done; adding, in a haughty tone, that if that renegade had been so successful in his, surely they might expect something better under him, who was so far superior to that caitiff. He set sail accordingly, in June 1537, with 11 gallies and galliots, and made directly to the small island of Galita, thence to Biserta, and to Maritimo, near Trapani, in Sicily. His next course was, through the gulph of Naples, to the Roman territory; where himself leaped on shore at the head of his men in hopes of some great booty; but was soon glad to retire, and flee for his life; the prince Andrea Doria, being then sailing b for Naples, with all his family on board seven royal gallies, giving him a furious chase, till night put an end to it.

ACHMED, having thus happily slipped away from him, sailed to the gulph of St. Florentine, plundered Faringola, and brought away 240 captives; thence he ranged along the coasts of Tuscany, Genoa, Provence, and Spain; but without any great success, the people every where taking the alarm; so that, being weary of his cruising, he returned to Algiers towards the end of August, after ten weeks absence. This was the only excursion he made in person during his three years government, though he still continued sending out his captains at all proper seasons, who seldom failed of success. The share he had in those prizes prevented, perhaps, his oppressing the people, as several of his predecessors had done; so that, upon his leaving c that government for that of Tripoli, where he was to succeed the brave Memmi, he went off with a good character; neither doth it appear, that the Algerines were much dissatisfied with his administration.

Achmed succeeded by Hidir. 1589.

His successor, Hidir Basha, a native Turk, who had also purchased that government by dint of money, arrived at Algiers in August, the same month in which Achmed had left it. About a week after arrived the famed Morat Rais, bringing in a noble Maltese galley, which he had taken after a bloody engagement on both sides, together with some smaller prizes which he had made, after his parting in great anger with his friend Memmi the Algerine general (I). His Maltese prize was reckoned so considerable an exploit, that he was received with joyful acclamations; and the Basha himself, who was no stranger to his character, sent a guard of Janis- d saries, and his own horse, to conduct him to the palace, where he was received with great pomp and triumph; whilst the news of so bold an action, considering the superiority and bravery of the enemy he had engaged with, made no less a noise all over Christendom. The reputation which he gained on this occasion not a little mortified admiral Memmi, who, arriving a little time after from his cruise, in which he had but a slender success, was every where upbraided with the loss he had sustained, by not following Morat's advice.

A revolt raised by a fanton at Tripoli.

In the mean time a noted fanton, named Sidi Chayah, encouraged by the king of Spain, and the grand master of Malta, had raised a terrible revolt in Tripoli. He had already raised a considerable number of forces, which were to be augmented by large reinforcements from Spain and Sicily, together with a supply of warlike ammunition. The city of Tripoli was in a manner e invested, and kept in continual alarms, besides being almost reduced to a famine for want of provisions; whilst the promised supplies, which were to set up our fanton lord paramount of that kingdom, or, in truer English, a tributary viceroy to the Spanish king, were daily ex-

(I) These two, having joined their forces together, which consisted of four galliots, were on a cruise round the coasts of Sardinia; where they perceived, near Monte Christo, four gallies belonging to Pope Sixtus V. which were sailing at some small distance from them. Upon which Morat, always bold, cried out to his company, come every man to his bird. But Memmi, more cautious, did not think it advisable with their four galliots to engage an equal number of such stout gallies. The other two were of his mind; and, in spite of all he could say to encourage them, one and all declined the engagement. And no wonder they should, seeing Memmi, who commanded in the admiral, which was the best of all the three, was the first who refused to fight.

However, Morat could not forbear expressing his resentment in warm terms; after which, parting with them, he steered his course towards the coasts of Puglia, where he furiously engaged and took a large trader of thirty guns; but finding the cargo to be chiefly ballast, he only took the guns, men, and ammunition; and by that means was the better enabled to overtake and engage the Maltese galley, which made all the sail it could to escape him; for the captain under the notion, or perhaps pretence, that Morat had more ships following him, could not be prevailed upon to slacken his flight, notwithstanding his watch still assured him that there were no more than one after him. At length, his being nearly overtaken by him, and no other ship appearing, he thought fit to face about in his own defence. He made, however, a gallant and obstinate one; nor did he yield, till all his gunners, and other serviceable men, were either disabled or killed, and the few survivors obliged to surrender themselves to that dog Morat (as our author styles him) and to exchange seats with the Turks and Moors, there chained to the oar (36).

a pecked. But all that he could obtain from his catholic allies, to support him in his rebellion, was a Maltese brigantine, laden with powder, ball, and other such provisions. In the mean time the Porte, being informed of what passed there, had ordered the admiral, Hassén Bascha, to repair thither with 60 gallies; who accordingly set out of Constantinople in the month of July, and had sent orders to all the corsair captains of Tunis and Algiers, to join him with their vessels. His letters to those of Algiers were directed to Morat Rais, without taking notice of the rest; however, both they and those of Tunis joined him with their squadrons. He landed his army, which consisted of 12,000 Turks, besides those of his two auxiliaries, and of Achmed, Bascha of Tripoli; but, finding the season too far advanced to stay much longer on those seas with the Soltan's gallies, he contented himself with leaving there a considerable band of Jannissaries, with the Algerine and Tunisian forces, and set out for Constantinople in the month of October. He had not been long gone, before they came to a general engagement with the revolted, in which they gave them a total overthrow<sup>a</sup>. Sidi Chayab was not only abandoned by his partizans, but had his head treacherously taken off by some of them, and brought to the Turks, which soon put an end to that revolt. Since which time they have continued to this day under the dominion of the Grand Signor, as will be further shewn when we come to the history of Tripoli. But to return to Algiers, from whence we were forced to digress, so far as the history of those kingdoms, as well as the Baschas that commanded in them, was so interwoven. The succour which the Bascha Hidir had been obliged to send to Tripoli, had so far exhausted him of men, that, for want of soldiery, he could not send abroad above four corsairs that year, to the great mortification of the rest.

c NOR was this all, for he had been obliged to take the field against the Soltan, or tributary prince of the Beni Abbas, a brave Arabian tribe, inhabiting the mountainous parts of Algiers, some of which are almost inaccessible. As he therefore knew how difficult it would be to reduce him by main force, he thought fit to try what might be done by stratagem; to which end he raised a high kind of fortrefs, of earth, stones, and trees, to defend his camp from surprizes, and, at the same time, prevent the enemy's being supplied with provisions from other parts, whilst he strove to destroy all their olive, date, and other fruit trees. Whilst things were in this position, and nothing else considerable acted between them, except their frequent skirmishes, a Marabout, in high veneration, found means to pacify both sides, by shewing them the absurdity of people of the same religion taking up arms against each other, which might be more properly employed against their common enemies the Christians. Which arguments, joined to a sum of 30,000 ducats, which the Arabian prince obliged himself to pay to the Bascha, soon brought them to a pacific treaty, and put an end to all farther hostilities. Hidir returned to Algiers after two months absence, as highly pleased as if he had gained a victory; a war being seldom known to be so easily terminated with that martial nation, on whose friendship the tranquillity of all the eastern provinces so much depends. But whilst he had such good success at land, his small and meanly equipped squadron met with a quite different fate at sea: they being chiefly manned by Moorish swabbers, and other such unexperienced sailors, instead of such brave veterans and expert renegadoes, met with such a violent storm near the coasts of Sicily, that two out of the four were driven on shore and lost; one near the city of Augusta, and the other against the rocks of the island of Gosa: the other two, indeed, by gaining the Cape of Passaro, had the good fortune to out-weather the storm, and to bring away from the coasts of Puglia and Calabria a considerable number of slaves, and what other plunder they could bring with them into Algiers<sup>b</sup>.

e IN the following year Morat Rais and admiral Memmi had much such another squabble in their joint cruize, as they had two years before: the former, ever venturous and bold, was for engaging eight Sicilian gallies, near the island of Lustrica, about twenty leagues from Sicily: the other, ever cautious and fearful of buying a victory too dearly, as warmly opposing it; so that they parted without a blow; whilst the Sicilians, though superior in number and strength, were glad to let them go off scot-free, when they might easily have taken them, as our authors think, had they had the courage to engage them. So that they had the good luck to get safely to Algiers in August following, tho' without any other success than that of a narrow escape<sup>c</sup>.

f IN October following happened that notable escape of fourteen corsair captains out of the castle of Naples; one of whom, called Mustagha Arnaud, was a very considerable Algerine Rais, nearly related by marriage to admiral Memmi, who had been there confined twenty-six years, and never could obtain his liberty, either by exchange or the largest sums; another was the famed Jaffer Rais, a French renegado, taken near the island of Yvica, an. 1586; the third was Hamza Rais, a native Turk, in high esteem at Biserta and Tunis, where he was admiral of all the corsairs, and was taken in his own galley in April, 1590, by the prince Doria's son, then coming from Naples with eleven gallies, on the Roman coasts. These three being the most a considerable of all the fourteen, had been guarded with great strictness; whilst the other eleven had the liberty to walk about within the walls. All these having obtained leave to sup together, it being the feast of Biram, or passover, sawed their fetters, got over one of the walls with cords, broke through another with crow's and leavers, and seized a pleasure boat of sixteen oars belonging to the governor, and rowed away for the island of Lustrica; where they were taken up by an Algerine cruizer that casually came that way, and arrived safe at Biserta, the residence of Hamza Rais. Great rejoicings were made both there and at Algiers, and other places, for the happy escape of so many of their brave captains; whilst it alarmed not only all the city of Naples, but all Italy and adjacent kingdoms, who were apprehensive that something worse than the strength and industry of those captives had been the means of their release. b Nothing happened remarkable during the remainder of Hidir's government, excepting that he was recalled on the year following, to the great joy of all the Algerines, by whom he was hated, on account of his haughtiness and tyranny, he being an old, gouty, petulant, and griping officer, and insolent tyrant; who, nevertheless, found means, after his return to the Porte, to be sent thither once more in the same capacity.

Shaaban,
Basha.

HE was succeeded by Shaaban, who arrived at Algiers in the month of August, and fell immediately upon a strict scrutiny into his predecessor's conduct, against whom great complaints were made, both by the soldiery and people. A grand Douwan was forthwith convened, wherein it was proposed to send a deputation to the Porte, accompanied with proper presents, in order to obtain some severe punishment against him. All this clamour was soon over-ruled by the address c of the new Basha, who contented himself with laying a considerable fine upon him, and giving him a severe reprimand; but the soldiery would not suffer him to come off upon so easy terms, and agreed to depute admiral Memmi Arnaud to carry their complaints to the Porte, which he readily undertook, being now grown weary of the piratical trade, wherein he had lately escaped being either sunk or taken, and had had a favourite nephew killed. He, therefore, took his leave of Algiers, and embarked for Constantinople towards the latter end of August in his own four galliots; two of which carried the family and equipage of Hidir, and the third the rest of the deputies: but, to their great surprise, when they came to the Porte, tho' their presents were accepted, yet they could obtain no audience against him, and so were forced to return re infecta, to the great mortification of the mutinous soldiery. d

two gallies by stratagem;

NOTHING material happened during the two first years of Shaaban's government, except some captures, as usual, and some ships lost and sunk at the mouth of the harbour, he behaving all the time with great moderation and prudence. Among other prizes was that of Don Pedro de Lieva, general of the Sicilian gallies, whom that Basha's galliot surprised, and brought away from the island of Lustrica. On the next year Morat Rais, who, by this time, had succeeded Memmi Arnaud as admiral of Algiers, set out with his four gallies as usual; and, meeting with two Tuscan gallies near the coast of Barbary (one of which was the Capitana, and the other called the St. John), he made use of this stratagem, of causing two of his own vessels to take in their sails and let down their masts, and to be towed as prizes by the other two, till he was got near enough to his prey; which he easily did, they making all the sail they could e towards him, as to a prize they were sure of; when, on a sudden, he ordered his other two galliots to equip with all speed, and set on them with such fury as threw them into the utmost confusion; and, after an obstinate engagement, carried them both off, and brought them into Algiers about the middle of July.

FLUSHED with such constant success, he set out the following year on the same errand, and had the confidence to lay in wait for five Maltese cruizers, lying in the port of Syracuse; and whom he knew to be not only most inveterate enemies, but so much superior to him. Whilst he lay perdué at Cape Passaro, the Maltese admiral, having had intelligence of him, and the position he was in, immediately slipped his cables; and, with the other, made all the sail towards him, and surprised him as he was in pursuit of one of their own brigantines. They quickly knew f each other, notwithstanding the darkness of the night. Morat betook himself to flight; but the Maltese so closely chased him, that the Capitana soon overtook and engaged him. The fight was furious while it lasted; but the Turks played their fire so hotly upon it, that most of her gunners and soldiers were either slain or disabled, which gave him a fair opportunity to disengage himself from her, not without great loss, as well as imminent danger from the other four, which were crowding likewise all their sails after him; so that all his speed could not save him from the Patrona, which was next, peppering him in the rear; for they all levelled their aim chiefly at him. "But here," says our author, "he and his Turks were no less successful again, "and made such effectual discharges against her, that they forced her to retire, as they did "afterwards all the others, after they had, one after another, tried their chance against Morat's g a “galliot. So that, after having received five, not dangerous, wounds, and a considerable “damage, he escaped from the paws of those lions of St. John’s order <sup>d</sup>.” They did not, however, return to Algiers, till they had made a considerable number of prizes, and were enabled to enter that city laden with riches and captives, which they did in September next. This is the last tidings we meet with concerning that bold and fortunate corsair; who, at his arrival, found Sbaaben Basha departed for Constantinople about two months before, after having governed that state somewhat less than three years with credit, and a general contentment of the people.

b His successor, Mustapha, was a near relation of his, and no less courteous and upright; but Mustapha had not continued four months in his government, before he found himself supplanted by the late Hidir Basha, whose interest with the Porte had prevailed upon the Soltan to nominate him a second time to that advantageous post, to the great grief and mortification of all the Algerines; who, as they had conceived great hopes from the generous Mustapha, so had they much to fear from the relentment of his furly and vindictive successor.

AND, indeed, it was no less with a view of being revenged on them for their late clamours against him, than his avidity for that gainful government, that he had set all his engines at work to obtain it. And this was no more than what he had threatened their deputies to the Porte, bidding them to assure the people of Algiers, that they might depend upon his quitting scores with them, whenever occasion should offer. Accordingly, upon his arrival in October following, his first step was to extort a fine of 15,000 ducats from their favourite, Mustapha, under pretence that he had neglected to keep the mole in repair; which, he said, he would immediately do with that very money; though the sequel plainly shewed, that he had no other view in extorting it than to sink it into his own pockets, and to mortify him and the Algerines. Mustapha having, with no small chagrin, satisfied his extortionate demand, set sail forthwith for Constantinople; but with a full resolution, at all hazards, to regain that government, and deliver Algiers from a petulant tyrant, whom they had so much cause to detest. Nothing material happened during his short reign, except the frequent instances he gave, both to the militia and people, of his resentment and rapacious disposition; till, to his great mortification, and their excessive joy, news was brought to him, that his much abused predecessor was recommissioned for that vice-royalty, and on the point of entering that port. Mustapha had, indeed, made such successful use of his interest at the Porte, and had displayed Hidir’s character in such true colours, that his new patent ran in a manner absolute. Nevertheless, the only revenge he took of him, was to ease him of a good part of his ready coin, the only profitable commodity, he well knew, such a miser could carry into the Levant, as well as the most effectual engine he could play at the Porte against him; and this he did, first, by condemning him to pay 30,000 ducats, instead of the 15,000 he had extorted from him; saying, he knew no reason why he, who had neglected a whole twelve-month to repair the mole, should not pay as much towards it as he had forced him to do only for a four months neglect. The next was, by forbidding all persons, of whatever rank, under the severest penalties, to purchase any slaves or moveables from him; by which he prevented his recruiting his pockets with a fresh supply of cash; and for that reason we need not fear that any Algerine would transgress such an order. On the contrary, they all cried out, that he was too mildly treated, who had set such an example of extortion and revenge.

HIDIR departed soon after, full of envy and resentment; and from that time we hear no more of him. As for his successor, he became, by the contrast, more and more the darling of Algiers, by his courteousness and generosity, though nothing remarkable happened during his government, excepting his setting himself immediately about repairing the mole, fortifications, and other public buildings: and, with his easy and amiable government, we shall, with our two authors, bring this 16th century to a period.

The history of Algiers, from the beginning of the 17th century to the conclusion of their last treaty with, and death of, Haly Dey, An. 1718.

BEING now deprived of our excellent, exact, and curious guide, whose long abode and acquaintance with this state had enabled him to furnish us with such a regular list of its Balhas, and most material particulars of them, we shall be now forced to shorten our method, and confine ourselves chiefly to their transactions abroad, which are the only ones that have been transmitted to us with any certainty; those that have been acted since, are, for the most part, unknown to us, for want of such another faithful compiler of them; but here, perhaps, the loss is not so much to be regretted, upon just recollection, as might appear at the first sight. If we consider all the domestic affairs that have been transmitted to us, from the foundation of it by the two Barbarossas, to the close of this century, we shall find them (except the reigns and surprising conquests and tyrannies of these two famed corsairs) to be made up chiefly of jealousies, supplantments, cruelty, revenge, murmurings, revolts, oppressions, and bribery, both at home and at the Porte, and such like disasters, which afford but small improvement, or even amusement, if not rather disgust and weariness, to the reader: for which reason we endeavoured to relate them in the most concise manner we could.

NEITHER can we reasonably suppose, that matters are mended much since that time, especially since that state hath been governed by Deys, or kings of their own chusing, and hath shook off its dependancy on the Ottoman Porte, as we have elsewhere seen*. On the contrary, we must expect to find little else but a continued series of the most horrid and cruel tyrannies, assassinations, revolts, dethronings, fightings, contentions, briberies, jealousies, and tumults, among the great; and misery, oppression, and slavery, among the low; intermixed with instances of the most inhuman resentment on all or most of the unhappy relations and partizans of a butchered monarch: confiscations, imprisonments, fines, and other persecutions, on those who are suspected to be in a different interest from the reigning tyrant; till at length, perhaps, in less than a year, a month, and sometimes a week, some dreadful fate justly falls on him, and is attended with all the same scenes of rage and fury, tyranny and bloodshed. These, we say, joined to their usual piratical excursions and depredations at sea, would make up the most considerable transactions of every reign; and a regular and continued history would be no better, bating some difference, perhaps, in the various ways and stratagems by which the actors have supplanted and massacred one another, than a continued repetition of the same scenes of treason and bloody revolutions.

WE have already taken notice, in a former section*, of a deputation which their militia sent to the Porte, about the beginning of this 17th century, to complain of the misconduct and horrid oppressions of the Turkish viceroys, who sunk all the publick revenue into their own coffers; and to whose avarice it was owing, that the state forces were so miserably paid, accoutred, and kept up, that they were in continual danger of being overpowered by the Arabians and Moors; who, by the assistance of some Christian powers, would quickly be in a condition to shake off the Ottoman yoke, and against whose united force, the now extenuated and discontented soldiery would be able to make but a poor defence. By which means they obtained leave of that court to chuse their own Deys; who, as they alleged, would of course take more care, that the revenue was applied to the keeping of the kingdom in a better state of defence, and that the usual tribute should be more faithfully transmitted to the Porte, instead of requiring new supplies from thence, as had been lately the practice of those rapacious viceroys. These deputies did moreover engage themselves still to acknowledge the Grand Signor for their Sovereign, and to be ready on all occasions to assist him with their forces and shipping, to pay a due respect to his Balhas, to lodge and maintain them and their retinue, in a manner suitable to their dignity, at their own charge, provided they were for the future excluded from assisting at any but their general Douwans, unless invited to it; and from having the liberty of voting in them, unless when their advice was asked, or the interest of the Porte was likely to suffer by their silence; but that all other concerns, which related to the government of Algiers, should be wholly committed to the direction of the Dey and his Douwan*.

THE deputies, having thus far succeeded, returned highly satisfied to Algiers, where they failed not to notify to the then Turkish Basha the privileges granted to them by his court; to which he had nothing to do but to submit. The great Douwan immediately proceeded to the election of a Dey from among their own body. They compiled a new set of laws, and made a several regulations for the better maintenance and support of this new form of government; to the observation of which they obliged all their subjects to swear; and the militia, navy, commerce, &c. were settled pretty near on the same footing which we have described in a former section †; though the subsequent alterations, which happened since between the Bashas and Deys, the first to recover their former authority and influence, and the latter to curtail it, still caused such frequent complaints and discontents at the Ottoman court, as made them repent of their untimely compliance to that proud and untractable body, which the sequel will quickly shew.

b THIS new century did likewise begin with a fresh attempt of the Spaniards on the capital of this kingdom, under the conduct of the famed John Andr. Doria; but which proved no less unsuccessful than the two former we have elsewhere spoken of <sup>b</sup>, excepting only, that it did not make such dreadful havock among their armada as the former had done. This fleet, which had luckily entered the bay on the 5th of August unperceived, being only forced, by contrary winds, to leave it quickly after; though, had it been otherwise, the place was then provided to give them such a warm reception, that this attempt, abortive as it was, may be justly looked upon as the most fortunate they ever made against that place, as that in which they got off with the least damage. We need not repeat here how much worse that fleet fared, which they ventured to send two years after on the same errand, and in which the elements seem to have been in league with these common disturbers of public commerce <sup>c</sup>.

c NEITHER need we observe here how much the joy, which the Morescos in Spain expressed at these frequent disappointments, may have contributed to hasten their expulsion out of that country, an. 1609, & seq. But one thing seems very evident, that these frequent attempts against the Algerines were the chief motive that put them upon providing themselves with a strong fleet of sailing ships, instead of placing their main strength on their galliots, and lesser vessels, altogether unfit for winter expeditions, or for any long ones at any season, especially as they were then at war with all the European powers, except their old friends the French, and of late years the English: though they have been since bold enough to bid even these open defiance, notwithstanding their being in alliance with the Ottoman Porte; and which is still worse, considering their openly acknowledging them both, and us in particular, as their chief benefactors and instructors, both in the construction of those large square-sailed ships, and in the art of rigging and steering them: in all which they not only became very expert in a little time, but were followed by their friends and neighbours of Tunis and Tripoli, even from the earliest part of this 17th century <sup>d</sup>, that the expulsion of the Morescos abovementioned, many of whom were, doubtless, very great sailors, and flocked in shoals to the Algerines, joined to the help of many of their Christian renegadoes, must have greatly contributed both to this quick increase of power at sea, as well as to that skill in navigation, which they had learned from the English and French, cannot be denied, since we find their navy, as early as an. 1616, to consist of forty sail of tall ships, between 200 and 400 tons, their admiral 500 tons, and divided into two squadrons, one of eighteen sail before the port of Malaga, and the other without the Streights, at the Cape of Santa Maria, between Lisbon and Seville, and both falling foul on all Christian ships indifferently that came in their way, English and French, as well as Spanish, Portuguese, &c. by which means they were now become formidable, not to the Spaniards only, their most inveterate enemies, but to most other Christian states (A).

(A) This plainly appears by a letter sent by Sir Francis Cottington, king James I.'s ambassador at the court of Madrid, to the duke of Buckingham, then secretary of state, dated thence October 1, 1616; wherein, among other things, he acquaints them with the height of power and insolence they are grown up to, and what prizes they had made in both stations, as well on the English as other Europeans. To which he adds, that they had few or no Christians on board them, but all either Turks or Moors; (he should have added renegadoes) and that the most part of the latter consisted of those that were lately expelled out of Spain. They moreover gave out, that they lay in wait for the West India fleet, which was expected to arrive in a short time.

His excellency expresses his fears, that Don Francisco Faxardo, who was sent to convoy them, and fight those pirates at all adventures, would be able to do them little hurt, as his ships were of so heavy a burthen and so easily out sailed by the enemy, especially as their other squadron within the Streights could so easily secure their retreat; and on the other hand, says he, if they return safe this year to Algiers, especially if they should take any of the fleet, it is much to be feared, that the Spanish forces by sea will not restrain them hereafter; so much sweetness do they find by making prizes of all Christians whatsoever.

In consequence of which, the Spanish council of war was very pressing with him, to use his utmost to obtain from that king, his master, a reinforcement of some of his British men of war, to assist his catholic majesty in suppressing the power and insolence of that piratical tribe.

The last particular of consequence in that letter we shall give in the writer's own words: "I may not forbear to advertise your honour of what the secretary told me withal, that the states desired leave of his catholic majesty last year for certain ships of war, which they had armed to sea against pirates, might have safe recourse to these parts, which was accordingly granted

THE French, however, were the first who dared to shew their resentment for their breach of friendship, and contempt to their alliance with the Porte; whilst the Spaniards, more insulted by, and in greater danger from them, were seeking for help from England, the pope, and other states, without success. We are not told what gave occasion to this rupture between France and Algiers, which is the very first we meet with between them, except that the coasts of Provence were grievously infested by the Barbary pirates; some of whom, in their cruising, might, perhaps, have seized indiscriminately upon some French vessel. However that be, on the very next year, Mr. Beaulieu was sent against the Algerines with a fleet of no less than fifty sail of men of war and gallies; who, having taken one of their corsairs in his way, sailed forthwith in search of the main squadron, which had done incredible damage on the Spanish and Catalonian coasts. He attacked one of them in person, which was commanded by a renegado of Rochelle; who, after a stout and desperate resistance, sunk his own ship and crew, rather than fall into the enemy's hands; another renegado left his to his mercy, and got away in his boat; and a third was sunk; but the rest had the good fortune to get clear off, and the admiral returned to Marseilles with those two prizes. He was no sooner gone, but the Algerines returned to their old depredations on the Spanish coasts: which, being best known by the expelled Morestcos, were exposed to all the barbarity and resentment of those exasperated infidels, who burnt, plundered, ravaged, and carried off all they could come at.

KING James was strongly solicited by the Spanish court to contribute his assistance towards their suppression and abolishment; but, though Gondamar had so great an influence over him, and most of his ministers, and made use of every argument he could think of to prevail upon him, and represented to him in the strongest terms how much his own trading subjects suffered by those corsairs, yet all he could obtain from him was, to have the matter debated before the council; in which Sir William Monson's opinion being asked, that consummate sea officer's answer was to this effect; viz.

An English

THAT such an expedition, being not only of a general concern to all trading Christians, but likewise of a difficult, long, and expensive nature, ought to be carried on at the general charge of all parties concerned, in proportion to their respective share in the Mediterranean trade; for the settling and carrying on of which, he gives a good number of directions and cautions, equally judicious and worthy of so old and experienced an officer and statesman. He goes on with his reasons against attempting the taking of the city of Algiers; shews the expence and difficulty of keeping it, and the small advantage accruing from it; and concludes with the properest means for suppressing its pirates, by the joint forces and expence of each trading nation: and his memorial had such an effect on the council, that it cooled his majesty of his extraordinary warmth of obliging his great friend the king of Spain; whilst many of that honourable board looked upon the whole design as no other than a Spanish quarrel. However, Gondamar found means to carry his point so far, that a fleet was ordered to be equipt with all expedition, which was sent accordingly into the Mediterranean, about three years after, consisting of six ships, and two pinnaces of the royal navy, and twelve other stout vessels, hired and fitted out by the king, which set sail for the Streights on the 12th of October of the same year, and arrived safely at the bay of Gibraltar the 31st of the same month, under the conduct of Sir Robert Mansel, admiral. We shall not trouble our reader with an account of this ill-concerted expedition, as it proved at the end, only than by telling him, that, if the admiral and other officers concerned it were really in earnest to put it in execution, their design was to have sent some fire-ships, and other proper boats into the harbour of Algiers, and to have set all their ships on fire. This is what Sir Robert Mansel affirms in his letter to the duke of Buckingham, "It was with some difficulty performed, after the four vessels which carried the combustibles had been delayed several days, either by calms or contrary winds; the men sailing boldly on, with shouts of, God bless king James, &c. even at the mouth of the cannon and small shot, which showered upon them like hail, maintaining their ground to his great content, and that of all the spectators, till they had fired their ships in many places, and spent all they had in their bandoleers, striving all the while who should have the honour of coming off last: the which, at length, they resigned to their brave commander captain Hughes, as a reward for his intrepidity in leading them on. They retired at last in due order, with the same chearful repetition of, Long live king James, and the loss of twenty men, either slain or wounded, and leaving the fire flaming up in several places,

" granted them: but that, instead of offending the pirates with them, the same ships sold in Algiers as much powder, and other warlike provisions, as served to a “ which continued in some of them long after their retreat, and being got on board his majesty’s ships.”

He goes on with acquainting his grace, “ That the cowardly Turks, who, before, dared not shew themselves to so small a force, but from their walls and tops of their houses, no sooner perceived all their boats, than they opened their ports, and sallied out in thousands; and, by the help of such great multitudes, and a sudden shower of rain, seconded with a calm, which then happened, the fire was afterwards extinguished, without doing any more hurt than making two of their ships unserviceable.”

SOME other service, as he styles it, the fleet did; such as sinking or taking three or four ships, which we shall not mention at length, but go on with the sequel of their first design; which, to give nearly in his own words, is to this effect: “ I attended, ten days after our first attempt, for an opportunity to send in the ships with the fire-works, to finish the service began with the boats, but not a breath of wind favoured us all that time; notwithstanding the ships were always ready to advance as soon as they received any directions. At length, understanding by some escaped Christians how the pirates had boomed up the mole with masts and rafts, doubled the guards of their ships, planted ordinance upon their mole and walls, and sent out their galleys and boats, eastward and westward, to forewarn all ships upon the coast from coming during my abode there; and so losing all hopes of doing any farther service, in regard of the daily complaints of the king’s ships, as well as the merchantmen, who complained of their want of victuals, I resolved, by the advice of a council of war, to sail away for this place, Leon, where my brother brought me your grace’s letter, with his majesty’s pleasure, in regard to his recalling four of the ships under my command.”

He concludes his long letter, with telling the duke, “ how dangerous it may prove, after so bold and open an attempt upon the pirates, to recall those four ships, before the arrival of others in their stead, and what encouragement the bereaving the fleet of so considerable a force might give to the pirates, to set some equally pernicious stratagem on foot against them. Such as, he is well apprized of, they have already taken into consideration, and which he will send his grace an account of by the first opportunity.”

THIS long detail, artfully palliated as it is, being the only one we have of the particulars of that expedition, except the journal of it, we thought proper to extract the substance of, out of the letter above-mentioned, and, as nearly as could be, in his own terms; by which the reader may infer how formidable the Algerines were become by that time. But, as he hath thought proper to suppress some other causes, equally productive of this disappointment, though not quite so honourable to him and his armada, we shall conclude our account of this unsuccessful expedition in the words of the judicious Sir William Monson above-mentioned.

“ THIS fleet, by contract, was to receive some assistance from the king of Spain, at its first appearance on his coasts: but such was the misgovernment of those ships, and the negligence and vanity of some persons to feast and banquet in harbour, when their duty was to clear and scour the seas, that they lost the opportunity of destroying the pirates, as appears by a pamphlet printed at their return; except their bare passage, they spent not twenty days at sea during their stay in the Streights, but retired into the harbours, where the pirates might find them, but not they the pirates.” Thus far Sir William; to which we may add, what another, no less exact, says further of this expedition. “ The commander, Sir Robert Mansel, appeared before Algiers, but he had not much reason to be satisfied with the success he there met with; and, in return for the civility of his visit, his back was scarce turned, but those corsairs picked up near forty good ships belonging to the subjects of his master, and infested the Spanish coasts with greater fury than ever.”

THIS author is not the only one that hath given us this dismal account of the Algerines high resentment at this open attempt upon their city and navy. We could produce several others of equal credit, who have given us various melancholy instances of it, were there a necessity for it, in a case wherein our merchants were such great and constant sufferers, that there was nothing to be heard for a considerable time but complaints and outcries; the one against the continual prizes made upon us by those corsairs; and the other against our open breach of friendship, both with Algiers and the Porte. Accordingly, we find them, the year after this unsuccessful attempt against them, at open defiance with all the European powers, the Dutch only excepted, to whom they sent a proposal, directed to the prince of Orange, that, in case they would fit out twenty sail of ships against the following year, upon any good service against the Spaniards, they would join them with sixty sail of their own; which, had it once taken effect, might have proved no less ruinous to our commerce, than fatal to Spain; for howsoever the Dutch might have behaved toward us, the Algerines would still have looked upon us as Spanish allies; so that it was not without good reason, that our ambassador at the Hague (Sir Dudley Carleton) sent immediate advice of it to the king, and advised him, by any means, to procure a truce with the Algerine state <sup>1</sup>.

The Coulolies conspire against the Algerine state.

In this next year, under the government of Maharan, Basha, happened a most dreadful conspiracy, which was raised by the Cologlies, vulgarly called Coulolies <sup>m</sup>; who, having seized on the citadel of Algiers, wherein were repositied all the public treasury and warlike ammunition, had well nigh made themselves sole masters of that state. In which, it is thought, the Moors and Arabs, tired with the tyranny of the Turkish government, would not have failed to assist them. This plot, however, was timely discovered, and suppressed by the Turks and their fast friends the renegadoes, who defeated them with a terrible slaughter. Several scores of them were executed; and their heads are still to be seen in heaps upon the city walls without the eastern gate. Part of the citadel was blown up; but the treasury escaped. From that time the Coulolies were discarded from the militia, and none admitted to the pay of it during a great number of years; though they were again readmitted into it, with some restriction, as we shall see in the sequel.

ABOUT two years after this conspiracy happened that memorable change in the Algerine state, formerly hinted <sup>n</sup>; by which they became soon after able to shake off the Ottoman yoke, and to become an independent state under their own Deys. What gave the first occasion, or handle for it, was the peace, or rather twenty five years truce, which the Soltan Morat, or Amurath IV. (then engaged in a hot, though unsuccessful, war against Persia, and much embarrassed by other commotions in Asia) was, in some measure, obliged to clap up with the emperor, Ferdinand II. to prevent his being over-matched by two such potent enemies. This truce, which did not a little affect the piratical trade, was universally disliked by all the Barbary corsairs, who were all equally under the Soltan's protection; but by none more than the Algerines, who were, by this time, become too haughty and opulent, by the continual depredations they had made on the Christians during the last three years, to bear with any temper so considerable an obstacle put to them. Upon which they soon came to a unanimous resolution, whilst the Porte was entangled with so many difficulties, to set up for three independent states, and to look upon themselves from thenceforth as wholly unconcerned with any treaties made by that court with any Christian power. So that whoever thenceforward desired to be at peace with them, should be obliged, distinctly and separately, to apply to their respective governments <sup>o</sup>. This resolution was no sooner taken, than the Algerines began to make prizes of several merchant ships, belonging to powers at peace with the Ottoman Porte; they even pursued some to the very port of Rhodes; and, in spite of the fire which the castle made against them, boarded and carried them off. They did much the same at the port of Salamis, in the isle of Cyprus, where they attacked two large Venetian ships, which were both consumed by fire; one by the enemy, and the other by themselves. They carried their insolence still further at Scanderoon, or Alexandretta, where, after having seized on a Dutch ship, and a polacre, they ventured on shore; and, finding the town abandoned by the Turkish Aga and the inhabitants, they plundered all the magazines and warehouses, and then set them on fire. Much about the same time the French king, Lewis XIII. depending on his league with the Turks, undertook to build a new fort on their coasts, instead of that which the Marisians had formerly erected, but had been demolished by the Algerine forces, as hath been formerly related *. This new one was to be called the Bastion of France; and an expert engineer was sent thither for that purpose. But the foundations were scarcely finished, before the Moors and Arabians came and demolished them, and drove the French away. The king, unwilling to abandon a design that would prove so advantageous to commerce, attempted a second time some few years after, and succeeded in it; and a new French colony was settled there. But the situation being found inconvenient, on account of its harbour, the company of the Bastion of France did afterwards agree with the Algerines for the port called La Calle, formerly described †, and have obtained leave of the Dey for a trade with the Moors and Arabians ‡. But to return to the Algerine depredations; the great number and variety of prizes they continued making on all nations indifferently that came in their way (the Dutch not excepted, from whom they took a ship, richly laden, from Alexandria), could hardly be looked upon at the Porte, but as so many open instances of defiance to its authority. On the other hand, the daily complaints and representations made to that court, by foreign ministers at peace with it, against those daring pirates, might, one would have thought, prevailed upon that court to have found some means of suppressing and punishing so flagrant an insolence. And would doubtless have had that effect, had not the Grand Signor at that time been so greatly embarrassed with the Persian war, and other eastern disturbances, which would not permit him to look so curiously after so low a branch of his honour and interest, which gave an

- a opportunity to his Grand Vazier and courtiers to compound the injury with those pirates, by sharing with them the war-spoils they had made; those of the English alone being computed to amount to 40,000 dollars. However, for form's sake, the Porte sent them a severe reprimand, accompanied with threats; to which they were bold enough to answer, that these depredations deserved to be indulged to them, seeing they were the only bulwark against the Christian powers, especially against the Spaniards, the sworn enemies of the Moslem name. Adding, that if they should pay a punctilious regard to all that could purchase peace, or liberty to trade with the Ottoman empire, they would have nothing left to do but to set fire to all their shipping, and turn camel-drivers for a livelihood<sup>p</sup>. With much the same, if not greater insolence they treated their Bashas, who were, by this time, become so weak and insignificant, that they dared
- b not offer to oppose them; and, if any had the courage to do so, he was sure to come off still worse with them.

It was much about the same time that four young brothers, of good family, ventured to try their fortune against those corsairs in a small frigate of ten guns, which they had equipped at Rochelle; they had obtained a Maltese commission, and bore the colours of that order, which had engaged near a hundred volunteers to accompany them in that expedition, besides an able master, and other officers, and thirty-six mariners. They had the good fortune, on the very first engagement, to take a ship laden with wine on the Spanish coast, which they looked upon as such a good omen, that they ventured three days after to engage two large Algerine corsairs; one of twenty-four, the other of twenty guns, both well manned, and c commanded by such expert officers, as would lose no advantage they had over them, and seeing them make all the sail they could after them, slackened their own to wait for them. The French gave them the first salute with a broadside from their ten guns, and received the like from the two corsairs; who, taking her in the middle between them, plied her so furiously with their great shot, that one of them took off her mainmast. Notwithstanding which accident, as well as the disparity between ten and forty-four guns, our young Frenchmen made still a gallant defence, till the noise of their fire brought in five more Algerines; by which means she was so peppered and shattered, that the water gushing in on all sides, and having disabled her from swimming, she was easily boarded, carried off, and condemned: for, though

d France was at that time at peace with Algiers, yet she was allowed a lawful prize, both on account of her being the first aggressor, and of her carrying Maltese colours. The result of which was, that our young adventurers, after a dreadful seven years captivity, did at length redeem themselves, at the price of 6000 dollars, in the year 1642<sup>q</sup>.

From this time we find nothing material in their history, saving their impudently carrying on their piratical excursions at sea, and depredations on the Spanish coasts, till about ten years after; at which time the French, then at war with Spain, receiving intelligence, that the Conde de Monterrey was embarked, with all his effects, at Naples, in some Neapolitan vessels, lay waiting for those transports in fourteen large gallies, which they had dispatched for that purpose from their fleet on the coast of Monaco; when, at the end of seven days, they were dispersed by a strong easterly wind, which drove the greatest part e of them to Algiers. Here the impatient French admiral sent immediately to demand a release of all the captives of his nation; which, being as sternly refused by the regency, he, in revenge, seized on the Turkish viceroy and his Cadi, or judge, just arrived from the Porte, with all their equipage and retinue, and forthwith put to sea, and carried them all away. The Algerines were not, perhaps, so provoked at the capture of those two ministers of the Porte, as on the insolence of the French admiral; and, therefore, instead of complying with his demands, in order to obtain their release, suffered him to sail with them: but resolved soon after to shew their resentment against him and his nation; and having equipped eight of their best gallies, went, by way of retaliation, and surprised the Bastion of France, a fortress upon the Algerine coast, which they had held for some time on account of trade, and contained about

f 600 inhabitants; all whom, with their whole effects and ships, they carried off to Algiers. An odd way of carrying on their friendly correspondence, as our author observes<sup>r</sup>; for which the admiral was so provoked, that he sent them word, he would pay them another visit by the next year with his whole fleet.

His threats did not, however, deter them, but that they made a much more considerable excursion the very next year, with a fleet of sixteen gallies and galliots, excellently well manned and equipped, under the command of Hali Pechinin, their admiral. The juncture was altogether favourable, because Soltan Morat was at that time closely engaged at his reduction of Baghdad<sup>s</sup>: so that they had all the scope they could wish for to range the seas, and seized all the Christian shipping they could come at. But their chief design was upon the treasure of Loretto, which would have proved a vast prize indeed; but unluckily for them, g the wind being contrary, would not permit them to sail so high into that gulph; upon which they agreed on a descent in Puglia, in the kingdom of Naples, where they ravaged the whole a territory of Necotra, carried off a vast number of captives of both sexes ; and amongst them, some nuns, whom they failed not to prostitute to their own lust. From thence, steering towards Dalmatia, scoured the Adriatic ; and, after having loaded themselves with immense plunder, left those coasts in the utmost consternation and resentment ; whilst all this time the Maltese and Spaniards, who should have protected them, were employed ; the former in getting of prizes in the Archipelago, and the latter were loitering away the summer in making preparations, after their slow way, for their defence<sup>1</sup>. All which gave a fair opportunity to our corsairs to bring their immense plunder home, without any opposition, had they been contented with what they had got : whereas their greediness after more occasioned the loss of a considerable part of their booty.

The Venetians
equip a large fleet against the Algerines.

FOR, by this time, the Venetians being alarmed at their wide depredations, had equipped a powerful fleet of twenty-eight sail, under the command of admiral Capello, with express orders to him to burn, sink, and take all the Barbary corsairs he met with, whether on the open seas, or even in the Grand Signor's harbours, pursuant to a late treaty made between that republic and the Porte. On the other hand, the Captain Basha, who had been sent out with the Turkish fleet to chase the Florentine and Maltese cruizers, who, as we hinted a little above, were pursuing the same piratical trade in the Archipelago, understanding that the Algerine squadron was so near, sent express orders to the admiral, to come and assist him in chasing those Christian robbers, as he styled them, out of those seas. Hali Pechinin readily obeyed ; but, before he took leave of the Adriatic coasts, resolved to make a descent upon the island of Lissa, or Lisina, belonging to the Venetians. He was, however, overtaken by Capello's fleet before he could reach it, which obliged him to retire, and shelter his squadron under the castle of Valona, a sea port belonging to the Grand Signor. Capello followed him thither, and first saluted the castle with a gun, and sent an officer with the white flag, to demand of the Aga who commanded there, that those corsairs might, according the articles of the late truce, be ejected out of their shelter. His salute and demand were forthwith answered with a real cannon shot, which gave him to understand, that he designed to protect, instead of rejecting them ; upon which he withdrew at some distance, and cast anchor, with a view of blocking them up. At length, after a mutual watching upon each other some days, Pechinin, weary of his restraints, ventured one morning to give the enemy the slip ; but, being perceived by the vigilance of the Venetians, just as they got out of the harbour, Capello divided his fleet into two squadrons, and gave them a full broadside, which was as briskly answered by the Algerines. An obstinate conflict ensued, which lasted near two hours, notwithstanding the continual fire which the Turks made from the castle upon the Venetians ; a shot of which took off the mast of one of their galleasses ; the commander of which was wounded by a splinter. At length, the Algerine squadron was so shattered by their continual shot, that five of it were become disabled ; the rest were glad to betake themselves to their old shelter, after having lost 1500 men, Turks and Christian slaves, who were either wounded or slain, besides 1600 gally slaves, who regained their liberty by this rencounter. Capello had not long lain at his old anchorage, before he received an order from the senate not to make any further attempt on those miscreants, for fear of causing a fresh rupture with the Porte ; which was followed by a letter from the governor of the town, much to the same purpose, advising him to beware, that he did not incur the Soltan's resentment by such insults<sup>2</sup>. However, before he obeyed the senate's order, he resolved to take such leave of them as he thought they deserved ; and observing how they had reared their tents, and drawn their booty and equipage along the shore, he made towards them with his whole force ; and, whilst he kept firing against their tents, ordered some well manned galliots and brigantines among their shipping, who attacked them with such bravery, that, without any great loss, they towed out their sixteen gallies, with all their cannon, stores, arms, &c.

Capello defeats the Al-gerine admiral, and is recalled.

DURING this rencounter, a shot from one of the Venetian galleasses chanced to strike at a Tur- kish mosque, which still more aggravated the action ; insomuch, that though some warm spirits commended it as a brave exploit, yet the more grave part of the senate condemned it, both as an insult on the Soltan, and as a breach of their command ; to palliate which, as well as they could, they sent him orders to sink all the Algerine ships, except the admiral, which was to be conducted to Venice, and laid up as a trophy. Capello came off with a severe reprimand ; but the republic was glad to buy their peace with the Porte, at the expence of 500,000 ducats. This was the end of that expedition, the fruits of which were lost by the too greedy avarice of the admiral. To compensate which the Grand Signor offered to fit out ten gallies for them at his own charge, upon condition they should continue in his service till the end of the ensuing summer. But Pechinin, who well knew how little the Algerine state cared to have any such g

- a obligations to him, civilly declined the offer, and set two gallies on the stocks upon his own account <sup>w</sup>. In the interim, the news of this defeat and loss filled Algiers with inexpressible grief and confusion; there being scarcely a subject that did not, in some measure, feel the loss Algiers in of so many ships, men, and plunder. The whole city was just upon the point of a general insur- <sup>great grief at</sup> rection; when the Basha and Douwan, foreseeing the danger, issued out a proclamation, ex- <sup>the news.</sup> pressly forbidding, not only complaints and outcries, under the severest penalties, without exception, but likewise all persons whatsoever to take their thumbs from within their girdles, whilst they were deliberating on that important point. This precaution had so far the desired effect, that it prevented the general discontent from breaking out into an open revolt; but, as it was no less proper to assuage their grief, or make amends for their losses, both the Basha
- b and Douwan were moved to apply to the Porte for an order, that the Venetians, settled in the Levant, should make up that great loss to them. But the Grand Signor, who had already received 500,000 ducats from them on that score, and was, perhaps, not a little affronted at the refusal which the Algerine admiral had made to his late offer, refused to comply; and left them to repair their losses, and build themselves new ships, as well as they could. However; it was not long before they had the comfort to see one of their corsairs land, with a fresh supply of 600 slaves of both sexes, which he had brought quite from the coasts of Iceland (B). They The Algerines did not continue long in that low and defenceless state; neither would the united preparations <sup>rebuild a new</sup> of the Christian states against them, permit them to do so; and we find them, accordingly, so <sup>fleet.</sup> unanimously bent upon the repairing their navy, during the two following years, that they were
- c able, at the end of them, to appear at sea with a stronger and more numerous fleet than ever they had done; and which, according to a Spanish author, then a slave at Algiers *, amounted to no less than sixty-five sail, besides other gallies and inferior vessels, which they probably had in port; so that it is rightly supposed to have been the æra in which they arrived to the zenith of their glory. Among other exploits this huge fleet performed, on several parts of the Mediterranean, which it would be tedious to enter into a detail of, seeing it was their custom to divide themselves into squadrons, greater or smaller, according to the nature of their respective courses, one rencounter we read of, which befel Hali Pichinin, that we think well worth relating.

- d We took notice that that admiral, after his sad disaster at Valona, had caused four galliots The adventure to be built at his own charge; and these he had brought to Algiers, together with such officers, <sup>of his admiral</sup> mariners, and other equipage, as had been saved from the fire and fury of the Venetian Pichinin. Some time after his arrival at that metropolis, came in likewise the Chiayah of the Basha of Tripoli, to treat about the buying of 250 Spanish and Italian slaves, for the use, and by the express order of the Grand Signor. This officer, who was come in an elegant galley, finely set out with streamers, standards, and other ornaments, and extremely well manned with Turks and renegadoes, finding that his negotiation was like to detain him longer than he expected; and being unwilling to be so long idle, proposed to Pichinin the going out with him on some cruize; to which he readily agreed. They had been scarcely four days out at sea, before they met with a stout English merchantman of 40 guns, whom Pichinin was
- e eager to have engaged, but was hindered by his captains; who, it seems, by no means liked the Englishman's aspect. They afterwards ranged several days, without meeting with any thing considerable; at which they began to be very uneasy, and out of humour; upon which Pichinin sharply told them, that had they wanted a rich prize, they would not have let the Englishman go; which stinging rebuke nettled them to such a degree, that they all swore they would set upon the first Christian ship that came in their way, at which the admiral was not a little pleased.

(B) This extraordinary, and scarce credible excursion, so far beyond what any other Barbary corsair had ever ventured, was owing to a miscreant native of that northern island, who had been taken captive in a Danish ship, by an Algerine. This traitor, whose master had roved the Mediterranean all that season without any success, and was ashamed to return home empty handed, with some difficulty persuaded him to sail to that island, where he would not fail of a considerable booty in slaves, though he would hardly meet with any thing else there worth carrying off. Those poor islanders, who had hardly ever had any other enemies to encounter than cold and misery, were so wholly unprepared to make head against such strange visitors, that they were easily dragged away from their frozen climate into the torrid one of Barbary. But how to accustom them to it, so as to make them serviceable, or even how they could keep them alive, under such a multiplicity of changes, or whether many, or any, long groaned under this new kind of misery, we are not told. But, base and detestable as this action of the islander's was, it is no more than what we find was practised by captives of much more polite nations, as Italians, Spaniards, French, &c. of which we have given some instances in the course of this history (2).

(2) See Morgan's Hist. of Algiers, vol. ii. c. ult.

ACCORDINGLY, two days after they had come to that resolution, they met with a Dutch a merchantman of 28 guns, and 40 men; which, by reason of the calm, could make no riddance with her sails. Being got within gun-shot of him, Pichinin dispatched a brigantine to acquaint the master, that he was the commander of that squadron, and that he would engage to set him and his crew on Christian land, if he quietly delivered up his ship and cargo; but that, if he refused, he must take what followed. To this message the Dutch master sent him word, that he had known him formerly at Algiers; but had now a cargo under his care, which belonged to other owners; but, added he, if he hath such a mind to it, let him come on board, and I will try what can be done to satisfy him. This answer failed not to exasperate the admiral; who thereupon drew up his five galleys and two brigantines in form of an half-moon, in order to discharge his whole artillery at once against his poop. But, before he could b well do it, the Dutchman, by the help of a lucky breeze, turning his ship the quite contrary way, put his galleys into such a confusion, that, instead of keeping in their due order, they ran foul of each other. Upon which Pichinin, steering his galley close by the Dutchman's side, threw about 70 of his soldiers into it; who, with their drawn swords, took possession of the upper deck, where some of them began to slash the rigging, whilst others plied the hatches with hand-granadoes, but were quickly diverted from it by the Dutchmen; who, having secured themselves within their close quarters, began to pepper them with small shot from two cannon, which they had planted against them. The admiral made several efforts to rescue his men, whilst the other galleys tried to surround the ship; but they all found their c stations too hot for them, by reason that the ship, being heavy laden, lay so deep in water, that every shot made terrible execution amongst them, and obliged them to remove farther from him. At length the Dutchman, being ready to take his leave of them, caused his guns to be loaded with cartouches, and gave them such a volley at parting, as killed 200 of their men, besides the wounded, and sent them back to Algiers in a most dismal plight; to the no small grief and mortification of the proud Algerines, as well as of the four corsairs<sup>r</sup>. The Tripolitan Chiayah died soon after of his wounds, and the renowned Pichinin was forced to own, that he had met with a tartar in that brave and experienced Dutch captain.

BUT whilst this small squadron had the mortification to return to Algiers thus shattered and foiled, the town had quickly after the pleasure to see others come in, fraught with rich spoils d of the Christians, and with great numbers of slaves; insomuch, that they quickly became more powerful and formidable than ever to the European powers, and made England, France, and Holland, buckle to them. As for Spain, Portugal, Italy, &c. they absolutely determined never to make any peace or alliance with them, as being sworn enemies to the Mohammedan religion, and consequently the properest to carry on a perpetual war against; seeing that was the chief support and strength of the Algerine state, as hath been elsewhere observed<sup>2</sup>. When they were once got to this height of power and grandeur, that they could make English, French, and Dutch, glad to purchase their friendship at any rate, and the rest of Europe stand in dread of them, it was natural for that proud and turbulent nation to make one bold push more, to rid themselves of the only check they had left to their aspiring views, their dependence upon e the Porte. We lately took notice of some bold steps they had already made towards it, and what disregard they had shewed, not only to its alliances with some Christian princes, but likewise to the authority of its viceroys, which was now dwindled into a mere compliance with whatever the Deys, and their Douwan, were pleased to ordain, without which they must have been exposed to continual mortifications and insults from that quarter. On the other hand, the Porte, ever watchful and jealous of its own power and interest, could hardly brook so sensible a diminution of them, which still decreased in proportion to their success, and increase in wealth and strength; which obliged it frequently to exchange those mercenary and inactive Bashas, for others more strenuous, active, and intrepid, who might watch all opportunities of recovering their pristine authority. Their commissions were not only made f more extensive, but some of them even impowered to dethrone and put to death any of those Deys that opposed the Soltan's will, and to nominate others to that dignity<sup>3</sup>. Such violent proceedings, we may easily imagine, could hardly be carried on, without throwing the whole realm into the most desperate convulsions, that were seldom, if ever appeased, but by the expulsion or massacre of those bloody ministers, and all their adherents. This mutual contest between the Turkish viceroys, and the Algerine Deys, makes the most considerable part of their domestic history, till the beginning of the following century, when the latter found means to persuade the Porte to unite those two dignities into one; and to consent, that whosoever was chosen Dey by the Algerine Douwan, should be likewise invested with the title and dignity of viceroy, or Basha; as we shall see in its proper place. But, not to dwell any g longer on those intestine and less interesting broils, let us now proceed to that part of their history which most concerns us.

a We may remember how much the Algerine state repented the ill advised, as well as unsuccessful attempt, which our admiral Mansel had made on their capital and navy; from which time they hardly ever ceased annoying us at sea, and wreaking their revenge on as many of our vessels as fell into their hands, in spite of all the friendly and generous means our nation had taken to regain their friendship. It was not till towards the latter end of the reign of king Charles II. that we obtained from them that lasting alliance, which, with some renewals, additions, and alterations, hath subsisted between us ever since; and for the further particulars of which, we shall refer our readers to what shall be said of it in our English history<sup>b</sup>. What is worth our notice here is, that the readiness they shewed on this occasion to come into such friendly terms with us, was principally owing to the distress they were then in, and the great need they stood in of our assistance and friendship; when we might, perhaps, at any other juncture, have prayed to and bribed them in vain. The occasion of this was as follows:

b THEY had, for some time, committed such grievous outrages on the coasts of Provence and Languedoc, that Lewis XIV. had ordered a considerable fleet to be fitted out, on the year before this treaty was concluded, in order to suppress and crush them, and revive the commerce, which their depredations at sea, in conjunction with the corsairs of Tripoli, had in a great measure destroyed. The marquis Du Quesne, vice-admiral of France, whose name was already become formidable to all the piratic crew, was at the head of this expedition, and began it with the chase of several Tripolitan galleys, who had the good fortune to out row him, and shelter themselves in the island of Scio, which belonged to the Turks; yet this did not prevent c him pursuing them thither, and making such terrible fire upon them, as quickly shattered and sunk fourteen of their vessels, besides battering the walls, and other works of the castle.

It seems, by his falling thus furiously on these, that he only wanted to deter, and not fall out with, the Algerines; but when he found that they still continued their outrages on the French coasts, he sailed to their capital in the month of August of the following year, and tell immediately cannonading and bombarding it with such fury, that the whole town was in flames in a very little time. The great mosque was battered down, and the greatest part of the houses reduced into a heap of ruins; insomuch, that the affrighted inhabitants were upon the point of abandoning the place; when on a sudden the wind chopped about, and obliged him to return to Toulon. As soon as the storm was over, the Douwan assembled themselves in a d tumultuous manner, and forthwith ordered as many of their galleys and galliots as could be got ready, in spite of the roughness of the sea, to sail forthwith for the coasts of Provence; where they committed the most dreadful ravages, killing, burning, and destroying all that came in their way, and brought off a vast number of captives. As soon as the news of this fresh insult arrived at the French court, a new armament was ordered to be got ready with all expedition, at Toulon and Marseilles, against the next year; of which the Algerines having got timely notice, the Douwan immediately ordered the walls of the town, and other fortifications, to be repaired, and the mole and haven to be put into the best state of defence that the shortness of the time would allow.

e IN May following the French squadron cast anchor before Algiers; where the vice-admiral Du Quesne was joined by the marquis D'Affranville, at the head of five other stout vessels; upon whose arrival, a council being called, they resolved to bombard the town next morning; which was accordingly done, and a hundred bombs were thrown into it on that day, which made terrible execution, whilst the besieged made some hundred discharges of their cannon against them, without doing them any considerable damage. On the following night the bombs were thrown into it again in such number, that the Dey's palace, and other great edifices, were almost destroyed; some of their batteries were dismounted, and several vessels sunk in the port. This swift and dreadful havock quickly determined Hassan, the then Dey, and the whole soldiery, as well as the Turkish Basha, to sue for peace; upon which father Facher, who then acted at Algiers in the quality of French consul, was immediately dispatched f to the French admiral, and with him a Turkish delegate, with the latter of whom the admiral readily treated, but refused to admit the former. In this conference the marquis insisted before all things upon an immediate surrender of all Christian captives that had been taken fighting under the French flag; which being readily granted, 142 of them were brought to him on the next day, with a promise of sending him the remainder, as soon as they could be got together from the different parts of the country, whither they were dispersed: which being accordingly done, he consented to treat with them about a peace. Accordingly he sent a few days after the commissary-general of his squadron, and one of his engineers, into the town; but with express orders to insist upon the delivery of all the rest of their French captives, none excepted, and of the effects they had taken from the French, and upon their sending the famed Mezomorto, their then admiral, and Hali Rais, one of their captains, as hostages to him.

THIS last demand failed not to embarrass the Dey; who thereupon assembled the Douwan, and acquainted them with it. Whereupon Mezomorto fell into a violent passion, and told that assembly, that the cowardice of those that sat at the helm had occasioned the ruin of Algiers; but that, for his part, he never would consent to deliver up any thing that had been taken from the French. He went immediately from thence to the soldiery, whom he acquainted with what had passed, and so exasperated them against the Dey, that they unanimously resolved to murder him; which they accordingly did that very night, as he was going his round. On the next day Mezomorto caused himself to be elected Dey by the soldiery and people; immediately after which he cancelled all the articles of peace that had been agreed on, and ordered the bloody standard to be displayed on the city walls. The hostilities were thereupon renewed with greater fury than ever on both sides; and the French admiral kept pouring in such volleys of bombs, that in less than three days the greatest part of the city was reduced to ashes, and the fire burnt with such vehemence, that the sea was enlightened with it above the length of two leagues. Mezomorto, unmoved at all these disasters, and the vast number of the slain, whose blood ran in rivulets along the streets, or rather grown furious and desperate by them, sought only how to wreak his revenge on the enemy; and, not content to have caused all the French that were in the city to be cruelly butchered, ordered their consul to be tied hand and foot, and fastened alive to the mouth of a mortar, and thence shot away against their navy, instead of a bomb.

the town.

THIS unheard of piece of inhumanity so exasperated the French admiral, that the winds proving still favourable to him, he did not leave Algiers, till he had utterly destroyed all their shipping, fortifications, buildings, and in one word, almost all the lower part, and above two thirds of the upper part of the city. He was no sooner sailed away, than the Algerines began to think seriously on the most effectual means for procuring a peace with France. This motion was quite disrelished by Mezomorto, who, to avoid his predecessor's fate, disappeared on a sudden; whilst the rest of the Douwan unanimously agreed to send an embassy to Paris, to excuse and beg pardon, among other things, for the murder of the consul, which they all disavowed, and to persuade the French court, that the populace alone were the authors of that atrocious deed, being enraged at the prodigious damage their admiral had done to their city, by the vast number of bombs he had caused to be thrown into it. Of which commission their envoy Hagi Giaffer Aga Effendi acquitted himself in the best manner he could, as the reader may see by the speech he made to that monarch on his last audience, and which, being a curious piece in its kind, we have given him a literal version of in the margin (C). The result of which was, the ratification of the said peace at Paris on the fol-

a lowing year ; after which, the next care of the Dey, and his Douwan, was to repair, as fast as they could, the dreadful dilapidations which the French cannon and bombs had made in that metropolis <sup>which is concluded.</sup> 1684.

THE joy which reigned through Algiers at the conclusion of this peace with France was so much the greater, because, till that was obtained, the Grand Signor, who was at peace with France, was obliged, at least outwardly, to resent the outrages they had committed upon their coasts, and could not give them any assistance towards the repairing of their city and navy, without offending that monarch. But, being now at full liberty to do as he pleased with them, it was his interest to send them what succour they needed, not only on account of the service they could do him against other Christian powers, but likewise, as that gave him a fair opportunity of binding them more strictly to their obedience to him, than they had been of late, and to raise the authority of his Bashas to its pristine height ; which, as we observed a little higher, <sup>The Turkish Bashas grow insolent.</sup> was dwindled into a mere servility to their Deys and Douwan. For which reason it is more than probable, that he was far from being displeased at the severe method which France had taken to humble them thus far.

HOWEVER that be, the Porte took care from that time to send them such strenuous viceroys, and with such extensive powers, as should make them deserve the supplies they received from them. Whilst, on their side, the Algerines failed not to express the most submissive regard to them, till they found themselves so well recovered from their late disasters, as to be able to resume their old course. We need not therefore wonder at their unusual readiness to enter into an alliance with us, at such a crisis as this ; nor at our English admirals obtaining such advantageous terms from them, at a juncture when our friendship and assistance was become at least as necessary and beneficial to them, as theirs could be to us. This treaty, which hath been the ground-work of all those that have been since made with them, was renewed four years after, mutatis mutandis, in the 2d year of king James the second's reign, by Sir William Soam, in his way to Constantinople, whither he was sent ambassador by our court. It bears date April the 5th, and without any alteration than that of names, and of some literals. The same may be said of that, which was renewed between Chaaban Chojiah the then Dey of Algiers, and Sir Thomas Baker, five years after, in the 2d year of king William's reign. But all this while we must not suppose that the Algerines, especially the Rais, or captains of their corsairs, were such strict observers of those treaties, as to let any of our ships escape them, whenever they could conveniently make a prize ; for which they never wanted an excuse or pretence, whenever a complaint was made to the regency. Nor was it easy to obtain a restitution or redress from the Deys or Douwan, whose interest it was to encourage those piratic practices, upon so many accounts ; so that the only remedy was making reprisals upon them ; and it was upon some such infringement of it, that captain Beach, about nine years after the last conclusion of that treaty, fell foul on seven of their frigates, which he drove on shore and burnt. The result of which was a fresh revival of it with that republic, by captain Munden, and Robert Cole, Esq ; with the addition of three articles, which will explain the occasion of it. They are to this import :

e 1. That the peace concluded in 1682 be confirmed ; and more particularly the eighth article ; wherein it is expressed, that no ship belonging to Algiers shall cruize in sight of any port or place belonging to Great Britain, or in any way disturb the peace or commerce of the same ; nor shall any Algerine vessel enter the English chanel.

2. No passes shall be required from an English ship, till the last day of September 1701. But after that time, if any English ship shall be seized, not having a pass, the goods of such ship shall be prize ; but the master, men, and ship, shall be restored, and the freight immediately paid to the master.

f 3. Whereas captain Munden hath complained, that he was affronted some years past by some rude soldiers at the mole, it is promised, that, at all times hereafter, when any British man of war shall come to Algiers, order shall be given to an officer to attend at the mole, during their stay, to prevent any such disorder ; and if any such shall happen, the offender shall be punished with the utmost severity.

g THIS treaty, which bears date August 20, 1700, is thus prefaced, We the most excellent and most illustrious lords, Mustapha Dey, Hali Basba, and Mustapha Aga, governors of the most famous and most warlike city and kingdom of Algiers, do, by these presents, renew and confirm the peace we so happily enjoy, with William king of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, defender of the Christian faith, and his subjects, in the year of Jesus, &c. by which most pompous titles we may reasonably conclude, that the Algerines had, by this time, that is, in about 17 years since the dreadful bombardment lately mentioned, regained in a great measure their pristine strength and grandeur, as well as their native pride and insolence, seeing, they have added the title of most excellent to that of illustrious, with regard to themselves ; and that of most warlike to that of most famous, with respect to their city and kingdom, which were not in that of 1682 ; and which would, at that time, have been very unsuitable to their forlorn and ruined state. We may farther observe, from the Turkish Basha or viceroy being named in it as the second person in that government, they had regained their privilege of assisting and opining, if not of voting, in the Douwan, since their late disaster, of which they had been deprived some years before, when the Algerine state was in its most flourishing condition. And what most confirms this observation is, that, in less than ten years from this present date, they were grown up to such an height of insolence and tyranny again, as to obstruct the Dey's election, with such strenuous opposition, as occasioned the total suppression of that dignity, as we shall see in the sequel.

Mustapha grants Eng-land two more articles.

As for Mustapha, the present Dey, he continued still a friend to the English nation ; and renewed the old treaty with Sir George Byng, afterwards lord Torrington, being queen Anne's admiral, with the addition of the two following articles ; viz.

1. " That whereas by those of the old treaties it was agreed, that subjects of England should pay ten per cent. custom for the goods they should sell at Algiers, or in the dominions thereof, for the better settling and maintaining a good commerce between the subjects of those two nations, the English should from henceforth pay no more than five per cent. custom for such goods ; and that such as were found to be contraband, should not pay any custom, as had been before concluded.

2. " That all prizes taken by any of the subjects of the said queen of Great Britain, and all the ships and vessels built or fitted out in any of her majesty's plantations in America, that have not been in England, shall not be molested on account of their not being furnished with passes ; but that a certificate in writing, under the hands of the commanding officers, who shall take any prizes, and a certificate under the hands of the governors or chiefs of such American colonies or places where such ships were built or fitted out, shall be sufficient passes for either of them. And our faith shall be our faith, and our word our word. Signed at Algiers, October 28, in the year of Jesus 1703, &c. which was the second year of queen Anne's reign."

BUT it was not till after the taking of Gibraltar and Port Mahon by Sir George Rooke, that we could have a sufficient check upon them to oblige them to the observation of those articles ; and if we have since had a greater influence and awe upon them, than ever we had before, it is plainly owing, as we have elsewhere observed, to the neighbourhood of those two places that we are beholden for it, else the frequent chicaneries, which we have been obliged to have with them, and the late infringement of some of those articles by their scoundrel Rais, who are most of them, as well as great part of their crews, renegadoes of the vilest character, and which our government hath, for wise reasons doubtless, thought fit to put up with, sufficiently shew, of what a small advantage the most friendly and solemn treaties would be to us, if we had nothing else but their faith and honesty to depend upon for the observance of them.

FOUR or five years elapsed since the ratification of the articles above-mentioned, during which nothing material happened, excepting their usual excursions abroad, and hard struggles between the regency and Turkish viceroys at home. But the sixth proved a very remarkable one, for their retaking the famed city of Warran, or Awaran, from the Spaniards, which proved a considerable loss to them, on account of vast numbers of slaves, and quantities of grain, oil, leather, and other commodities, which they yearly drew from thence, as well as of the singular advantage of its convenient and spacious harbour ; the strength and importance of that fortress, which not only kept the Algerines in awe, but stood excellently well situated for the execution of any design against them. And of such importance hath it been reckoned by these ever since, that they immediately made it the residence of the western Bey, or governor of the western circuit, which till then used to be at Tremecen ; and who, besides a stout garrison, keeps up a little army of 2,000 Cologlies, or Coulolies, at his own charge, and a guard of 1,500 Moors, to accompany him in his circuit<sup>a</sup>. Notwithstanding all which precautions, as well as the several fortifications they added to it, in order to keep it in their hands, the Spaniards retook it from them with great difficulty, in the year 1737. We have elsewhere given a description of that famed fortress, its harbour, and various fortifications<sup>b</sup> ; the greatest part of which had been added to it by the Spaniards, after their becoming masters of it, an. 1505<sup>c</sup>. Since which time they had kept possession of it, in spite of the several efforts of the Deys to regain it. However, though the reduction of it by the Algerines be ascribed, by most Christian writers, to the treachery and cowardice of the governor, as well as to the grievous war which Philip V. had then upon his hands, which would not permit him to send a sufficient succour to it<sup>d</sup>, rather than to the martial skill and bravery of the enemy's troops, as great rejoicings were made at Algiers, as if it had been won by dint of strength and valour ; and the remainder of that year, a and the greater part of the next, were chiefly employed, either in repairing the old, and making new fortifications to it, or in the conveying into it a vast quantity of artillery, and all other war-like stores, in order to secure it, as much as possible, against all future attempts, either from Spain or any other Christian power.

THE next year was still more remarkable and prosperous to Algiers, upon several accounts; This proves a as 1st, of the assassination of their worthless Dey Ibraim, surnamed the madman; 2. of the ele- memorable ction of the brave Hali to the throne; and 3dly, the expulsion of the Turkish Basha, and year to Algiers. excision of that dignity, by the courage and address of the new Dey. 1710.

As to the first of these transactions, it is of such a nature as to deserve to be related with all its principal circumstances; since it will afford our readers a lively notion of the dangers and dif-
b asters which such an uncontrouled authority is apt to bring, both upon the possessor, and those that are under him. Ibraim had some noble qualities, though not such as were very agreeable to his subjects. He was a severe punisher of all kinds of knavery, theft, frauds, and other such Ibraim chosen pilfering rogueries; which, as hath been elsewhere observed, are so common all over these parts. Dey; his cha- He had, moreover, a special knack at discovering them, and would spare no pains to find out rafter. the authors of them (D), and the truth of a fact: But was given so wholly to women, that he His excessive would procure them by the most illegal means, and such as are, even among them, reckoned lust. unpardonable. His custom was, as soon as his panders had informed him of any extraordinary beauty, to take his time, when their husbands were at sea, or absent, to come and visit them at unreasonable hours, and either by threats or bribery to introduce himself to them; and by the c same means to work them into a compliance to his wishes. Among the rest, the wife of one Mahmut Rais, having been attempted by him, in one of his nocturnal rambles (her door-keeper, a deformed eunuch, having let him in during his master's absence) instead of giving him the reception he expected, either from his caresses or menaces, repulsed him with the utmost indignation and stinging reproaches, and obliged him to go off, which he with some reluctance did, though without any apprehensions of her further resentment.

Her husband arriving soon after, she failed not to acquaint him with the insult that had been offered to her; but finding him very fearful to encounter the Dey on so tender an occasion, and rather willing to conceal the attempt than to revenge it, she told him, in a violent passion, that she found she had been married only to some patient Christian, and not, as she thought, to a brave d Mussulman, and would not be long before she got herself divorced from him. Her next step was to communicate the matter to several Rais, or sea captains; and by representing to them the danger they were in of being made the slaves of Ibraim's lust, who had ventured to give such early tokens of disregard to all religion, and to the honour of their sex, easily animated them to engage their husbands in the common quarrel. These soon after persuaded Mahmut to listen to his wife's counsel, and promised to assist him to rid the country of that worthless monarch; at which she was exceedingly pleased, and advised her husband to order the deformed Negroe, who had introduced him to her apartment, to give him the first mortal stroke. The whole junto soon after agreed to assassinate him upon the first opportunity; A conspiracy and accordingly, as he was one day coming from the mole, the Negroe, whom they had formed against
e posted at the water-gate, discharged his piece at him, but in the hurry and fear missed him; him; at which the Dey turned pale, but kept on his pace, without daring to ask any question about the matter, not knowing who to trust on such an occasion; neither did his attendance

(D) The reader will not perhaps be displeased, if we give one instance, among many, by way of specimen. A retailer of grocery having been represented to him, as using sundry knavish practices to his customers, Ibraim, resolved to know the truth, disguises himself in the habit of a slave, and, taking another with him, goes one morning to his shop, and tells the man, that he and his companion were sent to their country work, but wanted to buy some rice and raisins of him, to make a dish after their country fashion, before they set out; but desired him not to speak a word of it to their surly master, lest he should severely punish them for loitering so long in town. The shop-keeper promised secrecy; but, at the same time, took care to sell them the rice and raisins at a dearer rate than had been settled by authority, not dreaming of any ill consequence from two despicable slaves.

Ibraim, being returned to his palace, and dressed in his usual habit, caused the grocer to be brought before him, and his companion to lay the accusation against him; which the other boldly denied, alleging, that the rogue of a slave only used this stratagem to get his money again, after he had bought his goods. Upon which Ibraim, without taking notice to him of his being a party concerned in the sale, ordered him to remain; and caused a proclamation to be made, that if any Turk, Moor, Jew, or Christian, had any complaint against such a grocer, they should immediately repair to the Dey's palace for redress, provided they came before the hour of prayer. It was not long before several persons appeared, and convicted him of fraud and extortion. The consequence of which was, that he condemned him to receive 500 bastinadoes on the soles of his feet, and to pay 500 piasters into the public treasury, as a present punishment, for having dared to assert a falsehood in the Dey's presence, and till a more adequate sentence should be pronounced against him. Which last sentence, when debated by the plurality of votes, was, that he should be forthwith hanged, as being the first prevaricator that had been detected since Ibraim's election to the Deylick (7).

offer to stir in his defence, for fear of incurring the same. They had scarce reached the Battistan, or slave market, before the Negroe, who had newly charged his piece, and taken a shorter way, fired upon him, and missed him a second time; which made him hasten to his palace with all the speed he could; whilst the conspirators, who had intermixed themselves with his retinue, followed him, crying aloud Char-alla, justice for God's sake. These were quickly joined by the populace, some of which cried out, that he should be dethroned, and others, that he might be dispatched.

THE affrighted Dey, had, however, the good fortune to reach his apartment, and barricade himself in his chamber, with two Christian slaves, his pages. The place being adorned with variety of fire-arms, which had been presented by Christian princes, he ordered those pages to take them down, and fire among the assailants at every breach they made in the door, by which several of them were killed and wounded; so that, finding the attack too hot at the door, they ran up to the terrafs, over his chamber; and having made a large aperture in it, kept pouring hand grenadoes into it, till they had quite dispatched him, after he had reigned a little above a month. Such was the fatal end of Ibrahim Dey, as we have it related by Mr. De Tassy, who was then residing at Algiers<sup>c</sup>; and such is the precarious and hazardous state of that elective dignity, and arbitrary government. The next reign will give us another pregnant instance of its malignancy with regard to the subjects.

Baba Hali
chosen Dey.

THE Douwan, after the murder of Ibrahim, immediately proceeded to the election of a successor, and Baba Hali was the person, who, without any great opposition or bloodshed, was raised to that dignity; yet, though a person of known valour and merit, had not been long seated on his throne, before he discovered that a most powerful faction, consisting chiefly of the friends and partizans of the late Dey, was forming against him; so that, to keep himself steady in it, he was obliged to put to death above 1,700 of them, on the very first month of his reign. This extreme severity, as it was thought by the rest of his subjects, rather aggravated, than suppressed, the public murmuring and discontent, and proved the source of several other conspiracies against him, which yet his good fortune and vigilance, joined to an intrepid bravery and artful conduct, enabled him to nip in the bud. Among other popular acts, which he did in order to appease the resentment of Ibrahim's relations and friends, he caused the body of that unfortunate prince, dragged and mangled as it had been by the insulting populace, to be taken up, and honourably buried; and ordered a stately mausoleum to be erected over his grave.

BUT the most politic, as well as popular act of his reign, and which hath most endeared that æra, as well as his memory, was the delivering that state from the tyrannical check of the Turkish Bashas, or viceroys. The person, who then resided in that quality at Algiers, whose name is not mentioned by our author, had, it seems, been very busy and intermeddling in matters of state, which were to be wholly out of his province. He had particularly had a great influence in the election of the late Dey, as well as ventured to oppose that of the present. This insolence, which had hitherto been indulged to them by the government, could hardly escape the resentment of Hali Dey, who made no scruple to get him arrested soon after his election, and ordered him to be embarked in a trading vessel that was bound to Tunis, with a severe threatening, that he would surely put him to death, if ever he dared set his foot in Algiers, to raise any fresh commotions.

Hali's embassy to the Porte.

THE next step our politic Dey took, was to send an embassy to the Porte, with rich presents for the Vazier, the Soltanesses, and chief officers of the court, with a detail of complaints against the Bascha, and represented to the Grand Vazier, that, though his turbulent misconducts were risen to such a height that they deserved death, nevertheless, out of his deep regard to the Grand Signor and him, he had only contented himself with banishing him. He added, that the Turkish militia was so exasperated against those Bashas, that, if any for the future should give them the same cause of discontent, they would not fail of massacring them, which would be a great insult, and an irreparable affront to the sublime Porte. He closed his representation with observing, how much more it would be for the honour and interest of the Soltan, since those Bashas were so useless, obnoxious, and chargeable, not to send any more of them to Algiers, but to confer that dignity on the Deys for the time being. This proposal was so well relished at the Constantinopolitan court, that it was immediately agreed to<sup>f</sup>; and from that time Hali, and his successors, have looked upon themselves as sovereigns, and acted with a plenary power, and the title of Bashas, or viceroys, of the Ottoman Porte, excepting only that, upon some particular occasions, this last sends his Capigi Bashas, or envoys extraordinary, to Algiers, to transact or settle matters with the Douwan; yet do they there meet with but a cold reception, not only on account of their being maintained at the public charge, but much more so for their haughty deportment, which is the more odious to the soldiery, as it is a kind of reproach on their meanness, and their dependance on the Porte; for which a reason they make all the dispatch they can to dismiss them, and with as little ceremony as common decency and policy will admit of.

In the 4th year of Hali's reign happened another remarkable occurrence, which well deserves a place here. Mr. Thomas Thomson, our English consul at Algiers, as he was going to the hall, where the captains of ships usually meet, was insulted by a young Moor, supposed to have been in liquor, by jostling him on the mole, which is very narrow, instead of giving him the way; and, upon his being asked, whether he intended to shove him over it, and whether he was not an odd spark to dispute the way with him, answered him, with great insolence, that no dog of a Christian was above him, and gave him a box on the ear; and throwing him upon his back, clapped his knee furiously on his breast. The captain of the port, happening to be in sight, called out to him; upon which he left him and fled, whilst he helped the consul up, and led him to the assembly of the sea officers. The admiral being there apprised of what had happened, expressed his utmost concern at the insult, and went forthwith and complained of it to the Dey in the strongest terms; but, having a regard for the young offender, whose father was a noted merchant, endeavoured to extenuate the fault, and begged that he might not be punished with death. The Dey, though he promised to spare him so far, yet insisted that some punishment should be laid on him, for the satisfaction of the consul and the determent of others.

A BASTINADO being agreed on between them, Mr. Thomson was sent for to see justice done on the offender; and the young Moor was brought in by the Grand Provost, to whom the Dey sternly said, Thou villain, what hast thou done? To whom the young fellow, with little or no concern, answered, What have I done! I have only beaten a Christian dog for taking the wall of me, and giving me abusive language. The Dey, in a passion, asked him, Whether it was true that he had treated the English consul in the shameful manner complained of? which he as impudently acknowledged; and asked him, Whether that was all he was brought before him for? At which the Dey was so exasperated, that he condemned him to receive two thousand two hundred bastinadoes, which were accordingly given him before the consul.

THE first thousand strokes, which were given him on the soles of his feet, brought them so far off, that they only hanged by a small ligament: but as a greater number would soon have dispatched him out of his misery, the Dey, to make as severe and deterring an example of him as possible, ordered him back to prison to recover himself; and, on the morrow, by nine of the clock, the remaining twelve hundred strokes were given him on his posteriors; upon which he lost his speech and senses: but, as he was not quite dead, he was remanded back to prison, there to be left, without any relief, to expire in the most dreadful agonies for his drunken folly<sup>a</sup>, as a determent against such future insults.

IT was also in this same year that admiral Baker, being sent by his Britannic majesty, king George I. to renew the treaties with Tunis, Tripoli, and Algiers, visited the two former kingdoms in person; but deputed captain Coningsby Norbury, commander of the Argyle, and captain Nicholas Eaton, commander of the Chester, in conjunction with Mr. Thomas Thomson, who, in the absence of his brother Samuel, acted as consul, to ratify all the former treaties with the Algerine republic, and to add to them the four following articles, viz.

1. THAT, if any demand or pretensions shall be now left depending between the subjects, or others, of either party, they shall be amicably redressed, and full satisfaction made to each other, according to the truth and justice of their claim; nor shall any of the same be cancelled, or made void by this treaty.

2. THAT, as the island of Minorca, in the Mediterranean sea, and the city of Gibraltar, in Spain, have been yielded and annexed to the crown of Great Britain, as well by the king of Spain as by the several powers in Europe engaged in the late war, it is now hereby agreed, and fully concluded, that, from this time forward for ever, the said island of Minorca and the city of Gibraltar shall be esteemed, in every respect, by the government and people of Algiers, to be part of his Britannic majesty's dominions, and the inhabitants thereof be looked upon as his majesty's natural subjects, in the same manner as if they had been born in any part of the British territories. And they, with their ships and vessels, wearing British colours, and being furnished with proper passes, shall be permitted freely to trade and traffick in any part of the dominions of Algiers, without any molestation whatsoever; and shall have the same liberties and privileges that are stipulated in this, and have been made in any other treaties, in behalf of the British nation and subjects; and, therefore, none of the cruizers shall, at any time, cruize within sight of the said island of Minorca and city of Gibraltar.

3. THAT, if an English ship shall receive on board any passengers or goods belonging to Algiers, the English shall defend them both as far as lieth in their power, &c. and to prevent any fraudulent demands being made on the crown of Great Britain, &c. all goods, &c. stipulated by the subjects of Algiers on British vessels, shall be first registered in the office of Cancellaria before the British consul, together with their weight, value, &c. before it depart.

4. THAT, if any Algerine cruizers shall meet with any British ships provided with scollop passes, of either ships or gallies, that shall fit with those delivered to them by the British consul, they shall pass free and unmolested. Given at Algiers, October 29, 1716.

Hali Dey dies, greatly regretted.

THUS far the additional articles, concluded with Baba Hali Dey, who had the good fortune to die quietly in his bed, after a reign of almost eight years. He was raised from the dignity of Basha, or Grand Provost, to that of Dey, in June, 1710; and died April 13, 1718, highly esteemed and regretted, and was interred with great pomp, as is usually done to those Deys that die a natural death. However, to prevent all tumults and bloodshed about the choice of a successor, the officers of his household, in conjunction with those of the Douwan, took care, as soon as his physicians had given him over, to agree upon one privately amongst themselves, namely, Mehemed, who was then Cazenar, or high treasurer. So that as soon as the breath was gone out of Hali's body, he was immediately invested with the Castan, or royal robes; and, as soon as day-light appeared, was proclaimed by the firing of the artillery, and other usual ceremonies<sup>a</sup>; and with this period we shall conclude the Algerine history.

C H A P. IV.

The history of Tunis, or Tunes.

- <sup>a</sup> THIS kingdom hath its name from its famed metropolis, one of the antientest cities in Africa, and once the second in rank next to Carthage, as may be seen by the description Tunis, which we have given of it, and its various changes, in our Antient history<sup>a</sup>. Both the kingdom of Tunis, the city and kingdom hath undergone a much greater number since the expulsion of the Romans out of Africa; an account of which will be seen in the sequel: at present we shall content ourselves with observing, that, in its more modern state, that is, before Barbarossa stripped it of some of its provinces, it was of a much larger extent than it hath ever been since its being established in its new form of government by Sinan Pasha, though still a very powerful and opulent city under its new set of monarchs; and, we may add, more civilized than any on the African coasts; insomuch that, from being once as famed for its corsairs as that of Algiers last spoken of, its inhabitants have, of late years, given themselves wholly to traffick, and cease to be a terror to the fair trader on those seas.

S E C T. I.

- <sup>c</sup> THIS kingdom did once comprehend the provinces of Constantina, Bujeyah, or Bugia, Tunis, Tripoli, and Zaab, vulgarly Ezzab. At present the two former belong to Al-giers, the third, viz. Tripoli, forms a republic of itself, and Zaab is become dependant on it; so that only Tunis Proper is all that is left of it to its present Beys. Its boundaries, therefore, are now the Mediterranean on the north and east, the kingdom of Algiers on the west, and Tripoli, with part of Biledulgerid, on the south. The length of it, from north to south, or from Cape Serra, in lat.  $37^{\circ} 12'$ , to the island of Ferba, in lat.  $33^{\circ} 30'$ , is 220 miles; and its breadth, from west to east, or from the city of Sbekka, the most advanced towards the west, and lying in east long.  $8^{\circ} 0'$ , to that of Clybea, the farthest towards the east, under  $11^{\circ} 20'$  east longitude, about  $170^{\circ}$  (A).
- <sup>d</sup> THE kingdom of Tunis hath been variously divided; viz. 1. into seven provinces; four of which, Carthage, Goletta, al. Guletta, Bizerta, Susa, and Almedea, or Africa, were stiled maritime; and the other three Kayr wan, Urbs, and Beggia, together with a tract of land, one half in Numidia, and the other in Libya, were called inland. Again: into the eight following districts or governments; viz. 1. Tunis Proper; 2. Byrsa, or Carthage, and Goletta, which are now joined to the first; 3. El-Medea, or Africa; 4. Susa, or Sousa; 5. Kayr-wan, or Cairvan; 6. Hamamet, al. Mabometta; 7. Bizerta; 8. Porto Farino; all which take their names from their respective capitals. At present the whole kingdom is divided into two circuits; viz. the summer and winter, which the Bey takes in person through his dominions at those two seasons, as will be seen in the sequel. We shall, however, for order's sake, follow the second division in our subsequent account of those capitals and their districts; each of which
- <sup>e</sup> had, moreover, a number of cities and towns; the greatest part of which have been since destroyed by the Arabians, who are here very numerous and powerful, and who will not suffer them to be rebuilt, that they may have the greater freedom to range the country with their vast

(A) We have here followed one of the latest and most accurate writers (1), whose observations, if right, plainly shew, how greatly some modern geographers have erred, particularly Sanfon, who places Cape Bona in lat.  $34^{\circ} 15'$ , and Cape Gabs in  $30^{\circ}$  north; that is, above three degrees too far southward. Moll likewise brings it a few minutes only too far north, but extends it to the southward beyond the parallel of Tripoli. De-lisse hath done almost the same in his royal map of Africa; whereas, as our author observes, there is a remarkable chain of mountains in the same parallel with the island of Ferba, which forms the boundaries of Tunis and Tripoli. So that, of all the other modern geographers, Luyts seems to have been the best acquainted with the extent of this kingdom in general, who allows it three degrees of longitude, and four of latitude (2).

herds,

herds, and enjoy the pleasures and product of that fertile country in greater ease and plenty. <sup>a</sup> So that the inland part is now hardly any other than a vast spacious champaign country, most of the cities being situate along the coast; and these not above fourteen in number, and but few of them either large or populous. Those in the inland parts are still fewer, and in a worse condition, being but eight in all; that is, seven in Tunis, and one in Biledulgerid <sup>b</sup>. However, as the division of this kingdom into provinces, hath been set aside long since, and the whole is under the immediate government and inspection of the Bey, who collects the tribute and whole revenue in person, we shall content ourselves with giving their names in the margin (B), and follow the present established division of the kingdom, which is into the two circuits that the Bey takes through the principal part of it with his flying camp; the one in summer through the fertile country, in the neighbourhood of Keff and Baijab; the other in the winter, through the several districts between Kayr-wan and the Jereede, or Elgereid, that is, the dry country; which part of the Sabara, or desert, we have had occasion to speak already in the history of Algiers *. By this means we shall have an opportunity of describing such of those cities as have any thing worth notice, without troubling our reader with the rest; as likewise the capes, principal islands, rivers, mountains, and other particulars, as they occur in each circuit; and this division of the kingdom into those two circuits will appear the more convenient, as it corresponds as much as possible to that of the antients into Zeugitana and Byzacium, spoken of in the Antient History <sup>c</sup>; according to which, the former or summer circuit will include that part which spreads itself northward of the parallel of Hamamet, or Hamam-el; and the winter one, answering to the old Byzacium, or Libyphœnice, will contain all that lieth south of that parallel <sup>d</sup>.

THE summer circuit, or northern district, is by far the most pleasant, fertile, and populous, and hath a much greater number of cities, villages, Dowars, or Adowars, and carries the fairest appearance of plenty, prosperity, and chearfulness of the two; which is, doubtless, owing to the mildness of its government, and its being freer from tyranny and oppression than that of Algiers last spoken of. And, as it is bounded by the river Tusca, now called Zaine, tho' by others Guadil-Barbar, which divides it from the Algerine province of Constantina, may be properly looked upon as the Africa Propria Minor and Carthaginensis, and the Provincia Vetus of the antients, and the Proconsularis of the Notitia <sup>e</sup>. Its most fertile parts are about the Keff and Bai-jab, and Dackbut, which abound with arable and pasture grounds. The rest are much inferior to them in fertility; and are interspersed with plains, hills, and marshes, which scarce admit of any cultivation or improvement <sup>f</sup>; altho' the inhabitants here are more industrious, and have better encouragement for it, than they have under the other Turkish governments. <sup>d</sup>

Principal rivers.

THE principal rivers of this circuit are, 1. The Zaine, which, we observed in the last chapter, divides the Tunesian kingdom from that of Algiers *. 2. The Guadil-Barbar, which several authors make the boundary between those two kingdoms; to which they add, that it hath its spring as far southward as the city of Urbs, or Jerbus; whence, running in a winding course north-west, it empties itself into the Mediterranean, near the port of Tabarka. This river, we are told, winds itself along in so many meanders, that those who go from Tunis to Bona are obliged to ford it above twenty times, there being neither bridges <sup>e</sup> nor ferry-boats to carry one over it <sup>g</sup> (C). 3. The Me-jerda, vulgarly Megerada and Mag-giordecca, the famed Bagrada of the antients, on the banks of which Regulus is said to have killed a monstrous serpent <sup>h</sup>. The description of it is in our Antient History; to which we shall only add, that it hath often changed its chanel, and hath left in many places, where it formerly ran, evident marks of its overflows; and that an open creek, into

The Mejerda; its chanel changed.

(B) The cities along the coast run in the following order, from east to west; viz. 1. Tabarka; 2. Bizerta; 3. Porto Farino; 4. Goletta; 5. Tunis, from north to south; 6. Hamamet; 7. Herkla, al. Herguela; 8. Susa; 9. Monaster; 10. Africa, now ruined; 11. Capouda, or Caboudia; 12. Esfakes; 13. El Hama, al. Ellamait; 14. Gabb, al. Gabs.

(C) Doctor Shaw, the latest writer on this subject, denies there being any river of the name of Guadil-Barbar, or of its springing so far from the sea; and allows of none but the Zaine to divide Tunes from Algiers. This last, he tells us, hath its fountain no farther off than some of the adjacent mountains, and falls into the sea near Thabraca, now Tabarka; the ruins of which are spread over the western banks of it; among which is a fort, and a Tunesian garrison; together with some broken cisterns and other antiquities (5).

It is strange so great a number of authors should have given us the name, spring, various meanders, and other particulars, of a river which is not in being; or, if it is, that so accurate an observer should not have found it out. We can determine nothing about it, till some new traveller brings us a clearer account of it; but that the Zaine abovementioned is the boundary of the Tunesian state, on the Algerine coast, is hardly to be questioned; and that the description we meet with of this river, doth in no ways answer to that which those authors give us of the Guadil-Barbar, any more than it doth in name, is no less apparent (6).

- a which it discharged itself, little more than a century ago, is now circumscribed by the mud; and become a large pond, or a kind of anti-harbour to Porto Farino<sup>1</sup>. The cause of which is supposed to be the height of the shore, from the port last named to Carthage, above the level of the sea; which, being exposed to the east and north-east winds, may have choaked up the mouth of it, as hath happened to many other rivers: so that there is reason to apprehend, that the chanel will, in a few years, return again to the southward; the pond formed by it being every day more and more choaked with mud; and the mouth, or bar of the river, which, till lately, admitted vessels of the greatest burden, being become now too shallow to receive a cruizer of thirty guns, unless it be first discharged of its lading<sup>k</sup>.
4. The Miliana, supposed to be the Catada of the antients<sup>l</sup>, and a branch of the Guadil-Barbar; about a mile from which is the noted hot bath, called Hammam Leef, much resorted to by the citizens of Tunis<sup>m</sup>. It is remarkable only for forming the bay of Tunis, and having that metropolis situate on the mouth of it. 5. The Gabbs, or Caps, or Capes, supposed to be the Triton of the antients, hath its source three or four leagues only to the south-south-west of the city of its name, and falls into the sea to the northward of the old city, forming the ground, on which it was built, into a kind of peninsula. This last, more properly, belongs to the winter circuit; though the gulph, to which it gives its name, be in the summer one. We have given an account of it, and the lake which is formed by it, in our Antient History<sup>n</sup>; and shall only add, that the waters of the Gabbs are said to be so hot, that they cannot be drank till an hour after they have been taken out of it; and that those of the lake are likewise affirmed, when drank, to be a remedy against the leprosy<sup>o</sup>. Thus much may serve for the Tunesian rivers. To which we shall only add that of Me-jerda, or Old Bagrada, which is the most considerable of the whole kingdom, and divides itself into two, almost from east to west, and receives the greatest number of rivers into its streams: and that of Zaine hath a small island lying over-against the mouth of it, which is now possessed by the Genoese, who pay a yearly rent for it to the Bey, on account of the pearl fishery; but the little advantage they have made of it of late, will, in all likelihood, oblige them to abandon that settlement in a little time, though they have a pretty good fort in it, capable of defending them either against any surprize from the Zenati, and other Arabs on the continent, or from the insults of any of the Algerine or Tripol-Porto Negro.

THE most considerable islands belonging to this state are, 1. Cape Negro, five miles to the north-east of Tabarka, which hath a settlement of the French African company, who pay a considerable sum of money to Tunis for the liberty they enjoy at La Calle (D), and for keeping up a fort here to protect them from the insults of the neighbouring Mogodri, and other Arabians<sup>q</sup>.

2. JALTA, the Galata, or Calatbe, of the antients, is a high rocky island, six miles north of Cape Negro, and ten to the north-east of Tabarka. There is a very dangerous shoal, unknown to our sea charts, lying about five leagues from it to the west-south-west<sup>r</sup>. The Cani, which are two little flat contiguous islands, where the Italian row-boats lie frequently in wait for the Tunesians. These islands are about four leagues to the north-north-west of the Cape Pil-loe, and very nearly in the middle way to Cape Blanco. The capes of note are, Cape Sierra, five leagues north-east of Cape Negro, and the most advanced to Africa towards the north; four leagues beyond which, northward, are the Tres Fratres, or three brothers, which are three rocky islands near the continent, about half way to Cape Blanco.

THIS cape is supposed, from its whiteness, to be the Promontorium Candidum of Pliny, and Promontorium Pulchrum of Livy, where Scipio made his first descent into Africa; it being of a chalky substance, and from thence called by the Moors the White Cape.

- CAPE Zibeeb*, so called from the great quantities of raisins that are made upon it, is likewise remarkable for the whiteness of some of its cliffs on the eastern side, and for having what they call Pil-loe, a high pointed rock, in the shape of that favourite dish of theirs, situate just below it. That Cape Zibeeb is the Promontorium Apollinis we have formerly shewn<sup>s</sup>. The reader may see some farther proofs of it in Dr. Shaw's Travels<sup>t</sup>.
- f

THE last cape of note is that of Bon, called by the Moors Ras Addar; and is the Herculean Promontory of the antients. It stands eleven leagues east-south-east of that of Zibeeb; and is of such a height, that one can see the Sicilian mountains from the summit of it.

(D) This place, though under the Algerine government, the French pay a kind of tribute, also to that of Tunis, for the quiet possession of it. We have given an account of their removing from the French bastion hither, on account of the unwholesomeness of the air (7).

(7) See before, p. 225, & alib.

Gulph of Bizerta.

THE principal gulphs are, 1. That of Bizerta, the Sinus Hipponensis of the antients<sup>a</sup>; a very large one it is, and hath its name from the town of Bizerta, or as the Africans call it, Ben-sberdt (E), situated upon the western banks of it. This gulph, having a communication with the lake of the same name on the south, and with the sea on the north, forms a kind of canal between them; through which a constant stream is alternately discharging itself from the one to the other, in the same manner as the Atlantic Ocean is observed to do in the Mediterranean, and back again<sup>w</sup>; so that what the lake loses by exhalations, is again recruited by the sea; which, at such times, runs very briskly into it in hot seasons, to keep up an equilibrium. This gulph is formed by the Capes Blanco and Zibeeb, lately mentioned, and is a beautiful sandy inlet, near four leagues wide, and once admitted the largest vessels into the great pier of Hippo; of which there are still some traces remaining, projecting out into the sea, to break off the north-east wind; so that it appears to have been one of the beautifullest and safest havens upon those coasts. The misfortune is, that the Turks, always averse to repairs, have let it go so to ruin, that it will receive none now but small vessels, and is in danger to be in a little time totally destroyed.

Gulph of Tunis.

THE other gulph of note is that of Tunis, situate between the Capes Zibeeb and Bon; the former making the western, and the latter, at eleven leagues distance, the eastern point of it. Zowa Moore, the Egimurus of the antients, and the Zimboa of our sea charts, lies between these promontories, but nearer that of Bon, in the very mouth of the gulph. The island of Gamelora lies a little way eastward of Cape Zibeeb; and, four miles to the west, within the cape, stands Porto Farino, called from an antient salt-work hard by it Gar-el-meliab, or the Cave of Salt, by the inhabitants of it<sup>v</sup>. Other particulars, relating to this Tunesian gulph, will be better seen when we come to speak of the metropolis situate upon it.

Chief mountains.

THE chief mountain of this kingdom, worth notice, is the Zozwaan, al. Zagwan, or Zagoan, a very high and famed one; from whose summit one hath a prospect of the greatest part of the kingdom; and from which Agathocles is thought to have been entertained with a view both of the country of the Adrumetines and Carthaginians. It is likewise remarkable for a town of its name, situate at the foot of it, in great repute for dying of scarlet caps, and for bleaching of linen; vast quantities of both being daily brought thither from all parts of the kingdom. The stream, which serves for that purpose, and runs from the top of the mountain, was formerly carried by a noble conduit to Carthage. Over the fountain was built a temple; the ruins of which are still to be seen. It hath likewise, both on the declivity, and about the foot of it, several Roman antiquities; such as towns, castles, forts, &c. with inscriptions cut in marble<sup>z</sup>. It stands about a league and a half south-south-east of Tunis; and is mostly barren and desert, except a few spots, which bear here and there some barley; but there are, almost all over it, proper places where they shelter vast quantity of bee-hives. The rest of the territory round about it is almost a continued champaign country; thro' which mount Atlas opens a spacious way from that of Zaab into Numidia. Other mountains of this country are, the Gueslet, Beni-tesren, and Nufusa; the former, about three leagues from Kayrwan, hath likewise several Roman antiquities; the two last, one about seven miles from Zerbi and Asfacus, have little worth notice, except the poverty of the inhabitants, who yet maintain their liberty, by means of the ruggedness of their abodes. But, as many of them are forced to go to Tunis, and other parts, to get a livelihood, they run great risk of being ill treated by the Tunesian Alfaquis, or doctors; because they alone, of all the people of this kingdom, are of the sect of Ali, which is here detested; so that they are forced to conceal that part of their religion from them, as well as they can<sup>a</sup>, wherever they go. The lakes of this kingdom, having been described in our Antient History<sup>b</sup>, we shall refer our readers to it, to avoid needless repetitions. We need only add here, that that of Tunis, which was formerly deep, and capacious enough to contain a large fleet, is, since then, especially as it hath been in the possession of the Turks, become so shallow, particularly in the summer-time, by receiving all the common sinks of the city, that the middle of its chanel is hardly above six or seven feet deep of water; whilst the rest of it, for the space of a mile or more, within its banks, is become both dry and nauseous; though, in other respects, its prospect receives no small beauty from the numerous flocks of Flamants that frequent it; and is no less famous for the number and largeness of its

a mullets, esteemed the sweetest upon the coast of Barbary; the roe of which, being afterwards dried and pressed, is reckoned a great dainty, and known by the name of Bolargo<sup>c</sup>. Let us now take a view of the principal cities of this summer circuit.

WE begin with the metropolis, whose origin, antiquity, situation, and former splendor, Tunis the capital; have been already taken notice of in our Antient History*; but which is now become still more considerable, by being the capital of a powerful kingdom. Diodorus gave it the epithet of Λευκον, white, probably on account of the white chalky cliffs which seem to surround it, when viewed from the sea; and between which it spreads itself upwards, from the western banks of the chanel, lately mentioned, of Goletta (F), in form of an oblong square, about a mile in length. The whole town, suburbs included, extends no farther

b than three miles<sup>d</sup>; though some authors have given it a much larger circuit, without any foundation; its walls having still the same compass, though its suburbs are very much lessened to what they were, an. 1520, when they were computed to contain 1600 houses, mostly inhabited by tradesmen of all sorts, besides those within the walls, which, in Grammay's time, amounted to 10,000 more. But at present it is far enough from being so populous as Algiers, though living under a milder government; neither are the buildings so lofty and magnificent. The fine prospect likewise that it yielded towards the sea, comes also far short of what it did, the forts, castles, and other works on the adjacent hills, which added much to it, having been demolished by the Turks almost as soon as they became masters of it<sup>e</sup>.

c TUNIS labours under three very great inconveniencies; viz. 1. It is so much commanded by those hills, that, excepting its walls, which are about forty cubits high, and flanked at proper distances with small towers, the whole strength of it seems chiefly to consist in the number of its inhabitants; the greatest part of whom are tradesmen. 2. The lakes and marshes around it render its situation much less healthy, notwithstanding the inhabitants endeavour to remedy it, by the great quantity of mastic, myrtle, rosemary, and other aromatick herbs, with which they daily heat their ovens, bagnios, &c. which of course communicate a corrective fragrancy to the air. The third, and worst of all is the scarcity unhealthy air, how corrected; of water, there being no springs or rivers near it; their wells are mostly brackish, and their cisterns but few; so that they are forced to fetch the greatest part of what they drink from

d Bardo, and other places at a mile distance. There is, indeed, one well in the city, whose water is barely drinkable; yet, even this is carefully reserved for the use of the Bey and his household. We are moreover told, that there is another well in the city, whose water is quite salt; and is, nevertheless, so far preferred to that of their cisterns, that they suffer it to be fetched and sold about for their common drinking, or, more probably, for their pil-law, and other cookery, unless we suppose the preference to be owing to its saltness, as being more palatable to them than the insipid rain-water of their cisterns. We might add a fourth inconvenience still; viz. the dryness of the territory round about, which requires continual watering; so that there is hardly a corn field but what hath a well dug in some corner for that purpose, which makes it very inconvenient (G), and often raises the price of e grain to an excessive height; add to this, their harvest being exposed to the incursions of the Arabians in harvest-time, which obliges the citizens to sow their wheat, barley, and rye, in or near the suburbs, and even to inclose those fields with stout walls<sup>f</sup>: but, excepting these inconveniencies, no place enjoys a greater plenty of all necessaries of life; for, besides that ships are continually bringing new supplies of provisions, their gardens abound with variety of fruit trees; such as palms, figs, dates, citrons, lemons, olives, &c. and fruit trees in this last grows in such abundance, about a league's distance round the city, that they supply great plenty; the inhabitants, as well as strangers, with oil, and even with charcoal, that being the only wood they have to make it with: This scarcity of grain is one cause why the inhabitants are, for the most part, poor, and are forced to live very meanly. They have, indeed, grain very

f very good wheat, chiefly from Urbs, Bujeiab, and other neighbouring places; and this they scarce, and dear. grind with a hand-mill, and sift through a fine sieve, and make a kind of fine cakes, and a flat kind of vermicelli: but this is only in use among the wealthy; the poorer sort being forced to take up with barley meal, which they make into a kind of dumplings, and eat,

(F) So called from the Arabic, Halck-el-wed, or throat of the river; which name the inhabitants give it, by reason of its being a chanel of communication between the lake of Tunis and the sea, as we observed a little above. The Italians first gave it that name of Goletta; which, in their language, answers to that. The Tunians have a castle on each side of it, tolerably strong, for the security of that narrow passage, as well as of the road east and south-east (9).

dipped into oil or butter, mixed with vinegar, or the juice of lemons if they can afford it; a whilst the still poorer sort will only stir it in water and eat it raw, and without any sauce. They have a market in this city, where there is nothing sold but barley; of which they make that poor kind of food. However, they have plenty of honey, and fruits of all sorts, and pretty cheap, to mend their other fare; and, on some particular feast days, will afford themselves a little flesh, especially lamb. Their main streets are large, and crossed by narrow lanes, at proper distances; and the houses mostly built with stone, but meaner than those of Algiers, and but one story high, and flat at the top. There are very few buildings of any grandeur, except the great mosk, the Bey's palace, and some few others belonging to persons of rank; though they had heretofore a number of mosks, and other public edifices; such as colleges, hospitals, baths, prisons for slaves, &c. The gates of the city are five in number; viz. that of Vasouk, of Carthage, of El-boar, Affeyr, and Elmenar; none of them very stately: without the walls, round the city, are the Turkish sepulchres, adorned with marble tombs, oratories, flower-plats, and other embellishments<sup>b</sup>.

Bey's palace;

THE Bey's palace is by far the most magnificent edifice in all the town. It hath four stately gates, one at each front; and high turrets at each end. The courts are spacious, the galleries rich and lofty; the gardens large, but not elegant; the halls and apartments are likewise very sumptuous, particularly that called the treasury; in which, among other valuable things, is kept the book of their law, written by their celebrated doctor Al Mohadian; from whom the Beys boast themselves to be descended; and, in virtue of that descent, set up for the sole judges of all controversies about religion. The rest of that sumptuous edifice, being much after the manner of the Algerine Deys, of which we have given a description in the last chapter, we shall refer our reader to it. Next unto it is the chief mosk, lately mentioned, and built likewise after the Turkish taste; so that it hath nothing remarkable or peculiar, except its bigness and stately tower; which, next to that of Fez, is allowed the highest in all Africa (H).

NEAR the heart of the city is a piazza of vast extent, which heretofore contained no less than 3000 woollen and linen drapers shops; all handsomely built, and furnished with great variety of those two commodities; besides a great number of others belonging to other trades and manufactures, and to dealers in all sorts of druggistery goods. The two chief manufactures of this city are the linen and woollen; both which it hath been ever famous for, above all others in Barbary, on account of the peculiar way their women had of spinning their thread; they letting down their spindles from the top of their houses quite to the ground; the weight of which makes it both finer and smoother<sup>a</sup>. Here are several colleges and schools, and in them a good number of learned men, and doctors of their law; part of whom are maintained at the public charge, and part by the mendicant trade; all of them in high esteem, though not in so high veneration as their real or counterfeit ideots and madmen, who wander about bare-headed and bare-footed, and are accounted by the people the greatest favourites of heaven, and maintained as such at the public charge. The Janissaries have their barracks very handsome, like those of Algiers; and their Aga, or chief, a palace or court, whither they repair for orders, and other affairs relating to them. The merchants and tradesmen have their public exchange; and the custom-house officers a large

(H) This mosk, we are told, was founded by Zecbariah, king of Tunis, in honour of one of their great saints, named Emethben-aros, in great repute amongst them. It stands on an eminence, at some small distance from the castle, and was formerly a sanctuary for criminals. On the top of its high tower are three balls of gilt copper, like that of the city of Morocco; of which we have given an account in a former chapter*. But of this of Tunis, their Alfakis, or doctors, give the following fabulous account; which, nevertheless, passes for current among all the Tunefians.

Jaacob Almanzor, king of Morocco, having taken a resolution to wander about the world incognito, one of his wives, who loved him above the rest, set out in quest of him, with a female child in her arms; and, having gone through great part of Africa, found him at length at Alexandria, where she lived with him, unknown to any one, till his death; and then set upon her journey back to Morocco. When she came to Tunis, the king's son became enamoured with her daughter, and pressed her so hard to obtain her, that she was forced to go and complain of it to his father; who, in a surprise, asked her, where could she better dispose of her daughter than to his son? To this she answered, that she was ready to consent to his desire, provided the prince engaged to marry her, and give her the same dowry that she herself had received from her late father; to which she added, that she would soon convince him that she was better born than his son. The Moorish king agreed to the conditions; upon which she produced her marriage contract, and told him farther, that all the dowry, which Almanzor had bestowed upon her, she laid out in the three golden apples, or balls, which she had caused to be put on the top of the tower of the great mosk at Morocco. The king of Tunis, willing to satisfy her, promised to do the same there; but not having a quantity of gold sufficient for the purpose, contented himself with putting up these three of copper gilt. Thus far the story, which one would rather think had been invented by some Morocco fabulist, in contempt of the Tunefians. Our author adds, that the Alexandrians have still the anniversary of Almanzor's death in great veneration; though he tells us he has seen that prince's tomb in the city of Menzala, in the kingdom of Fez; but is not sure whether this last might not belong to another prince of that name, of the race of the Benimerini, equally famed for his valour; or, whether the relics of the former might not have been translated from Alexandria thither (11).

- a custom-house. The last public building we need mention is the arsenal and dock, seated upon the banks of the canal; and in which they have materials enough in store to build several galleys. On the opposite side is the fort of Goletta, lately mentioned; about two leagues distance from which, and one-half from the city, is another castle, built on a small island in the lake. But, as there is no likelihood of the town being attacked from that side, that fortification hath been long since neglected. The chief fortification belonging to this city is the castle, situate on an eminence, which commands it all over, and makes a very good appearance at a distance, and hath some cannon mounted before the gate. But the jealousy of the government here is such, that it is very dangerous, for a Christian especially, to view it too attentively; and the safest way is to pass by as fast as one can; and it is common to give a stranger notice of it at his coming*.
- b At some small distance from the castle is the Bazar for woollen-drapers, which is a long wide street, with shops on both sides, the front supported by four pillars. In other respects the place answers exactly to the condition which it was in in Abu'lfeda's time, who tells us, that there was an island in the lake, on which the Tunefians used to take their recreation; but that every side of it was no other than the common sink of all the filth of the city<sup>1</sup>.

- THE Tunefians in general, and more particularly the inhabitants of this metropolis, are like those of Algiers, a mixture of Turks, Moors, Arabians, Jews, and Christian merchants and slaves, only with this singular difference, that they are here more polite and civilized, and wholly free from that haughtiness, insolence, and cruelty, for which the rest of the people in Barbary, and above all others the Algerines, are so justly branded. They are much more kind and humane to their slaves in general; though they treat the knights of Malta, who are reduced to that condition, with greater severity, chiefly to oblige them to buy their freedom at a dearer price: for these, besides the iron shackle which all are obliged to wear about their ancles, have a huge heavy chain fastened to it, which commonly weighs about twenty-five pounds, and which they must either twist about their leg, though it is very troublesome to walk or work with, or hang it to their girdle by a hook, which causes a great pain in the side, or else toss it over their shoulder. They did moreover put them to the hardest labours; such as carrying of sand, stone, and mortar to builders; so that they were obliged to write to Malta for their ransom as soon as they could. The Maltese, on the other hand, were no sooner acquainted with their ill treatment, than they ordered all their Turkish slaves to be cruelly bastinadoed by way of return. The consequence of which was, that these were obliged to send to acquaint the Tunefians, that if they continued to make their Maltese slaves work at Tunis, they would be cudgelled to death at Malta; and this at length put an end to the additional hardship*.
- d

- In other respects, the Tunefians are very courteous to strangers; and all affairs with the regency are transacted in a very friendly manner: the consuls that reside here are treated with greater affability and condescension, justice and dispatch, than in any other court on these African coasts. In a word, this nation hath for many years been more intent upon trade, and the improvement of their manufactures, than upon plundering and cruising; upon which account it hath justly obtained the character, not of living like their neighbours in open war, and perpetual enmity with the Christian powers, but of cultivating their friendship, and coming readily into their alliances<sup>k</sup>.
- e

- THE dress of the Tunefians of both sexes is likewise more polite and fine, though much of the same fashion with that of the Algerines. The women are handsome, neat, and more familiar: they go, indeed, veiled out of doors, but are allowed to be seen and converse with strangers, their husbands not being tainted with jealousy to the degree that other Africans are. Those that are wealthy are very fond of rich ornament and perfumes, and are constant in their visits to the public baths belonging to their sex; so that the druggists and apothecaries shops are seldom shut up before midnight, that being their chief time for bathing: in which they use a good deal of odoriferous drugs, and fine perfumes. The baths of this city, both those that belong to the men and women, are in great number; and, though inferior in largeness and beauty to those of Fez and Algiers<sup>1</sup>, yet persons are here more handsomely treated and better accommodated, notwithstanding the city is destitute of running water. But these are chiefly furnished with that element from the cisterns on the top of their houses, which receive the rain water, and let down a certain quantity from every house by a common pipe into one or two public reservoirs; from which this, and other exigencies of the city, are supplied, though not in such a quantity as to be able to bestow any part of it towards the watering or cleansing of their streets, which, on that account, are always either dirty or dusty: so that it is very unpleasant to walk in them, especially as their houses have no windows in the front, which makes it look like walking between two a dead walls.

THE men, as well as the women, resort much to these baths, their religion obliging them to frequent washings, particularly before the hours of public prayers, after every trifling defilement, and more especially after the matrimonial intercourse. The merchants, officers, doctors, and scholars, affect to appear neatly dressed when they go abroad, but with such sedate gravity and good manners, that, though their streets are much crowded with people, one may go from one end of the city to the other, without fear of being insulted by the Turks, as one is sure to be at Algiers. One thing is, that tho' the Tunefians do not allow of many such public taverns to be kept by some of their slaves, as is done at Algiers, yet those houses are much better regulated here, insomuch that those very slaves have power to b chastise or drub even a Turk, if he drinks too much, or behaves insolently, or even to pull off and keep their turbans, till they have paid their reckoning. They sell none but white wine, which is produced in great plenty in the country about, and is very cheap and good; but they most commonly mix quick-lime with it, to make it more intoxicating. It is likewise the custom in these houses, if one calls for a quart of it, to set before him three or four dishes of meat or fish, with salad and other sauces; and when he goes away he pays only for the wine at the common price *. In other respects likewise one is sure here to meet with good usage, and to be free from any such insults from the Turks that one is exposed to at Algiers. However, though many of the Tunefians allow themselves the use of wine, yet very few drink it to excess; but there are some still so strict as to refrain from it wholly; c and, instead of that pernicious liquor, as they stile it, make use of a compound drug, which they call Harix, or, according to others, Laisis; an ounce of which will inspire them with a surprising gaiety and intrepidity, that nothing can ruffle their mirth, or create in them either fear or discontent. This composition they pretend to have learned from the Turks; and, from its effects, seems to be much of the nature of their opium, if it is not the same with it.

THE Christian merchants, however, to avoid quarrels and contests with the rest of the inhabitants, have a suburb allotted to them for the convenience of trade. It stands without the gate that leads to the sea side, and about a musket-shot from the city walls; and here they have their magazines, warehouses, and dwelling-houses; some of them very large and d handsome; the rest of the suburb consists of about two or three hundred small houses, inhabited mostly by persons employed by them in such servile works as packing, fetching, carrying, and some other necessary handicraftsmen.

THE religion, customs, manners, language, &c. of the Tunefians, being in all other respects much the same with those of the Algerines, we shall refer our reader to what hath been said upon those heads in the preceding chapter, and go on now with a short review of the other cities and remarkable places belonging to this summer circuit.

WE have already said something of the fortress of Goletta and its two castles; the one of which, since neglected, was built by the emperor Charles V. and the other, still standing, by Achmet, Bey of Tunis, to protect his capital from the Maltese vessels, which could ride e along the gulph without being annoyed by the cannon of the former. Upon which account this last is built on a lower ground, and almost level with the sea, and of a round figure on that side, having about eight wide embrasures, two or three feet above water, where the cannon are planted. Some further out-works and improvements have been added to it since by other Beys, together with a good number of handsome houses, which makes the place look more like a little town than a citadel. Tunis stands in lat.  $36^{\circ} 45'$ , east long.  $10^{\circ} 26'$  m.

OTHER places of note, in the province of Tunis Proper, according to the old division, are,

Nabel or antient Neapolis.

I. NABEL, or Nebel Nabis, the Colonia Neapolis of Ptolemy, and now called by the Ita- f lians Neapolis de Barbaria, stands in a low ground, a mile and a half off the sea shore, and about a furlong westward from the antient Neapolis, and about three leagues east of Tunis. It is still a thriving town, we are told, and hath been long since famed for its potteries; the rest of its inhabitants are either husbandmen or farmers. As for the ruins of the antient city, they are either so defaced or covered with mortar and rubbish, that they are not legible; and, on the other bank of the little rivulet that runs through it, is a wolf cut in basso relievo on a marble block, curiously carved n. Marsa, or rather El-Mersa, which, in the Arabic, signifies the port, stands where that of antient Carthage did, and is affirmed to have been built by Mehedi, the Khalif of Kayrwan, but was almost destroyed during the civil wars in Barbary, and some time after rebuilt by some husbandmen and fishermen: since which time g

- a it is become a populous and handsome city, being computed to have about 800 houses, besides a large college and a stately mosk, built by Muley Mahmed, the father of Muley Hafs; besides which, it hath some other noble buildings and houses of pleasure, where the Beys and persons of the better sort go to take their diversion, the air here being reckoned very healthy on account of the alternate sea and land breezes. The territory about it is likewise fertile in corn, fruit, and sugar canes<sup>o</sup>. Here once stood the famed city of Carthage, Rome's constant rival; which, after three long and bloody wars, was reduced to ashes, Carthage. the ruins of. and levelled with the ground, by order of the Roman senate. The reader will find a description of that once opulent city in our Antient History; of whose antique magnificence there remains little else, except the noble aqueduct which supplied it with water, and a heap of
- b melancholy ruins, to be seen<sup>p</sup>.

NEAR those ruins, and about three leagues north from Tunis, stands Kommart, a walled and populous town, but inhabited chiefly by husbandmen and gardeners, who send the product of their fertile territory to the capital, particularly their sugar canes, which grow here in great plenty, and are there made into sugar. This place, we are told by an African author, was formerly called Valachia<sup>q</sup>.

ARIANA, formerly Abderana, is inhabited likewise by poor gardeners, who supply Tunis with fruit and herbs; it being but three miles distant from it (I).

- ARRADEZ, the last town in this district worth naming, on account of its fine springs and baths, stands on the east side of the Golettan gulph, and on the road between that and
- c Tunis. It was once a Roman colony, which the Turks dismantled great part of upon their abandoning it. The Beys of Tunis afterwards repaired it and the castle; since which it hath gradually recovered itself, though still short of what it formerly was<sup>r</sup>. And thus much may suffice at present for the cities and towns of Tunis Proper. We shall have in the sequel occasion to speak of some other remarkable places in this and the other provinces, under the article of natural and artificial curiosities, and valuable antiquities, that the reader may have them all at one view.

- THE next capital of the province of its name is El Media, according to others Media and Mehedia, called also Africa, and is situated on a small peninsula on the eastern coast of the kingdom. It appears to have been heretofore a place of considerable strength, though not
- d above 230 paces in breadth towards the land side, but widening still more as it comes nearer the sea. The port, with an area of about one hundred paces square, lieth within the very walls of the city, with the mouth of it opening towards the south; but is now so shallow that it can hardly receive the smallest vessels; and, in Thuanus's time, it was with great difficulty that a common galley could enter it<sup>s</sup>. It was a very strong place, surrounded with stout walls, high towers, arches, and other antient fortifications; which, together with the town, were all destroyed by the Turks, and continued in ruinous heaps till the reign of Mehedi, the first Khalif of Kayrwan, who caused it to be rebuilt, and its fortifications repaired and much improved, and made it his chief residence; after which it became very populous and considerable. The walls which surrounded the place were strong and lofty,
- e and flanked with six stately towers, besides others of a smaller size; two of which, that were bathed by the sea, were of a round, and the other four of a square form; all of them very strong and high, and had little gates plated with iron; and so low, that a man could not go in or out of them without stooping; and every one was a kind of separate fortress.

- BUT of all the six, the second, which faced the east, and was the only one on the land
- f side, was built with surprising strength, having a vaulted arch seventy feet long under it, guarded by six strong gates one within another; some covered with plated iron, and others made all of cross iron bars, fastened together by thick nails, and without any wood, with their retreats and portculiffes all of the same metal and make; all which, added to the length and darkness of the place, made the passage through it appear dreadful to a stranger, and may give our readers an idea of those kinds of Arabian fortresses<sup>t</sup>.

THAT prince took no less pains to beautify the place within with noble buildings, if they were really his; but a late judicious traveller tells us, that there is something too polite and

(I) This place, whose antient walls are still standing, was built, we are told by a French author, by the Goths, and had its name of Ariana, from the famed arch heretic Arius, and was a suffragan bishoprick to that of Carthage (12). But Marmol will have it to have been built by the Romans, and to have been surrounded with those very walls which still encompass it (13); and it is not difficult to distinguish whether they are of the Roman or Gothic fabricature. However, the former may still be so far in the right, in his own opinion, that it took its name from the heretic, instead of its old one of Abdirama.

regular in the several capitals, entablatures, and other pieces of antient masonry, defaced as they now are, to suspect the founder of them to have been an Arabian<sup>a</sup>. However that be, the city, thus rebuilt, adorned, and re-peopled, is thought to have changed its antient name for that of Mebedia, in honour of that prince, if he did not himself cause it to be called by it. However, it hath since then undergone so many changes and revolutions, that there is little left of its former splendor, except the walls, and some other edifices run to decay. As for its other name of Africa, it was given to it, we are told, by some Sicilian corsairs, who had made themselves masters of it<sup>w</sup>. Doctor Shaw is of opinion, that either this place or Seleto, the Subleli or Subleto of the middle age, and five miles south and by west of it, is the turris or country seat of Hannibal, from which he is said to have embarked after his flight from Carthage. This last shews still the ruins of a very strong castle, not inferior in extent to the Tower of London, supposed to have been erected to guard the small creek or port that lieth below it<sup>x</sup>. El Medea is supposed by Tkuanus to have been the Adrumetum of the antients; but the last quoted author hath shewn, that Herkla, situate on the gulph of Hamamel, above half a degree more to the north-west, bids fairer for being both the old Adrumetum, and the Heraclea of the lower empire. We shall refer our reader to this book<sup>y</sup>, for what he offers in defence of his opinion,

metum.

Soufa.

SOUSA, or Sufa, another provincial capital, is situate on the same coast, about five leagues south-east of Herkla, and about 30 north-west of El Media, and is one of the most considerable cities in this kingdom. It is the chief mart of it for oil, and drives a flourishing trade in linen, of which a great deal is manufactured in it. It trades likewise in wax, honey, sundry sorts of pickled fish, especially that called tunny, which is here caught and salted, and in great request. The town stands upon an high rock, or, as an old historian hath described it, on the northern extremity of a long range of eminences, reaching as far as Surseff, the antient Sarsura<sup>z</sup>. Behind the city is the prospect of an extensive plain. The ground about Soufa is fertile in barley, and hath some good pasturage, olives, figs, and other fruits. It was once a strong, populous, and wealthy city. It is still the residence of the Turkish Bashas, whose stately palace, and some fine mosks, and other edifices, were all standing in Leo's time, who was obliged to keep himself concealed four days in this place<sup>b</sup>; and adds, that it was by that time greatly decayed, and thinly inhabited, and had not above six or seven shops left. It hath recovered itself, however, since then, in both respects. The inhabitants, who are mostly seamen and cruizers, are courteous and civil to strangers; but, besides those, here are a good many merchants, tradesmen in the woollen way, who trade into Turkey and other parts of the Levant. The lower class are either potters, herdsmen, or husbandmen. It is still the residence of the governor of the province, to whom it pays a yearly tax of 12,000 ducats. It stands about 100 leagues distant from Tunis, and is divided into the upper and lower city. The port is commodious and safe, and here the Tunefian corsairs come to anchor<sup>c</sup>. This place is likewise remarkable for the defeat of prince Philibert of Savoy, and the loss of a great number of knights of Malta, who attempted to take it from the Turks, an. 1619, as we shall see in the sequel of this chapter. The other two places of note in this province are,

Monasteer.

MONASTEER, an antient city, of Roman or Carthaginian extraction, but since called by that modern name, from a monastery of Augustine friars in the neighbourhood of it. It is now a neat thriving city, situate on the extremity of a cape, and surrounded with stout walls, according to our latest account of it<sup>d</sup>; by which one may suppose, that it hath mended itself much since Leo, Marmol, and other travellers, wrote of it, who represent it, excepting its walls and handsome houses, as a very beggarly place, whose inhabitants are coarsely clad, and forced to live upon barley bread, or meal mixed with a little oil, and to wear, instead of shoes, a sort of slippers made of sea rushes<sup>e</sup>. And no wonder they should then be in no better condition, considering how often they have been bombarded and plundered by the Turks and Moors, as well as by Christian cruizers. 2. Heraclea, an antient Roman city upon the sea coast, but since destroyed by the Arabians; and erroneously supposed the Aspis of Ptolemy, as we shall see in the sequel<sup>f</sup>. In this city Codrus, the famous king of Athens, is said to have died; and that they shew at Azarica, a town not far from it, and near the sea, the sepulchres and epitaphs of that worthy prince, of Ixion, king of Corinth, and of Phido the philosopher<sup>g</sup>.

Thapsus.
Bay of Lempta.

ABOUT 20 miles south of Monasteer are the cape and vast ruins of Demas, the Thapsus of the antients; so that these two capes formed the antient and spacious bay of Lempta, which must then have afforded variety of ports; for an island runs parallel with the northern shore

- a from Demas almost to Tobulba, and another reaches from Monasteer, almost half way to Lempta; whilst those called Jouries and Tarachie lie just over against Lempta and Tobulba, and were thought considerable enough by Julius Cæsar to have stationary vessels appointed to secure them<sup>b</sup>.

- THE next district hath its name of Kayrwan from its capital, vulgarly called Caravan Kayrwan, by whom built. and Carvan, and supposed the Vico Augusto of the itinerary, which was once the famed seat of the Fatemite dynasty, and is still one of the chiefest places in the kingdom, both for trade, and the number of its inhabitants; though situated in a most barren plain, destitute of rivers or springs, and furnished with provisions, brought thither in carts, from the neighbouring towns, all of which are at least five or six leagues distant from it. It stands about
 b eight leagues west of Soufa, and as many south-west from Herkla, and hath a capacious cistern and pond about half a furlong distance, for the reception of rain-water, the former for the use of the inhabitants, and the latter for their cattle; but this last is frequently dried up about the middle of summer, or is apt to putrify, which occasions agues, and a variety of other distempers<sup>i</sup>. This city was rebuilt, we are told<sup>k</sup>, by Hukba, al. Occuba Ben Nafic, generalissimo of Ottman, or Hatmen's forces, which last was the successor of Mohammed, the third Khalif of Damascus, an. 652, and had sent him from Arabia into these parts, to make what conquests he could in them. Hukba, having landed his forces in some of the neighbouring ports, made choice of this barren and desolate spot for the place of their rendezvous, and of the ruined city for his retreat, which he accordingly caused to be surrounded with c lofty and strong brick walls, flanked with stately towers; and among other noble edifices, built a most magnificent mosk, supported by an incredible number of stately columns of the finest granate, two of which were of so exquisite and lively a red, bespangled all over with little white spots like the porphyry, that their price was reckoned inestimable (K), and the whole structure the most magnificent in all Africa. It hath likewise a very considerable revenue and endowments, and the title and privilege of a head metropolis, as being the first Mohammedan mosk built in this part of the world; upon which account likewise it is become the burying place of the Tunesian monarchs, and not only they, but all the grandees and wealthy men of the kingdom, are ambitious of having their remains deposited in it, from d a superstitious notion, that the prayers of the head pontif, and successor of Mohammed, will procure them a plenary pardon of their sins, and send them by the nearest way into Paradise. The very city itself is held so sacred among them, that those great personages usually pull off their shoes before they enter it, and cause some stately chapels and oratories to be erected over the graves of their dead relations, and settle a yearly sum upon them, not only to keep them in repair, but likewise to retain a certain number of idle priests and monks to resort thither at proper times<sup>l</sup>. It is, most probably, upon the account of this superstitious concourse, and vast donatives, that this city is still so thriving, notwithstanding the dearth and scarcity of provisions, which is, in a great measure, increased by the Arabs resorting thither in shoals during the summer season (L), though they bring abundance of flesh and dates to it. In other respects the inhabitants are here, for the most part, employed
 e in dressing all sorts of leather, which they send into Biledulgerid, and other parts of Numidia,

(K) The number of these marble pillars, if one may credit the inhabitants, amounts to no less than five hundred; for Christians are not permitted to go into their mosks; and what is equally surprising is, that, among all that variety of columns and other ornaments, there is not one single inscription; and, if any are to be found in other parts of the city, they are either filled with cement, or defaced by the chissel; so that one can meet with nothing, among all those antiquities, by which one might guess at its antient name; and it is merely from its situation and distance from other places, and from the river Mergaleel, the Aquæ Regiæ of the antients, that our author conjectures it to be the Vico Augusto above mentioned (14).

(L) And this may more probably account for its name Kayrwan, which is, in their language, the same as what we pronounce caravan, and signifies a concourse, than the conjecture of those, who derive it from the Kairo, or Cabiro, of Egypt, which signifies victory, and seems as lame as far fetched (15). As to the motive that induced that general to make choice of so barren and sandy a spot for his residence, some authors have conjectured, that he did it the better to conceal and secure the treasure and plunder which he gained in Afric. But why he chose a sandy barren plain, accessible on all sides, rather than some rocky eminence, well fortified by nature as well as art, and better provided with all necessaries by the happiness of its situation, is not easy to account for; unless it be, perhaps, by way of imitating Mohammed, their famed lawgiver, concerning whom they have a received tradition, that, being in full march to Damascus, the capital of Syria, and beholding its excellent situation, fine buildings, orchards, and other of its captivating allurements, was so taken with it, that, to the great surprize of his retinue, he immediately turned his horse about, and never could be persuaded to set foot into it, alleging, that, as there was but one paradise assigned for every man, he chose to have his in the next world, rather than in that delightful city (16).

which cannot otherwise come at the European draps; and upon this commerce they might a live tolerably well, if they were not so heavily laden with taxes by the government<sup>m</sup>.

ruined.

OTHER places in this district are Tolbulba, once a Roman colony, and in latter times, that is, under prince El Agleb, who was then governor of it, it grew so very populous, that the inhabitants built a new city near it, which they called Reširta; where El Agleb, and others of his court, erected some stately palaces for their residence. It hath been, however, so severely treated since, that it is now no better than a poor village, and hath only a few ruins left, as the sorrowful witnesses of its former grandeur<sup>n</sup>.

decay.

THE same may be said of Gabbs, or Capes, supposed to be the Epichus, and Takape, of the antients, but now a vast heap of noble ruins, particularly large square pillars of the finest granate, such as are hardly to be met with in any other part of Africa. The territory about it hath several large plantations of palm trees, whose fruit is much inferior to those of Jireed, or Biledulgerid, both in bigness and delicacy. But the chief branch of trade for which this emporium, as Strabo styles it, was, and is still so famed, is the great number of Albena plants that are here cultivated in their gardens, whose leaves, being dried and powdered, are dispersed through all the markets of the kingdom to a good advantage; and as this tree, as well as the palm, requires a deal of watering, the Triton, which runs at some small distance, is cantoned into a number of artificial chanel, as it seems to have been in Pliny's time<sup>o</sup>. Leo mentions likewise a kind of fruit, which the Arabs call Hab-basis, or Halb baziz, and cultivated in great quantities in this territory. It is of the bigness of a bean, and hath the taste of an almond, and is in great request all over Barbary<sup>p</sup>.

Jerba island.

About four leagues south of Capes, or Gabbs, and three from Tobulba, is the small island of Jerba, or Gerba, the Lotophagitis of the antients, so called from its famed inhabitants, and they from the Lotus on which they chiefly lived<sup>q</sup>, and is now the most southern boundary of this summer circuit. The three remaining provinces of it, which must lie north and west of those we have gone through, are called Hamamel, Bizerta, and Porto Farino, from their respective capitals.

Hamamel.

Hamamel, corruptly Mabometa, and supposed the Siagul, and not the Adrumetum, of the antients, as hath been conjectured by several writers, is a small but wealthy city, compactly built upon a low promontory, close to the sea, and fenced with such rugged hills towards the land, that an army would find it difficult to attack it on that side (M). It is thought to have its name from the Arabic Hamam, which signifies a wild pigeon, of which species there are vast multitudes bred in the cliffs of the adjacent rocks. Leo tells us, that it was in his time reduced to a miserable condition, though surrounded with good walls, and other works, by the Tunessians; the inhabitants, colliers, and fishermen, are reduced to the lowest degree of poverty, through the cruel exactions of the government<sup>r</sup>; those who have seen it since give us the same account of it, till the late Dr. Shaw, who calls it a small, but opulent city, and adds, that the flourishing state it now enjoys is of no longer date than the latter end of the last century<sup>s</sup>. It stands about 17 leagues distant from Tunis by land, but above 60 by sea, and on a large gulph, to which it gives its name. A few miles westward of Hamamel are the ruins of a port, formerly belonging to Faradeese, an old Roman city, which, from the affinity of its name to Aphrodisium, is probably the same with it. However that be, we are told, that the Faradesians, about a century ago, were the greatest cruizers, and most expert mariners, of this country; but that by the increase of trade, and greater conveniencies for navigation, at Hamamel, the greatest part of them were since drawn thither<sup>t</sup>; and this might be a farther cause of the improvement it hath so happily felt of late years of its wealth and commerce.

BIZERTA, by the Africans called Ben Sart, that is, the son of the lake, from the lake which is formed near it by the sea, of which we have given an account formerly<sup>u</sup>. Bizerta stands upon the canal that is made between them, about eight miles south and by west from Cape Blanco, and about ten north of Tunis (N). It hath been formerly very considerable; and, though its compass be not above a mile about, is affirmed to have

(M) Hence arises the improbability of its being the ancient Adrumetum, seeing it would have been of the greatest difficulty and danger to have approached it on that side, and much more so still to have been carried round about it, as Cæsar is said to have been round that. Neither doth that supposition agree with the description of the prospect which that yielded, either of the road before it, or of the coasts of Clybea, nor with the distance which the Itinerary gives it from Carthage; viz. 85 Roman miles; and from Neapolis; viz. 440 furlongs. Whereas, if Adrumetum be placed at Hamamel, Neapolis will be 50 miles too near it in the one case, and Carthage will be 30 miles, that is, more than one third of the given distance in the other (17).

(N) Several writers have taken Bizerta to be the ancient Utica, famed for the residence and tragical end of

- a contained 6,000 houses; whereas both it, and the villages under its district, scarcely contain that number of inhabitants; so much are these once famed places subject to run to decay, both by the exactions of the government, and by the wars which have raged in those parts. It has still, however, some strong castles and batteries to defend it, especially towards the sea, besides two very capacious prisons for their slaves, a large magazine, or warehouse, for their merchandizes, and two towers, with some other outworks, to defend the mouth of the haven, which hath been already described*. The city, though so near the sea, is well supplied with fresh water from springs that surround it on every side towards the land. It is likewise well furnished with variety of fish from the adjacent lake, most of its inhabitants, and those that live on both sides of the canal, being chiefly employed in the fishing trade, which begins about the latter end of October, and ends about the beginning of May; for the rains then sweetening the waters of the chanel, make the fish come into it in vast quantities during that season, after which they either disappear, or grow lean, dry, and unfit to eat. The people here are extremely poor, and yet remarkably proud, ill-natured, and faithless; insomuch that Muley Hascen Bey used to say, that none of his subjects deserved his resentment so much as they; because neither fear nor love could keep them faithful; and indeed they were the very first that felt the effect of it, when he had recovered the town and castle from Hayradin, Barbarossa's brother, then king of Algiers, in whose favour they had revolted three times, and had murdered their governor, and received a Turkish garrison<sup>y</sup>.
- b BIZERTA hath no cities under its government, but about eight villages, a large plain called Matter, or Mater, and the territory of Choros, the Clypea, or Corcbis, of the antients which is of a great extent, and very fertile, or at least would be so, were it not so exposed to the incursions of the wild Arabs. The people of this tract are very poor, live very meanly, and go worse clad. Their choicest dainty being their cousscou, that is, a sort of cake, made of flour, eggs, and salt, which they dry and keep the whole year round. Their dress is nothing else than a coarse sort of cloth wrapped about their bodies, and another about their heads, instead of a turban, and most of them go barefoot and bare legged. The poorer sort have nothing but a few skins laid on the floor to sleep upon, but the rest have narrow couches fixed against the wall, about five or six feet high, to which they mount by a ladder. They are very expert horsemen, as most in these countries are, and ride mostly without saddle or bridle, and they never shoe their horses. They are still more miserable from the neighbourhood of those Arabs, who live it seems altogether upon plunder, robbery, and murder, and oppress the poor inhabitants with their frequent inroads, and cruel exactions. The Bisertines, both of the city and country, are the most superstitious people of all Barbary, and neither go to war, nor scarcely any where, without hanging a quantity of amulets about their own, and, if they ride, about their horses necks likewise. These amulets are only scraps of parchment or paper, with some strange characters written upon them, which they sow in a piece of leather, silk, or other stuff, and wear about them, as preservatives against all accidents<sup>z</sup>.
- c PORTO FARINO is the last district mentioned in the above-given division, and is called so from its capital, whose port we have already described*. This city, as well as Bizerta, hath been taken by some authors for the antient Utica<sup>b</sup>, whereas it appears much rather to have been the port to which the Carthaginians retired the night before they engaged Scipio, near that of Utica. Livy gives it the African name of Ruscinona, a word of Phœnician extract, and answers, in all likelihood, the import of it, the former part to its situation, as a cape, and the latter to the great quantities of corn that were shipped off from it; for it was formerly a very considerable city on that and other accounts, though it hath lain since under great discouragements, being only now remarkable for its beautiful cothon, where the Tunesians keep their navy, and where they ride safe in all accidents of weather, and opens into a large navigable pond, formed by the river Mejerda, which now discharges itself by this way into the sea<sup>c</sup>. The town stands between the two famed capes of Bizerta and Carthage, and at pretty near equal distance from both, and upon that called Rasb Libeeb, or promontory of Apollo. The natives call it Gar el Mailab, or cave of salt, from an antient salt-work hard by it; and here it was, that the French king St. Lewis died in the great Cato (18). We have already shewn from Dr. Shaw, that it is more likely to be the old Hippo-Zarytus, and that the etymon of Ben Sart is frivolous (19); so that Utica must be sought for somewhere else, and at some distance from it. But, to avoid repetitions, we shall refer our reader to what hath been said, with relation to the most probable conjecture about its true situation, in our Antient History (20), having nothing more probable to offer upon that head.

Bayjah al. Begia, a great mart for corn.

To these we shall add one or two more, which, though not capitals, are nevertheless worth notice; viz. Bayjah, vulgarly Baja, and Begia, supposed the antient Vacca of Sallust, and Oppidum Vaggense of Pliny, formerly, as well as at this day, a town of great trade, and the chief mart of the kingdom for corn, of which the adjacent territories, particularly the plain of Busdera, situate along the banks of the Mejerda, produce such an abundance, that they can furnish more than the whole kingdom with it; insomuch that the Tunefians have a saying, that, if there was such another town in it as this for plenty of corn, it would become as plentiful and cheap as sand<sup>e</sup>. They have likewise here a great fair every summer, to which the most distant Arabian tribes resort with their families and flocks. Notwithstanding which the inhabitants are very poor, and a great part of the ground about it remains uncultivated, through the cruel exactions of the government, and the frequent incursions of the Arabs, who are very numerous and powerful in those parts<sup>f</sup>.

BAYJAH stands on the declivity of a hill in the road to Constantina, about 10 leagues from the northern coast, and 36 west-south-west from Tunis, and hath the conveniency of being well watered<sup>g</sup>. On the highest part of it is a citadel that commands the whole place, but is now of no great strength (O). The walls, which are raised out of the materials of the old Roman Vacca, are still intire, and have some antient inscriptions.

Tuburbo, vulgarly Urbs.

THE next place of note is the city of Tuburbo, vulgarly Urbs and Torbus, supposed the Tuburbum Minus, or Turridis, of the antients; it is pleasantly situated, in a healthy and fertile plain, which produces grain, fruit, &c. about 60 leagues south of Tunis, towards Libya and Numidia. It was formerly destroyed by the African Vandals, but rebuilt since more like a large village than a city. It is at present chiefly inhabited by Andalusian Moors, and still preserves abundance of indices of its former splendor; such as statues, niches, inscriptions, &c. It has likewise a castle with some cannon, and a garrison, the inhabitants being no less oppressed with taxes, and apt to revolt, than those of Bayjah. Out of the ruins of a stately Roman amphitheatre, Maham Bey caused a large massy bridge or dam to be made, with proper sluices and flood-gates, to raise the water of the Mejerda to a convenient height, to water a favourite plantation of his own peculiar ordering, consisting of citrons, lemons, oranges, pomegranates, nectarines, peaches, apricots, dates, figs, and a great variety of fruit-trees, in which every kind was set to grow by themselves, and without the least intermixture of any other<sup>i</sup>. There ran also between the castle, and the two parts of the town which were the best inhabited, a fresh stream, through an alabaster conduit, whose water turned several mills in its way, and the spring of which was about a stonecast from the town, if it was not part of the same work<sup>k</sup>. But these were of too laudable a nature to subsist long in Barbary, and are now intirely gone to ruin<sup>l</sup>. The inhabitants, both of Bayjah and Urbs, are, for the most part, husbandmen or weavers, but are so sadly oppressed by the government, and harrassed by the Arabs, that they are very poor, indolent, and ever uneasy under their yoke.

Casba and Ain Sammin.

EACH of them hath a town under its jurisdiction; viz. Casba and Ain Sammin, al. Ain Zammet. The former was once a Roman colony, built in a large fertile plain, about 25 or 30 miles south of Tunis, and hath its walls still standing, though almost destitute of inhabitants, ever since it was destroyed by the Turks. Ain Sammin is a new town, lately built by the Tunefian Beys, about 12 leagues south of Tunis, and 20 from Bayjah. It stands on a fertile ground, pitched upon in order to be better cultivated, but the Arabs would not suffer it to continue, and Mulcy Mohammed was obliged to abandon it to their mercy, to prevent an insurrection. The walls are still standing, and the houses want nothing but the covering, which is gone to decay. But the Arabs, who are numerous and powerful in this canton, will not suffer it to be inhabited<sup>m</sup>.

WE have, by this time, gone through the principal places of the two circuits, and might have added a number of others, which, by the ruins they lie in, appear to have been very considerable; but, as these would be foreign to our modern plan, we shall refer our curious readers to what has been said of the most considerable of them in our antient history<sup>n</sup>, and for the remained to the learned traveller so often quoted in this chapter<sup>o</sup>, and take notice now of their natural and artificial curiosities, among the latter of which we shall include such remnants of antiquity as are still extant, and worthy our notice.

(O) Marmol adds, that Amida, Bey of Tunis, had caused another to be built over against it, in which he had placed 14 pieces of brass cannon, and a good garrison, with a governor over it, to keep the inhabitants in awe, who, tho' poor, are proud, and fond of change of government, and ready to revolt upon every opportunity that offers. If so, it is a wonder that so curious an observer as Dr. Shaw should have overlooked this new fortress (21).

- <sup>a</sup> AMONG the former we may be well allowed to rank the lesser Syrtis (P), so famed among The Syrtis, the antients, as well as the moderns, for its dangerous sand bank, so fatal to mariners that sail along that coast. The greater, mentioned in the margin, will be spoken of in its proper place, it lying on the gulph of Sidra on the coast of Tripoli. The lesser, which belongs to the Tunesian coasts, between the island of Jerba and the promontory of Capoudea, that is, from latitude  $33^{\circ} 40'$  to  $35^{\circ}$ . The antients, indeed, reckoned it to reach no farther northward than the islands of Querkeynesi; but since we find, that there is a long succession of flat islands, banks of sand, and oozy bottoms (Q), extending themselves from the island of Jerba to the cape of Capoudea above-mentioned. We need not question, but the Syrtis extends itself quite from the one end to the other of that huge and dangerous gulph. It is unnecessary here to inform our readers, that hydrographers give the the name of Syrtis to any place, where the waters run at some times very high, and at others very low, and sometimes retire so far from it, as to leave the sand quite naked and dry. Our author adds, that, when he sailed along the coasts of this lesser Syrtis, the east winds were too violent to permit him to observe the flux and reflux, but was credibly informed, that the sea, about the island of Jerba, frequently rose twice a day a fathom or more above its usual height <sup>p</sup>.

- THE next natural curiosity of this kingdom is its hot baths, and sulphureous springs, of which it hath a great variety. Some of these are so intensely hot, that they are quite unfit for bathing; particularly those of Meskouten and Mereega, the former of which will boil a large piece of mutton very tender in a quarter of an hour. Others again, as those of Seedi Ebli and Elelma el Hammah, are just of a proper heat for baths; and a third sort, as the Ain Houte, and most of the springs of the Fereed, Cassa, and Zozar, are little more than lukewarm, and nourish a number of fishes of the perch and mussel kind. Most of those of this latter sort, when cold, are clear, transparent, and fit to drink, and as soft to the palate as rain water; whence we may safely conclude, either that their sulphureous effluvia do quickly evaporate, or else that the virtues, ascribed to the bathing in them, consist chiefly in their genial heat.

- AGAIN it is observed, that these intense ones of Hammah and Meskouten, above-mentioned, do, in some measure, dissolve, or rather calcine, the rock through which they run, to the distance sometimes of an hundred feet. So that the substance of the rocks being become soft and uniform, the water, by making equal impressions, leaves them in the shape of cones or hemispheres, of the height and diameter of about six feet, more or less; and these the superstitious Arabs believe to be the tents of their ancestors petrified. In like manner, when the substance of the rocks contain some larger layers of harder matter, which resist the force of the water, their imagination immediately transforms them into sheep, oxen, horses, nay men, women, and children, whom they suppose to have undergone the same fate with their tents. There is still another singularity observed, with relation to those hot springs; viz. that the ground beneath them sounds and feels so hollow, that one is apt to fear sinking every moment through it; whence it may be reasonably concluded, that the air, which is pent up in those cavities, must form a great variety of sounds, more or less shrill and loud, according to the directions of the wind, and the motion of the ambient air, as it makes its way out along with the water of those hot springs; for, if any of them is either stopped or dried up in one place, it will soon after make its way through at another; which doth likewise account for the variety of cones and other traces which we observed to be caused by the hot waters. These sounds the Arabs, however, believe to be the music of the Jenoune, or fairies, which they suppose to make their abode in these kinds of places, and to be the agents in all these extraordinary phænomena †.

- BUT to return to the other baths. We have already mentioned those in the neighbourhood of Tunis <sup>a</sup>; as likewise the river Gabbs, and its hot waters <sup>r</sup>. Other baths of the same hot nature there are, which, having nothing singular, we pass by, and only take notice of those called El Hammah, resorted unto from all parts of the kingdom, and situate about four leagues westward of Gabbs, which place is called El Hammah Gabbs from them, to

(P) There are two of that name, distinguished by the antients by the epithets of magna and parva, the greater and the lesser Syrtis. This last is derived from the Greek, word συρῆν, to draw, because the vessels, that come within their verge, seem to be attracted by the waves; or, as others will have it, from the vast quantities of sand and mud which their violence drags after them, both in coming and going (22). This maritime tract, however, was on that account called Regio Syr-

tica, as the reader will see in the description formerly given of it (23).

(Q) It is on these kinds of shallows, that the inhabitants, from antient times to this very day, were wont to catch great quantities of fish, by wading a mile or two from the shore, and fixing, in various windings and directions as they went along, hurdles made of reeds, in which they seldom failed of inclosing a good number (24).

distinguish it from another Gabbs. These baths are sheltered, however, from the weather, <sup>a</sup> by nothing better than a miserable thatched hovel built over them. The basins are about 12 feet square, and four feet deep, and have, at a convenient distance from the surface of the water, some massy benches of stone for the bathers to sit upon *. One of them is called the Bath of the Lepers, and is much frequented by persons labouring under that, and other the like diseases, and below it the waters stagnating and forming a kind of pond, it is not improbable, that it may be that which Lco styles the leper's gate, who tells us, that the water that forms it runs through the town of El Hamina, as he corruptly calls El Hammah, and adds, from his own experience, that the water is so impregnated with sulphur, that it will by no means quench one's thirst †. Of the same nature are the natural stews of Brazza, the antient Bruzo, about eight leagues westward of Kayrwan. The natives stile them Ham- <sup>b</sup> mam, or baths, though they are no more than so many vaulted rooms, perpetually full of sulphureous steams, like the grottos of Trifoli, and some others in Italy, and are chiefly frequented by the Arabs for the benefit of sweating.

ANOTHER kind of natural curiosity of this kingdom is their salt lakes, some of whose waters are not inferior to sea-water in their saltness; particularly that called Shibkab-el-Loto-Deab, or Lake of marks, so called from a great number of trunks of palm-trees, placed at proper distances, to direct the caravans in their march over it †. We have given an account of all other particulars, excepting this of its saltness, in our Antient History, to which our readers may recur †. But besides this, and other lakes and marshes, and oozy grounds, in which the salts either incrustate on the top, or settle like a pavement at the bottom, there <sup>c</sup> is, at a small distance eastward from the Marks lake above-mentioned, a famed mountain of salt, named Jibbel Haddessa, which is, to all appearance, different from that of the other Salinæ. It is hard and solid like a stone, of a reddish or purple colour, and bitter to the taste; but, being washed down the precipices by the dews, becomes soft and white as snow, and loses all its bitterness. There are indeed other such mountains, whose salt is of a blueish colour, and, without undergoing such accidental purifications, are not only very palatable, but in great request, particularly that of Lwotajah, which, we are told, is sold in Algiers for a penny an ounce *.

THE artificial rarities found in this country, worth mentioning, are mostly of Roman extract. One of the most curious of that kind is the threefold mosaic pavement, each part <sup>d</sup> contiguous to the other, near the place called Seedy Doude, or sanctuary of David (R), and each of them wrought with symmetry and exactness. Besides the general contrast and design, which is executed with all the artful wreathings, and variety of colours imaginable, there are figures of horses, birds, fishes, and trees, so beautifully intermixed and curiously inlaid, that they appear more lively and gay than so many tolerable good paintings. The horse, the Carthaginian insignia, is displayed in the bold open posture it is observed to be in upon the African medals. The birds are the hawk and partridge; the fishes the gilt-head, called by the Africans Jeraba, and mullet; and the trees are the palm and olive. The contriver of which is supposed; by that choice, to have designed to point out the strength, diversions, fishery, and plenty of dates and olives, for which this country is still as remarkable <sup>e</sup> as ever.

THE amphitheatre of Jemme is another noble piece of Roman antiquity, consisting originally of sixty-four arches, and four orders of columns. The upper order, supposed to be no more than an Attic, hath suffered greatly from the Arabs, and four of the arches were blown up from top to bottom by the Bey Mohammed, which the Arabs, then in a revolt, had made use of as a fortress; otherwise, as to the outside, nothing can appear more intire and beautiful, and within, the platform of the seats, and the galleries leading to them, are still standing, the arena is nearly circular, and in the center of it is a deep well of hewn stone, where the pillar that supported the Velum, or Awning, may be supposed to have been fixed.

BESIDES that noble structure, there are still to be seen a multitude of other antiquities; such as altars with defaced inscriptions, variety of stately columns, trunks of marble statues, one of them of the coloss kind in armour, and another, a naked Venus, in the attitude and dimensions of the Medecian, both by good masters, but without heads *.

The triumphal arches of Spaitla.

NOT inferior to this are the triumphal arches of Spaitla, or Sufetula of the antients, which is of the Corinthian order, and consists of one large arch, with a lesser one on each side.

a From this quite to the city, that is about a furlong off, there runs a pavement of black stone, guarded on each side with a parapet wall, for the convenience, as may be supposed, of the triumpher's entrance into the city. At a little distance from the end of the pavement one passes through another arch, or portico, like the former, which leads into a spacious court, in which are seen the ruins of three contiguous temples, whose roofs, porticos, and façades, are broken down; but the walls, with their proper pediments, entablatures, &c. are still standing and entire<sup>r</sup>.

THE Menara upon the coast, about two leagues west by south of Hammamel, is a mausoleum, built in the form of a cylindrical pedestal, near 60 feet in diameter, and with a vault underneath. On the top of it, just above the cornice, are placed several small altars, which b the Moors think to have been designed for so many lamps for the direction of mariners (S). These altars had all of them inscriptions, three of which now remain legible. The first hath these words; L. ÆMILIO AFRICANO AVUNCULO; the second, C. SUELLIO PONTIANO PATRUELI; and the third, VITELLIO QUARTO PATR.<sup>2</sup> There are also a variety of these mausolea at Hydra, some of a round, others of an octogon figure; others again square, with a nich on one of the façades, or else a wide open place like a balcony on the top; all of them supported by four, six, or eight, columns, and well preserved, only the inscriptions belonging to them are either defaced by time, or by the malice of the Arabs<sup>2</sup>.

THE last we shall mention of this kind, and that chiefly on account of the lasting nature of its materials, by which the reader may infer the true reason why so many others of the c same kind have escaped hitherto, is the cothon, or pier of Demafs, or antient Thapsus, which being built in frames, like the walls of Tremecen, and other cities, mosks, castles, &c. of a composition made of mortar and pebbles, appear to this day so strong and well cemented, that the very solid rock cannot be more hard and durable; whence it is, that this great piece of antiquity is still remaining, in defiance of time, the sea, and the insults of the Arabs<sup>b</sup>.

THIS kingdom, as well as that of Algiers, and others along the Barbary coasts, are very Tunis subject subject to great earthquakes, which is easily accounted for, from what we lately observed of to earthquakes. the great number of hot springs and sulphureous caverns; for we may reasonably suppose, that, besides the vast quantities of those effluvia which are continually discharged by those d springs, there must remain an almost inexhaustible store of sulphur, nitre, and other inflammable bodies behind, sufficient to cause those frequent and violent concussions, some of which we have given an account of in the last chapter<sup>c</sup>; and these, without all doubt, have helped to increase the number of those devastations, which time, raging wars, and the malice of the Turks and Arabs, have made in all these parts. These earthquakes commonly happen after some great rains, at the end of the summer, or in autumn, and will extend themselves a good way into the sea, and be felt at a great distance from any land, and where the depth of water hath been above 200 fathom<sup>d</sup>.

IN other respects the country is for the most part healthy and fertile as any under the e same climate, excepting, that in the southern parts are many sandy and barren deserts, and its climate and the heat excessive. But the northern ones, which lie mostly between 34 and 37 degrees of temperature. latitude, and are the best cultivated, enjoy a wholesome temperature, neither too hot in summer, nor too cold and sharp in winter; insomuch, that no part of the kingdom hath been visited with the plague these 70 years, though so frequent and destructive in most parts of Barbary and the Levant; to which we may add, that, according to the observations which were made by the ingenious Dr. Shaw, during his twelve years residence at Algiers, which is almost in the same parallel, all the revolutions of the weather throughout the year made no greater change in the barometer than one inch  $\frac{3}{10}$ , that is, from 29  $\frac{1}{10}$  to 30  $\frac{4}{10}$ <sup>e</sup>. The winds are mostly from the sea, and consequently are very refreshing; but those that blow from the southern sandy deserts are quite suffocating, especially as they mostly blow f in July and August, and will continue five, six, or more days, in the same corner; so that the inhabitants are obliged to water the flooring of their houses to cool them. This wind is likewise apt to blow after the winter solstice, and then, if the snows be ever so deep on the ground, they quickly thaw and disappear, but this seldom happens. The sea winds, that blow west-north-west and north, bring dry weather in summer, and rain in winter; but the

easterly, as well as the southerly, are for the most part dry, though attended with a thick a cloudy atmosphere in most seasons. Their first rains commonly fall in September, and sometimes in October; presently after which the Arabians break the ground, sow their corn, and plant their beans, barley, lentils, and garvancos (T) about three weeks after. If they have any rains in April, as they commonly have, they reckon their crop secure. Their harvest usually begins in May, or the beginning of June, according to the quality of the preceding season. Their ploughed lands are generally of so loose a texture, that a pair of oxen may easily plough an acre, and a quantity of seed, whether of wheat or barley, is about two bushels and an half per acre, which, communibus annis, will yield about ten-fold, more or less, and some districts much more <sup>f</sup>. In other respects the product of this country, whether above or under-ground, being much the same all over Barbary, we shall refer our readers b to our account of it in the foregoing chapter <sup>g</sup>, and conclude this section with observing, that the Tunefians are much more addicted to agriculture than their neighbours the Algerines, and are for making the most of every inch of their ground; so that one must expect no regularity, much less elegance, even in their gardens; fine walks, parterres, flower beds, and other such ornaments, would be looked upon as a waste of so much useful ground; and regularity in planting or sowing, or any other improvement, as a shameful deviation from the practice of their ancestors, which they therefore religiously adhere to, holding it trouble enough to sow and plant, without aiming any farther. Yet both Turks and Moors will readily lend their seats to Christians, on account of the great improvements they commonly make to them, and, with that view, will grant them the liberty of hunting, fowling, c &c. without any limitation, provided they take a Moor in their company. Whereas in those gardens and orchards that are left to their own culture and management, one sees nothing but a confused mixture of trees, shrubs, and bushes, above, with cabbages, turneps, beans, pease, &c. growing beneath, and sometimes barley and wheat intermixed amongst them. As for mines of metals, minerals, and other subterraneous productions, they are still more negligent of them <sup>h</sup>; and the story, which they tell of Bey Mohammed's plow-shares, is applicable to both these branches of their natural philosophy. This prince, having been dethroned by his subjects, applied himself to Ibrahim Hojah, Dey of Algiers, who engaged to restore him to his throne, on condition that he discovered to him the grand secret of the kymia, or philosopher's stone, which he had the reputation of being master of, and, d on his promise to comply, re-inthroned him accordingly. The method he took to perform it was, by sending to the Dey, with great pomp and ceremony, a great number of plow-shares and mattocks, intimating thereby to the Algerine prince, that the wealth of his kingdom was to arise from a diligent attendance on the cultivating of the ground; and that the only philosopher's stone he could acquaint him with, was the turning of a good crop into gold <sup>i</sup>.

Of the government, laws, language, and commerce of the Tunefians.

The Beylik becomes despotic
and hereditary,
though not confined to primogeniture.

THE government of Tunis at present, like that of Algiers, is altogether despotic, but e with this difference, that it is elective in that; and here not only hereditary, but the Bey hath power to name which of his sons he pleases for his successors, without regard to eldership; or, in case he doth not think him worthy, he may raise a brother or a nephew to the throne after him. In all other cases likewise they are equally absolute and independent either on the Porte or the Dowan. They were once, indeed, under the protection of the

(T) This kind is the Acer of the antients, and what we call Chickpea, and differs from the rest, in that it doth not soften into a pulp like other pulse by boiling, and therefore is never served up alone, but is strewed over their pillaw and cuscaſaw; but they are most commonly eaten parched, and are then reckoned a delicacy by persons of all ages and distinction. Accordingly most places in Barbary, and other eastern cities, have pans or ovens for that purpose in every street, and, when thus parched, exchange their old name for that of leb-lebby. Some of the learned have conjectured, that this pulse is the same which the holy scripture calls קלי Cali, and ours, and other versions, render parched corn (27). But we have formerly shewed it more probable, from the likeness of their shape, that this kind was the חיריונים chirjonim, or, as we render it, dove's dung, mentioned in another place, and cannot therefore be the same with the Cali, whatever be the true meaning of this last (28).

- a former; and, after that, the rapacious extortions and tyranny of its Baschas had, in some measure, obliged them to shake off their yoke, and form a government of their own, they settled it in such a manner that their Deys, as they were then called, could do nothing without the advice and consent of the Douwan. But they have found means in time to rid themselves of this uneasy clog also, though they yet retain a kind of form or shadow of both. The Porte hath still a Bascha residing here, but his power and influence is a meer cypher, and serves only to remind the Tunefians that they were once subject to the Turkish Soltans, or at most to prevent the regency doing any thing prejudicial to their interest: and as to the Douwan, it being chiefly composed of friends and creatures of the Beys, they are rather assembled to give a forced approbation to their resolutions, than to consult them about the justice or expediency of them.
- b At the first settling of this new form of government, the Deyship was the supreme dignity, as it is still at Algiers; and that of Bey was the next in rank, but wholly subordinate to it. However, having since built their power upon the ruins of the Deys, they have by degrees raised it to the despotic height, and independency that we see it now in; and, by making it hereditary, have prevented, as much as possible, those frequent depositions, rebellions, and massacres, which are the almost constant concomitants of the regal authority, wherever it is made elective, as we have shewn it to be at Algiers<sup>a</sup>. We say as much as possible, though far enough from doing it effectually, so as to prevent jealousies and cabals, or sons from rebelling even against their fathers, much more against such of their brothers as are nominated to the succession by them: so that, in spite of all
- c their precautions, the dignity ofner falls to the share of that son who has been able by his address to form the strongest party, than to him who hath been appointed to it by the father, or to him that is most worthy or best qualified for it. Hence it is, that when ever the throne becomes vacant, whether in the course of nature, or by open treason and rebellion, which is often the case, it is seldom filled up again without a great deal of bloodshed, rapine, and violence, in proportion to the number of competitors.

- How, when, and by whom, this new form of government was first settled in this kingdom, and by what methods the Beys gained this despotick superiority over the Deyship, will be best seen in the history of it; which we shall give in the last section of this chapter. At present this last dignity is dwindled to such a degree, that it hath scarcely half the share in
- d the government that the Beys enjoyed when they held the next rank under it: for these then were commonly appointed governors of the provinces, where they lived in great state and grandeur, and gained immense riches by the oppression of, and vast exactions on, the subjects, as well as by sinking some considerable part of the revenue into their own coffers; whereas, now the Beys, by dividing the kingdom into the two circuits formerly mentioned, taking the whole inspection of them into their own hands, and collecting the revenue in person, at the head of their flying camp, have at once stripped them of the greatest branch of their wealth, grandeur, and authority, and left them only a meer dependence on the favour of the Beys, for such places and employments as might help them to keep up some shadow of their former state. Both they and the Douwan took great umbrage
- e at this excess of power and arbitrary proceedings; and much more so at their entailing the royal dignity on their descendants, and making it still more sure to them by the alliances which they contracted with the Arabian princes, their neighbours. And the noble and united struggles which they made to shake off that new and irksome yoke, make no inconsiderable part of the Tunefian history; though, instead of meeting with the success they deserved, they have rather helped to render it more heavy and durable.

- It must be owned, however, that, with all this excess of power, they come vastly short of the wealth and magnificence of the former kings of Tunis; we mean those of the Laffis, the first who assumed the name of kings, and made that city the metropolis of their kingdom. These kept, indeed, a very numerous and splendid court in it, established the first
- f officers of state, and committed the most important affairs to their inspection. Their Douwan, or grand council, consisted of 300 persons of birth, probity, and experience; their guard of 150 men, mostly renegadoes; and their force of about 40,000 men, with a revenue answerable to all that grandeur. This, however, ended with Muley Isfem, whom Barbareffa dethroned, and made himself master of that capital, and great part of the kingdom; and, though restored to it by the emperor Charles V. yet his becoming thereby tributary to him, would not permit him to restore it to that pristine lustre in which his predecessors had maintained it, during the space of near 300 years. It went still more into decay during the time of their being under the protection of the Porte, or, more properly, rather under the tyranny and oppression of its Baschas. The Deys that succeeded
- g them never were in a condition to raise it again; and the Beys, which afterwards supplanted them, whether through want of power or inclination, have still shewed a greater indifferency towards state grandeur than any of the rest, so they can but secure to themselves, and a their descendants, the privilege of reigning with an uncontrouled sway<sup>c</sup>.

The Beys in danger from the Arabs and Algerines;

THEY have, indeed, some cogent motives to take off their thoughts from aiming at making such a high figure, as would rather create envy and jealousy, than awe and regard, either from their uneasy and oppressed subjects at home, especially the Moors and Arabs, or from their neighbours on every side, but more particularly from the Algerine Deys on their left, and the Tripolitans on the right; not that the latter have any great power to hurt them, unless it be by joining with the former, or assisting some of the Christian maritime powers, as the English and French; with whom, therefore, the Tunefians must endeavour to cultivate a fair correspondence, by reason of the neighbourhood of their fleets.

rebellions fomented by the Algerine Deys.

Beys keep a great number of renagadoes
in pay;

BUT over the Algerines they are obliged to keep a more watchful eye; for these, b being more addicted to the piratical trade than to that of merchandize, have gained a vast superiority over them ever since they left off the corsair employment, for the more peaceful one of trade and commerce; insomuch, that an Algerine Rais will suffer his crew to commit the foulest disorders without controul, even in a Tunefian road or harbour; whilst these, afraid of bringing upon themselves a most savage militia, who they know would wish nothing more than a pretence of marching into a country so much better than their own, are forced to put up with every insult and abuse from that haughty quarter. Hence it is, that they are never better pleased than when they see that state embroiled, either with domestic feuds or some foreign war; though, in this latter case, the Bey of Tunis seldom fails sending them some ambassy, with offers of his assistance; which, nevertheless, if accepted, c is sure to be delayed under some pretence or other; instances of which we have given in the last chapter<sup>d</sup>. The truth is, the Algerines are no less superior to them at land than they are at sea, not only in wealth and strength, but their soldiery and sailors are more warlike, stout, and desperate; and, by their insolent behaviour, have, in a great measure, so intimidated them, that they content themselves with keeping a watchful eye over all their measures, without daring to take any steps that might give them any real umbrage, much less furnish so savage, rapacious, and formidable a neighbour, with a pretext for invading them afresh. For it is but too plain, from what we have seen in the latter part of their history, that it hath been one constant piece of their policy to foment divisions, revolutions, d influencing new elections, and sometimes even deposing some of their Beys, and setting up new ones in their stead. And, on the other hand, whenever they have thought fit to come to an open rupture with them, whether justly or not, they never failed sending their hungry troops to ravage their territories, carry off their most valuable effects, and destroy what they could not take with them. Upon these accounts, it is the interest of the Tunefian Beys, first, to entertain a sufficient number of renagadoes in their pay, whose fortune, depending wholly on them, will of course be both more faithful to them, and more vigilant in preventing the Arabian Cheyks from carrying on any secret correspondence, or entering into any combination with the Algerines. 2. To keep a good understanding with the Bey of Constantina; and, indeed, it is their mutual interest so to do; for no longer than they are true to each other, and behave with spirit, can they ever be a match for e Algiers. 3. We have likewise hinted, that Tunis ought to cultivate the friendship of the English and French; and that, not only for the sake of their advantageous commerce with them, but much more so, as without that it would be out of their power either to carry it on with any other nation, or to gain any advantage against the Spaniards, Corficans, Sardinians, Venetians, and Ecclesiastical State, with whom they are always at war. So that upon the whole, as long as they attend to those three important points, they might have little to fear from their rapacious neighbours, could they but as easily put an effectual stop to that corruption and violence which commonly over-rules all their elections; but whilst such a destructive practice is suffered to reign amongst them, they will hardly ever be out of danger of some fresh attack from that quarter; and that, perhaps, whilst their own swords f are drawn against one another<sup>e</sup>.

their revenue
uncertain;

WHAT the revenues and land forces of the Tunefian Beys are is not easy to guess; the former, consisting chiefly in the tribute which the Arabs and Moors pay to him, and in the customs arising from imports and exports, are in a constant fluctuation; because, on the one hand, both Arabs and Moors often find means to elude the payment of it, by concealing the product of their land (for they generally pay in kind) in large repositories, either under ground or in caves, such as their mountains abound in, and removing with their families and cattle into some inaccessible places against the time of the Bey's circuit, and returning again as soon as he is retired with his flying camp; they being so poor, and so heavily loaded with taxes, that, without such frequent escapes, it would be impossible g

- a for them to subsist, even in their miserable way of living. And as for the imports and exports, they are settled upon so sure a footing that it would be, if not impossible, at least very difficult, as well as hazardous, to defraud him in them, as we shall shew under a subsequent head. Their forces mostly consist of renegadoes, and a few militia: for they have no Janissaries in pay, as they have at Algiers; and this militia is chiefly kept in their garrisons and sea-ports; but is neither so well paid nor disciplined as the Algerine. The renegado soldiers, who chiefly compose the Bey's guard, and the garrison of his capital, are, indeed, better maintained and clothed; but without those singular privileges which are allowed to the Algerine Janissaries<sup>f</sup>. So that, upon the whole, one would wonder at the paucity of their forces in time of peace, and how their Beys dare to trust their government and vast territories to so weak and inconsiderable a guard: they can, indeed, under all emergencies, command a powerful army of Moors and Arabians, both horse and foot, but have but small dependence on their fidelity, seeing the hatred between their nations, heightened by the exactions under which they groan, gives the tyrannical masters but little reason to expect any other than a forced and reluctant service from them.

- THEIR shipping is likewise much inferior to what might be expected from such a maritime trading nation, except what is employed in this latter branch; those that belong to the government are no more than four, and all of them but poorly rigged; the largest not carrying above forty guns: they had, it seems, one of seventy guns; but which, through some defect in her building, could never be fit for service; besides about thirty galliots, carrying from 20 to 120 men; which are commonly commanded by a renegado, and manned partly with some of the same sort, and partly by Turks and Czuleglies, or sons of married soldiers<sup>g</sup>. The Christian slaves work the ship, and the Turks are only concerned in the fighting part. The four great ships that set out on the cruize twice a year are supplied with oil, butter, vinegar, and biscuit by the Bey; but as those provisions are not sufficient, their captains, for two piasters more from every Turk, enlarge the allowance to a certain rate for forty or fifty days at most. Other galliots are likewise fitted out by private owners, who at their own expence, carry on their cruize, pay the ship's crew, and defray other charges, and are allowed the sole property of the prizes they take, except such perquisites as the Bey reserves for himself, much after the same manner as we have seen at Algiers<sup>h</sup>.
- d To these we may add a great number and variety of other mercantile vessels; of whose shape, rigging, and use, as well as of the four ships of the government, the reader may find the best account we can give him of them in the margin (A), as far as relates to their present state. For it is plain, from those authors who have formerly wrote of it, that it made a much greater figure at sea before the end of the last century, than they have in this<sup>i</sup>.

- WHEN any of the government's ships brings in a prize, the hull of the vessel, and half the cargo, after the ship's expence hath been deducted, belongs to the Bey, and the other half is divided between the Rais, or captain, and the company. The Rais hath six shares, the under Rais four, the pilot four, the gunner four, the clerk three, the quarter-master two, the cockswain two, and each private man half a share. As to the slaves, the Bey, besides his half, has the privilege of buying the rest at 100 piaftres per head, which he seldom fails of selling for 300 or 400, only every tenth head belongs to the Douwan.

- WHEN a Christian merchantman comes into the road of Tunis, he hoists his colours, and salutes the castle of Goletta with three guns; after which, the master comes on shore to inform the Aga whence he comes. But when a man of war, belonging to a Christian state, comes in, he anchors at some farther distance from the castle than the merchantmen, and is first saluted from it according to his rate, which he returns with the same number of guns. All the time of his stay the flag is hoisted at the consul's house belonging to his nation; and all the merchantmen of the same nation keep their colours flying. Upon the arrival of any such men of war, their consul is obliged to give notice of it to the Bey, who immediately orders all the slaves to be shut up in their respective bagnios, lest any of them should find means to get on board of her; in which case there would be no reclaiming

(A) The Tunisian vessels may be divided into ships, patachas, polachas, ketches, barks, pinks, tartans, and canoes; all which have their respective uses and advantages, and are differently rigged and worked. The ships have four masts, the main, the fore, the mizen, and the bow-sprit; the patachas differ only from the ships in having no mizen-mast; the polacha hath a square sail to her main-mast, a smack sail to her fore-mast, and a very small mizen-mast; the ketch hath several smack sails forward, her main-mast is higher than that of other vessels, but her mizen and bow-sprit of the usual length; all the difference between the bark and the pink consists only in their head, which in the former is full, and in the latter sharp; both have a main, fore, and mizen-mast, rigged with smack sails: most of the tartans and canoes have but one mast, neither is there much difference in their sails (1).

them. At their departure the Bey commonly sends the captain the usual present of oxen, a sheep, poultry, and other refreshments. All trading vessels, which load or unload in this kingdom, are obliged to pay four duties; viz. anchorage, which amounts to seventeen one-half piasters for loading, and as many for unloading. The average on ships loading, being part of the public revenue, rises and falls according to the exigencies of the state. This duty, which ran high in the year 1733, amounted to twenty piasters for every ship, whether loading or unloading; that of the patachas, polachas, ketches, and canoes, to eighteen; pinks and barks to fourteen, and tartans ten; and double the sum, if they both loaded and unloaded. To these we may add the duty of two per cent. called the consulship, on every cargo taken on board at Tunis; and is for the salary of the consul and other officers. The passports granted to French captains are, at the desire of their own crown, b limited to three years; at the end of which they are to appear before some admiralty court in France before they renew it, under severe penalties. But those granted to the English extend to fourteen years, without being confined to the obligation above mentioned*.

TUNIS exports to France corn, oil, beans, lentils, wax, wool, hides, and Morocco skins; and receives in exchange Spanish wool, Languedoc cloths, vermillion, sugar, pepper, cloves, wine, brandy, paper, hard-ware, iron, and steel. The Italian trade is wholly carried on by the Jews, who send the same commodities to France, and import from thence Spanish cloths, damasks, several sorts of silk and woollen stuffs, gold and silver tissue, &c. The French pay three per cent. for all the goods they bring from, or into, France; and the Jews c ten per cent. on their imports from Italy. The Turks and Moors export to the Levant woollen stuffs, lead, gold dust, and chequins, and a vast number of bales of caps; and bring in return silks, calicoes, iron, alum, and vermillion. They send much the same kind of commodities into Egypt; but the oil that is carried thither must be put up in jars, and not in casks, because the greatest part of it is designed for the lamps of Mecca and Medina; and the Arabians would think it polluted, as the casks might have formerly contained wine. They import in exchange from thence linen, coffee, rice, flax, and cotton. The number of French ships freighted at Tunis, by Turks, Moors, and Jews, amount yearly, we are told, to no less than 150 to the Levant, and 50 for France and Italy: as for those of the English their number is uncertain<sup>1</sup>. One considerable branch of the Tunisian d commerce is that of the caravan vessels, which trade to the Levant, not only on account of the half average they pay to the state, but of the vast concourse of people they occasion, and the tax on passports: but the most considerable of all the caravans are those from Sallee and the Cadensts; the first of which arrives about three weeks before the Ramadan, and enriches the Tunisiens with gold dust and chequins, to the value of 100,000 pounds sterling. The Cadenstian, which comes in twice a year, likewise brings plenty of gold dust, besides a considerable number of negroes, which they exchange for cloths, paper, Venice glasses, wire, coral, and other toys<sup>m</sup>. In most other respects the commerce of the Tunisiens is carried on much after the same manner as we have seen at Algiers; and with this advantage, e that foreigners, whether of Christian, or any other nation, are used here with greater humanity and equity than there. The English, French, Imperialists, Dutch, and Genoese, have their consuls, who are likewise treated with greater regard and esteem. They have not only their fine houses in the metropolis, but handsome villas, or country seats in the neighbourhood of it; in both which they live in a splendid manner. We have already hinted, that theirs and their officers salaries arise from the duty of two per cent. on all vessels that take their cargo on board at Tunis. This duty is collected by a merchant of the greatest repute, who passes his account every year before the consul, chancellor, and four other merchants<sup>n</sup>.

ALL public conventions and instruments are written in the Arabic tongue; which, by the introduction of the Turkish religion into all Barbary, and the intercourse with the Moors, is much corrupted from its antient energy and elegance. As for the public commerce, it is f commonly carried on by the help of the Lingua Franca. The great number of renegadoes from France, Italy, and Spain, which are here greatly encouraged, on account of their abilities, usefulness, and professed hatred to all Christians, have likewise rendered their own languages so familiar in those parts, especially in Tunis, that it would be dangerous to talk of matters of state in any of them, before Turks or Moors. Many of those renegadoes find means to raise themselves to the most considerable employments, and to gain immense riches; and the Turks, though haughty towards the rest of mankind, yet pay a singular regard to these wretches, and shew them all possible marks of esteem to all outward appearance; but, in their hearts, envy, hate, and despise them. The Jews likewise swarm in this kingdom, on account of their usefulness in commerce; and, tho' no less despised in all other respects, g are yet suffered to trade and flourish, and to live after their own manner in their separate quarters. They are reckoned to be nine or ten thousand in the city of Tunis<sup>o</sup>; many of whom carry a on a very considerable commerce; and, as they are much given to cheat in their weights and measures, making of fraudulent bankruptcies, adulterating of gold dust, and other commodities, they are commonly punished or fined more severely than any other foreigners, especially if they are caught in lessening or counterfeiting the coin, which is much the same here as is current at Algiers <sup>p</sup>.

THE punishments are here also much the same as there, and are executed with the same partiality, with respect to the Turks, in both <sup>a</sup>; only here they are most severe against those renegadoes that turn Christians again: for these they either wrap up in a cloth dipped in pitch and set on fire, or else put them to a more painful and lingering death, by walling them up close all but their heads, and rubbing their heads and faces with honey, which b exposes them to the bite and stings of wasps and other insects; by which they are tortured several days and nights before they expire. They are no less severe on their slaves who attempt to run away, but especially such as kill their masters, if Turks; for which last offence they break the offender's arms and legs, tie him to a horse's tail, and drag him through all the streets; after which they strangle him, and give his body to the Franks to be buried. But it most commonly happens, that the boys (than which our author tells us <sup>c</sup> there are none more wicked in the world) snatch the dead body out of the executioner's hands, in spite of the Mezoar, or sub-basha; and, having dragged it about some time longer, will roast it with straw, and, after many other indignities, throw him at last into some ditch; out of which the Franks must fetch him, in order to be buried.

S E C T. III.

c THIS country had hardly seen an end of its subjection to the two foreign yokes under which it so long groaned, viz. that of the Romans, and that of the northern Vandals and Goths, but it saw itself involved with the rest of Barbary, under that of the Saracens, which was governed by viceroys, with the title of Emirs <sup>a</sup>, who first established that form of government; under which it continued afterwards by different families during the space of near five hundred years. We have already shewn, in a former chapter, what a desperate expedient the Khalif of Kayrwan took to be revenged on his treacherous viceroy, Abul-Hagax, who had seized on his African dominions, and got himself confirmed king of them by the Khalif of Babylon, whilst he was busy to take possession of his new conquest of Egypt; and in order to recover them from him. The traitor, Abul-Hagax, being defeated and killed d by those plundering swarms of Arabians, which he had invited into Africa to his assistance, his two sons, to avoid their father's fate, fled for refuge, the one to Tunis, and the other to Bujeyah, where they were received as princes, and took the sovereign power of those two principalities upon them; but were quickly after forced to submit to Techisien, al. Texesien, of the tribe of the Almoravides, who then reigned in the west of Barbary, who on their submission left them in possession of their respective new dominions <sup>b</sup>, which they quietly enjoyed, until that tribe was dispossessed of their sovereignty by that of the Almoravides; who, upon a general revolt, obtained the same sovereign power, drove these two princes out of their dominions, and took upon them the same honours and titles that were given to the Khalifs <sup>c</sup>. These resided at Morocco, and governed Tunis by their viceroys, till towards e the decline of the Almohedish tribe; when the Arabs at Tunis raised a revolt against them, and besieged the king of Morocco's governor. This last soon received a reinforcement from him of a small army, and twenty vessels, under the command of Abuledi, or Abdul Hedi, an officer of Seville, of the tribe of Maçamuda; who, landing at Tunis, found the city almost ruined by the Arabs; but soon thought of means, by his address and conduct, to bring matters to an accommodation; and, upon certain conditions, obliged them to leave both the city and villages in peace. He governed that kingdom with the title and full power of a viceroy; and at his death, left the government of it to his son Abu Zechariah, a person in no wise inferior in prudence and conduct to his father; and who, to keep all things under him in quiet, built a citadel on the highest part of the city: after this, he extended his con- f quests as far as Tripoli, raised large contributions in Libya, Numidia, and as far as the land of the negroes <sup>d</sup>; and left an immense treasure, at his death, to his son and successor Abu Ferez, after having held his government steady and prosperous during the troubles that reigned most of that time between the Benimerini and Almohedes.

Abu Ferez revolts from the king of Morocco;

ABRAHAM, or, as he is most commonly called, Abu Ferez, whose ambition was now equal to his overgrown wealth and power, was not long in possession of his father's dignity before he looked upon himself as too considerable to pay any farther submission to the king of Morocco. The dissentions that raged between the other powers of Africa had too far weakened them to permit him to overlook such a promising advantage; and, as he might justly look upon himself as their superior in strength and opulence, so it was natural for him to aspire at the reduction of the whole country under his dominion, especially as the Benimerini had, by this time, made themselves masters of the kingdom of Fez, and the Benizegens of that of Tremecen; so that that of Morocco alone remained in the hands of the Almohedes. With this hopeful prospect before him, Abu Ferez began his expedition with Tremecen, which he quickly reduced, and obliged the king to become his tributary. His example was soon followed by that of Fez, who, being then taken up with the siege of Morocco, thought fit to prevent the like visit, by sending him an embassy with rich presents, and the most solemn assurances of his friendship and submission, and of his acknowledging him thenceforward as his sovereign.

THERE needed no more to persuade Abu Ferez to turn back, who accordingly entered his capital in triumph, and there assumed the title of king of Africa, and established his court in that city in the same pomp and magnificence as that of the Sharif of Morocco. From that time the city of Tunis began to outvie most of those of Africa, being embellished by many sumptuous edifices, and defended by strong walls, towers, and other bulwarks, answerable to its new title of, Metropolis of Africa. Abu Ferez at his death divided his dominions between his three sons; to one he gave that of Bugia, to the second that of Numidia, and to the third, named Hutmen, that of Tunis.

Hutmen succeeds him at Tunis; and Abu-Bar suc-

HUTMEN, or, as others call him, Autman, was no less valiant than his father. He greatly enlarged his territories, dispossessed his brother Hamar of Numidia, the kingdom of which he rejoined to his own of Tunis, and caused his eyes to be put out. He reigned, according to Grammay, forty years<sup>c</sup>, and left his kingdom to his son Abu-Bar, who was afterwards deprived of it by one Jesajah, or Subajah, who stiled himself the son of Omar III. Khalif of the Asiatic Saracens.

Tunis taken by Hassan, and soon after retaken from
him.

HUTMEN, as well as his father, had, during his life-time, kept the kings of Fez so far in awe, that they had not dared to undertake any exploits or conquests for fear of giving him umbrage; but, after his death, they became powerful enough, in a little time, to cause their sovereignty to be acknowledged by all the Mohammedans of Africa, and to extend their dominions to the most eastern parts of Barbary, and southward as far as Negroland. They likewise had some bloody wars against the successors of Hutmen; till at length Hassan, or Hascen, one of their kings, came and besieged Tunis, and quickly after took it, which obliged the king to flee for shelter into the neighbouring deserts, then inhabited by the Arabians. It was not long, however, before he returned with a strong body of them; and, having defeated Hassan, recovered his capital and his kingdom. In the mean time, whilst the Tunesian monarch was at war with that of Fez, the city of Tripoli, which we lately observed had been subdued by Abu Zecharia, revolted, and continued five years independant; till Abu Hamen, successor of Hassan, came and defeated Muley Abu, and obliged him to flee to Constantina, where he besieged and took him prisoner, and confined him in the castle of Centa, then belonging to the Moors.

Tripoli taken;

WHIST this was doing, the city of Tripoli saw itself at once surrounded by a squadron of Genoese ships, and twelve gallies, which quickly forced them to surrender at discretion. All the inhabitants were made slaves, and going to be carried away, when the king of Fez, being apprised of it, offered 50,000 crowns for their discharge, and the purchase of the city from them. The sum was readily accepted on those terms by the Genoese, but not so honestly paid by the Fezian monarch; one half of it being, we are told, false money, which they ignorantly took for good<sup>f</sup>.

THE king of Fez died some time after this new purchase, and was succeeded by Abu-celem, who entered into a treaty with that of Tunis, kept still prisoner at Centa; and, by means of some alliances between them, restored him to his liberty and kingdom. Abul Abex had not long returned to his dominions before he recovered the city of Tripoli, and others of his provinces, of which Hassan had stripped him, and enjoyed them peaceably afterwards, as did also his successors; till one of them, named Abu Barca, was assassinated, with one of his sons, in the citadel of Tripoli, by order of Chiajah, his nephew, who had raised a rebellion in the kingdom. He had not been long in the possession of it, before a first cousin of his revolted, defeated, and killed him, and enjoyed the crown peaceably whilst he lived; and at his death bequeathed it to Zechariah, the nephew of the above-named traitor, Chiajah, his predecessor. This dying soon after of the plague, the chief inhabitants chose for his

a successor Muley Abu Camen, the nephew of Zechariah, whose tyrannical government caused several cities to revolt, and erect themselves into petty sovereignties. Muley Abu Camen.

MULEY ABU CAMEN was succeeded by Muley Mahmed, of whom we find nothing remarkable, except that he reigned thirty-three years in Tunis, and had many children; the eldest of whom, called Mamon, he caused to be imprisoned, on suspicion of some treasonable design against him; and the rest were so vicious and profligate, that he could not find one among them all that was fit to succeed him. He at length pitched upon the youngest, not only because he was esteemed the most valiant, but on account of his mother being an Arabian of that country; and he hoped by that means to secure them the more firmly to the interest of his family<sup>z</sup>. This successor was the since famed Muley Hassan, whom we have already spoken of in the history of Algiers, and who was restored to his kingdom by the emperor, after Barbarossa had driven him out of it<sup>b</sup>; by which means he became tributary to that monarch (A), as we shall soon see.

For Hassan had not long been settled upon the throne, and proclaimed Mahmed's successor, before Mamon, his eldest brother, who was still kept close prisoner, made some strenuous efforts, by the assistance of his keeper, to make his escape, and claim his right to the crown. He was, however, discovered before he could accomplish it, and condemned to lose his head for the attempt; and with him were as many others of his brothers and relations, as could be caught, put likewise to death. Afrashid, another of his brothers, had, however, the good fortune to escape, and flee to Buchara in Numidia, where he met with a kind reception from Abdala, lord of the place. This last, having immediately raised an army of stout Arabs, marched with him at their head against Hassan, and defeated him; but, as they had no artillery with them, they could not force an entrance into the town; so that Afrashid was obliged to take his leave of the Arabs; and, having set fire to the suburbs, and all the adjacent parts of it, marched forthwith to Algiers, to implore Barbarossa's assistance, who governed that kingdom with the title of Viceroy, or Basha, under the Sultan.

This last, who had for some time looked upon the dissensions that reigned between those two brothers, and their partisans at Tunis, as a proper juncture for seizing that kingdom, and annex it to his Ottoman dominions, not only gave him a very friendly reception, but took him with him to Constantinople, under pretence of soliciting some farther assistance from, as well as for the protection of, Solyman. And it is scarcely to be doubted but he would have obtained his request, had not Barbarossa acquainted that monarch with the design he had been hatching against that kingdom. This proposal was too tempting to be rejected by that politic court; so that whilst Afrashid was detained as a kind of prisoner in that city, Barbarossa was sent with a sufficient squadron towards Tunis, where he arrived soon after. Upon his first appearing on the coasts, Hassan, who suspected his brother Afrashid to be there among them, and had cause to apprehend some revolt among the Tunefians, retired out of it, with some of his Arabs, and lay concealed among them till he could penetrate into the design of the Turks. Barbarossa sailed directly towards Bizerta, which immediately surrendered to him, out of spite to Hassan, who had disobliged the inhabitants. Thence he proceeded to Porto Farino, and the Cape of Carthage; and last of all, posted himself before the tower of the Goletta, or citadel, which he saluted, as usual, with a broadside without a ball, in token of alliance and friendship, which was returned in the same manner from the tower.

He next demanded of them for whom they held the place; and was answered, for him that should be king of Tunis, where every thing was in commotion, and in great expectation of Afrashid, whose brother Hassan was become detestable to his subjects, on account of his cruelties and oppressions. When Hassan heard this, he immediately came down from

(A) This prince, we are told (1), did boast himself to the emperor to have been the thirty-fifth king of his family, who had reigned successively in Tunis during the space of 450 years, and to have been descended from Melchior, one of the three Magi, or wise men, who came to pay their adoration to the new-born son of God at Bethlehem (2). He bore in his escutcheon a lance between two swords, with their points upwards, and three crescents over them; above them a crown, and over the crown a star. This coat of arms, our author tells us, Muley Mahmed, the son of this Hassan at Palermo, had upon the sword he then wore (3).

But, adds he, African writers, on the contrary, derive their genealogy from the Hentetæ, which were a branch of the descendants of Muamuda (4); whilst others affirm them to be descended from Omar, the second Khalif (5). However that be, with respect to their pedigree, we have seen, that these kings of Tunis have carried their conquests as far as Sicily, and reigned a considerable time in that island (6). Afterwards they became tributary to the Normans, upon the declension of the Arabian empire, and to the French, under the reign of Charles, then king of Sicily; who, upon the death of his brother Lewis, since sainted, came to the assistance of the Christians, and obliged the Tunefian king to become tributary to him.

the castle, in order to speak for himself; but met such a rough reception from the inhabitants as quite disconcerted and terrified him; so that he immediately fled out of the city, without so much as daring to go back to his palace, where all his cash, jewels, and other treasure were kept. He even told us afterwards, says our author<sup>1</sup>, that, upon his coming down from the castle, he had laid up 200 diamond rings, of inestimable value, in a purse of red velvet; but that his surprise was so great, that, upon his getting out of his bed-chamber to go and harangue with his tumultuous subjects, he quite forgot to take it with him.

HASSAN was no sooner got out of Tunis in that dismal plight, than the governor and chief officers of the castle, who made no doubt but that Afrashid was in the Turkish fleet, released his wife and son out of confinement, arrayed them in princely apparel, and paid them the same respect as if he had been in possession of the crown. They likewise sent a couple of fine horses, richly clad, to Goletta; the one for him, and the other for Barbarossa, to make their entry into Tunis, and with them several chiefs of the army, to assure them, that that capital was wholly at their devotion. This notion, which had been artfully spread among the Tunefians by the subtle Barbarossa, had so thoroughly possessed their minds, that, upon his entering the suburbs and city, at the head of his 9000 Turks, which he had transported thither in sixty royal galleys, he was received with the loudest acclamations; and, having paid his first devotions at one of their mosks, marched directly to the castle, amidst an innumerable croud of people. But how great was their surprise, when, instead of Afrashid, they heard him mention no other name but that of Solyman and his own; and how much greater their resentment, when they were apprised, that their so much wished-for prince was still detained a prisoner at Constantinople. They tumultuously assembled themselves in arms, under the command of their Mezouar; and, whilst some were dispatched after Hassan to bring him back, to deliver them from the Turkish impending tyranny, the rest began to assault the traitorous Barbarossa in the castle; but these were soon after dispersed with loss by a general discharge, which he ordered his musketry to make upon them; upon which they were easily brought to acknowledge the Grand Signor for their sovereign, and him for his viceroy. The next step he took to keep them under, was to enter into an immediate alliance with the Arabs; and, by their assistance, to make himself master of Kayrwan and other places, which city he strongly garrisoned with his Turks. After which he caused the canal of the Goletta, which communicates with the sea, to be made wider, in order to enlarge the port; in which work the Christian slaves were employed<sup>2</sup>. As for the fugitive Hassan, he found no better resource than to retreat among some of the neighbouring Arabs, that were still his friends; with whom he stayed still he was reinthroned by the emperor Charles V. to whom he applied for assistance against Barbarossa<sup>3</sup>. This was, however, a dangerous expedient; his applying to a Christian emperor for assistance was an action that could not but render him still more odious, not only to his own subjects, but likewise to all the Mohammedan princes; and much more so, as he could not regain his crown on any other terms than by his becoming a tributary to that monarch. But his case was by that time become too desperate to permit him to be deterred by any such considerations, or to listen to any thing but the motives of revenge, as well on his own faithless subjects, as on the treacherous Barbarossa and the Porte. So that his favourite renegado, by nation a Genoese, no sooner undertook to negotiate that affair with the emperor, than he dispatched him over to his court with the proposal, which was no less readily agreed to there. And it was no wonder it should be so, considering what an additional strength the annexing of this viceroyship to that of Algiers would afford to that pirate, already so formidable at sea, and on all the Mediterranean coasts, to say nothing of the advantage that would accrue to him by that kingdom's becoming tributary to him. Accordingly, Charles the fifth was easily determined, not only to undertake so advantageous an expedition, but even to put himself at the head of it, and to command it in person.

Hassan applies to the emperor Charles V. for assistance;

BUT though it was concerted and carried on with all possible secrecy, and the proper shipping got ready in the ports of Naples, Sicily, Genoa, and Spain, with no less expedition, yet Barbarossa had such speedy notice given him of it by a Florentine priest, who was then bound for Constantinople, and charged with some important affairs relating to the French court, that he had time enough to apprise the Porte of it, and acquaint it with the imminent danger he was in of losing not only his fleet, but all his conquests in Barbary, if not speedily succoured. He was, however, disappointed of his hopes from that quarter; the Grand Signor being then fully employed with all his forces in Asia, and his ministers at Constantinople either unable or negligent to send him any supplies of men or ships; yet this dangerous situation did not discourage him from making a brave defence: and, since he could not fortify the city of Tunis so well as he could have wished, by reason of the several eminences that commanded

- a it on the west side, nor dared to demolish the suburbs, which are one of its chiefs ornaments, for fear of disobliging the Tunefians, he set himself immediately to fortify the Goletta, which was at that time little more than a square tower, and seemed only designed to command the mouth of the canal, by which the sea enters into the lake that fronts the town<sup>a</sup>. He not only added some strong out-works to it, but threw a stout Turkish garrison into it, and furnished it with every thing necessary for its defence: after this he sent to invite all the Moors and Arabs to his aid, and remonstrated to them, that this was a common cause, in which they were all equally concerned; inasmuch as the loss of Tunis would not only endanger that of all Barbary, but much more so, as it would reduce all the states under a Christian yoke, and prove of the most dangerous consequence to the Mohammedan religion.
- b This last consideration alone would have been sufficient to alarm all the Mohammedan princes against the apostate Hassan, and his powerful ally; the former of whom he had in vain endeavoured to get into his hands dead or alive. This circular letter had the desired effect, and brought to his assistance most of the Levantine corsairs, and armed the Moorish and African princes against the league.

His next care was to cause a stout thick wall to be built quite from the sea side to the water tower, and from thence, by winding about towards the lake, formed a kind of bulwark, with proper embrasures, which faced every side. He likewise built over the canal a spacious bridge, within side of that cincture; and, on a spot of ground between the sea and the Goletta, he caused a rampart to be reared, which had a full view of all that coast, and defended the twelve gallies that were left out, whilst all the rest of the shipping was secured within the canal, or in the lake; and both could play their artillery on the enemy as occasion required. All these, and other precautions for a defence, with regard to the out-works, being taken, as far as the shortness of the time would permit, he took care to fill this new cincture with a sufficient number of forces. He threw into it 7000 fighting men, 4000 of whom were either Turks or renegadoes, 2000 were Tunefian Moors, many of whom were persons of rank and distinction, and 1000 were chosen from among the stoutest Janisfaries; all of whom he provided with plenty of artillery, arms, and other ammunition and provisions, which were supplied to them by the vessels that kept still going and coming to and from Tunis. After which he sat himself down, fully determined to wait the arrival of the enemy, with an intrepid resolution, answerable to his character<sup>b</sup> and situation.

- d On the other side, Charles V. having got intelligence of the preparations he had made for his reception, ordered his whole navy, amounting to 1400 ships of all sorts<sup>c</sup>, and amongst them ninety royal gallies, to set sail with all possible expedition for the Tunefian coasts. They soon reached the Cape of Carthage, which having doubled, they sent to reconnoitre the Goletta; near which they landed their numerous forces without any opposition.

BARBAROSSA, nothing dismayed at their number and strength, nor at their first successes in taking and plundering several of the neighbouring villages, whence they carried off some quantities of corn, oil, and other provisions, first of all assembled the Arabian chiefs, and exacted the usual oath of fidelity from them: for, besides 15,000 of them which he kept in his pay, great numbers of others were come to list under his banner, not only as he allowed them a better pay, but out of hatred to Hassan and the Christian forces; to them he joined some Turkish horse and foot, which he drew out of Tunis, and sent them to scour the country, and to annoy the Christian camp by their skirmishes, whilst they were laying siege to the city.

- THESE frequent excursions did not, however, hinder its being carried on with great vigour, though with various success. But we hope it will not be expected that we should, in a work of this nature, enter into a particular detail of it, which would carry us beyond our bounds; and that it will suffice our readers to tell them in general, that it was concerted and executed with all the regularity and advantage that the situation of the place would allow; the emperor having taken sufficient care to furnish himself with the expertest engineers and the most consummate commanders, as well as to supply his camp, not only with all that was necessary to carry on the war, but with every thing that could render it easy and convenient for his numerous army; insomuch that the streets of his camp afforded as great plenty and variety of all sorts of provisions, and well-stored markets, as any city in Europe; for, besides the great number of storeships which were ordered to accompany this expedition, they had frigates and other vessels constantly coming in, laden with wines, corn, and other provisions, from Naples, Sardinia, Sicily, Majorca, and Minorca; besides which, they were likewise abundantly supplied with fresh water from the adjacent springs; insomuch that Muley Hassan, upon his first arrival at the camp, was beyond measure astonished at the grandeur and plenty that reigned in it, so vastly exceeding all that he, tho' a great and magnificent prince, had ever beheld till then.

BARBAROSSA, on his side, after having made the best preparations, as we have seen a little above, for a brave defence, shewed himself on this occasion to be as expert and able an engineer and commander at land, as he had formerly been at sea, where he was become formidable to all Europe: but his success did not prove the same, though his troops behaved with unusual bravery; for the approaches of the besiegers were no sooner completed, than all the royal galleys, whose cannon could reach the fort, were properly disposed on the sea, and batteries of forty-six guns opened against it on the land side; both which plied it with such continual fire, that several wide breaches were quickly made for an assault (B). It was carried on with no less fury, notwithstanding the noble defence which was made from within; and, after a desperate resistance on both sides, the imperial army carried the fort, not without a considerable loss <sup>P</sup>.

The garrison retreats.

THE garrison, seeing itself overpowered, made their retreat in as good order as they could; 4000 of them took the way to Tunis, through a tract that had been marked for them by posts set into the ground along the shallows; 2000 others, crossing over the canal, and breaking the bridge which Barbarossa had laid over it, filed off towards Arades, but suffered pretty much from the enemy in their rear before they could reach the place <sup>Q</sup>.

THERE remained only about 150 Turks in the Goletta, who were left there to set fire to some mines, and blow up the enemy upon their entering the place; but the Spaniards made such speed to get into it, that they prevented, in a great measure, the dreadful effects of the powder. One Turk did, indeed, set fire to two barrels of it, which threw up the upper story of the tower, and shattered the walls of it in several places. Upon which Don Diego de Mendoza rushed in at the gate through the smoke and rubbish, followed by about twenty of his men, and drove the Turks before them. He had not gone far before another barrel was fired, which burned his hand and side, and wounded some of his men; notwithstanding which, the rest of his men coming in to his assistance with sword in hand, they made themselves a bloody way through the Turks, and soon set up the imperial standard on the top of the tower.

Charles V. enters the place.

THE emperor, now master of the Goletta, entered the place, attended by the Infant Don Lewis, Hassan the Tunesian king, and a numerous retinue of his officers; and, upon his approaching the gate, turned himself to Hassan, and told him, that that was the gate thro' which he should quickly re-enter into the possession of his new kingdom. To which the king answered, with an humble low bow, and thanked his imperial majesty for so signal a favour. Barbarossa lost on this occasion 300 brass cannon, besides a number of others of cast iron, 87 ships, 42 of which were royal galleys, and about a dozen Christian merchantmen, which that corsair had formerly made prizes of. The number of his slain on that day amounted to above 1500 Turks and Moors, besides those killed and wounded in their retreat to Tunis and Arades, and on the lake. The Christians found here likewise an immense

(B) There were three batteries raised against the fort, the most considerable of which battered the new bastion with 24 pieces towards the sea side, between that and the Goletta, and fired sometimes against the tower and the new raised wall, as occasion required. About 100 paces farther was another battery of six guns, which kept playing likewise against the wall; and, on the right hand of this, was another battery of ten to batter down the rampart, which the Turks had built between the wall and the lake.

Besides these land batteries, Andrew Doria was making a constant fire against the place from his galleys, which he sent one after another before it; and one had no sooner fired all its guns than it was succeeded by another; whilst the grand caraca, belonging to the knights of Malta, which was higher than all the rest, was posted behind them all, and easily discharged its large artillery over them with such fury and efficacy, that it dismounted all the guns that were in the tower.

The Maltese commanders strove to distinguish themselves more than all the rest upon this occasion. Among them the commodore Botigale, observing that some of the galleys, for fear of running aground, kept their oars above water, hasted to them sword in hand; Ye cowardly wretches, said he to the officers, must the saving of the carcases of a few galleys obstruct our success in so glorious an enterprize? and made them immediately apply their oars, and approach nearer to the tower.

But the boldest action of all was that of Signor Conversa, another Maltese knight, who caused a barcalonga, with a good number of musketeers, to row to the very foot of the tower, from which he kept continually firing against the Turks that appeared on the breaches; and, whilst one side was charging, he artfully tacked about and caused the other to be discharged; by which constant play he killed a vast number of Turks, without receiving any damage from the tower's fire (7). This may serve to shew how eager the Christians were of carrying that important place, and how impossible it was for Barbarossa to preserve it, or for his new works, the most part of which were left unfinished, to hold out against such a constant fire from so many different batteries, that the besiegers had hardly time to repair one single breach. But the Christians paid dear for it, when they came to take it by assault; which, though it lasted but one hour, was no less bloody than violent; and in which the knights of Malta, who always challenge the post of honour, met with such a furious opposition from the Turks, that, besides a great number of them that were killed on the spot, there scarce came off one without being wounded (8).

- a quantity of fire arms, swords, ammunition, and other warlike stores; that being the arsenal in which Barbarossa kept all his arms and piratical spoils, as it was till then reckoned impregnable<sup>a</sup>.

IMMEDIATELY after the taking of this fortress, the only one that Tunis had for its defence, Hassan, to his great mortification and grief, found the emperor's council much divided, whether they should proceed with the siege of that capital or return homewards. Those who were for the latter alleged, that Barbarossa, being quite stripped of his navy and chief fortresses in that kingdom, would soon be forced to return to Algiers, and Hassan's subjects to their obedience; so that they had actually completed what they came for. The emperor was quickly apprised of this by the Infant his son, who was altogether for continuing the war; and, having convoked them into his tent, after a mild rebuke to those who opposed it, solemnly declared to them, that he was not come so far merely to seize upon the Goletta and the piratical ships, but to restore the dispossessed king of Tunis to his dominions, and to deliver above 20,000 Christians from slavery, who expected their liberty from him; and concluded with telling them, that he was determined either to acquit himself with honour of that enterprize, or die in the attempt. Upon which it was resolved, that the fortifications of the Goletta should be reduced into a narrower compass, and that a garrison of 1000 men should be put into it; and admiral Doria was ordered to cruise along the coasts with his fleet, and the soldiery to be furnished with a sufficient quantity of provisions; the whole army began to march in battle array towards Tunis, on the 20th of July, by the road that lies between the olive wood and the lake.

- BARBAROSSA was soon apprised of their march; and, though he foresaw plainly enough that the loss of the Goletta and of his fleet would be followed by that of Tunis, and of the whole kingdom, yet, like a politic commander, he resolved to defend that capital to the last, in hopes of some favourable change. With this view he made his Arabian chiefs take a fresh oath to him; but in that very night he assembled all his Turkish officers at his palace, and acquainted them with the great danger he was in, not only from the Christian army, but likewise from his Arabian troops, and still more so from the Tunefians; and proposed to them the method he had pitched upon to free himself from it; which was to blow up all the Christian slaves, in number about 7000, and to betake themselves to immediate flight.
- d This design was happily disapproved by some brave corsairs, not only on account of the odiousness of such a barbarous action, but likewise for the loss of so many useful hands. Upon which it was resolved, that they should provide for their own safety for that night, and early on the morrow march out of the city, at the head of all their forces, Moors and Arabs, as well as Turks. The Tunefians were no less glad at their departure; among whom Hassan, their king, had found means to disperse a number of bills, advising them to drive the tyrannical Turks out of their city, and to receive in their stead their lawful prince; which artifice had greatly increased the ever-mistrustful Barbarossa and his Turks diffidence and fears of them. They marched only about three miles from the city, and encamped on a plain called Cazar-mexevi, which is full of orchards and fresh springs, where he disposed his army in battle array, in the most advantageous manner to oppose the enemy.

- THE Spanish historians, to exaggerate the glory of their monarch, made his army to have consisted of no less than 90,000 fighting men; but we shall leave it to the reader to judge, from the success of their actions, whether it could be really so numerous; seeing all other Christian writers agree, that he lost no more in that defeat than 300, and the emperor only eighteen men<sup>c</sup>. However that be, the two armies quickly came to an engagement; in which the Arabs, who were ordered to attack the enemy on all sides, presented themselves with their wonted eagerness (Barbarossa having before-hand raised their expectation of the immense plunder they should find in the Christian camp, in order to secure them to his interest), and fell upon them with the greatest fury, and with their wonted outcries: but they had no sooner heard the roaring thunder of the Christian artillery, and stood the first discharge of their musketeers, than they betook themselves to flight, with even greater haste than they had shewn on the onset; nor could any promises or menaces prevail upon them to return any more to the charge (C).

THE misfortune was, that the Christian army was quite spent with excessive heat and thirst, and the Turks still kept possession of the water springs; so that it was difficult to

(C) These stout warriors, in order to ingratiate themselves to the emperor and the king of Tunis, made afterwards a great piece of merit of this their precipitate flight; pretending, that it was done in order to intimidate the Moors and Tunefians from exerting themselves, as they would probably have done, had they stood their ground. But, though this was looked upon as an artful pretence to excuse their cowardice, yet it is more than probable that it greatly contributed to that general defection that ensued soon after, and was so far of single service to the Christians (9).

keep them from straggling to the lake to quench it. At length, after several fresh onsets on both sides, the Turks began to give way, leaving seven pieces of artillery behind them; soon after which the Christians got possession of the springs, and regained their spirits so far, that Barbarossa, who was every where trying in vain to rally his scattered troops, was forced to follow after his own run-a-ways; and, on their part, Moors as well as Tunefians, made much greater speed to get into the city than they had done to come out of it.

At their arrival, Barbarossa, instead of reproving his troops for their baseness, contented himself with calmly telling them, that he designed by the next morning to try their courage once more against the Christians; but this he only did the better to conceal his premeditated flight, which he now found dangerous to disclose even to his own Turks. His design was soon discovered by the dispatch he endeavoured to make to get all his treasure out of the castle, as well as by the secret direction he gave to have all the Christian slaves blown up, though none of his creatures proved inhuman enough to execute that bloody order. He had at that time a Maltese commander, named Paul Simoni, among his captives, who had formerly behaved so gallantly against the Turks, that he would never suffer him to be redeemed or exchanged at any price. This gentleman, having some suspicion or intelligence of his horrid design, found means to bribe two of his renegado jailors to procure them some files and hammers, by the help of which they soon got off their fetters and those of their companions: after which, forcing open the doors of the castle armory, they furnished themselves with what weapons came first to their hands, and cut in pieces all the Turks they found in the castle, and placed a strong guard at every avenue of it. Whilst this was doing, Simoni appeared on the battlements with the white banner, and invited the Christian army to come to their assistance. The unusual noise and uproar soon brought Barbarossa thither, who commanded the gates to be immediately opened to him; but finding his orders only answered by the musket-shot, and volleys of stones, which the slaves discharged against him, cried out in a rage, I am undone; these Christian dogs have got possession of the castle, and of all my treasures. And, without staying longer, he went and gathered to him what Turks he could get, and fled away with all speed; so that, before Charles V. could get the news of this revolution, he was got safe to the city of Bona<sup>u</sup>.

SIMONI was the first who sent the emperor notice of it, as soon as he heard that Barbarossa had fled from the city, and was also the first who presented himself to him, upon his entering the city, at the head of 6,000 slaves, his companions. The sight of whom was so agreeable to that monarch, that he tenderly embraced the Maltese knight, with these words, My dear friend, blessed for ever be that noble resolution which enabled you to break off your fetters, to facilitate my conquest, and increase the glory of the Maltese order. The brave Simoni was soon after dismissed, with all possible tokens of esteem and friendship, to his noble brotherhood of Malta, and met with a reception suitable to his merit. But the joy that reigned in the camp of the Christians was soon after damped, by the horrid outrages and cruelties which the emperor's troops committed on the unfortunate Tunefians of both sexes. The men were tortured all manner of ways, to oblige them to discover their hidden wealth, and the women, especially the young ones, were exposed to the assaults of every lustful ravisher, and were even torn from their mothers arms, by those very officers who should have protected them from the insults of the soldiery; so that neither sex, age, nor rank, were exempted from their brutalities. Hassan made in vain the most pressing application to the emperor, to suppress those cruel disorders, at least in appearance; for he knew that his subjects had cause to hate him, not only for his former tyranny, but much more for his calling a Christian army to his assistance, and bring them and himself under a foreign yoke (E);

(E) A most remarkable instance of this singular hatred, we are told, was given to him, on this occasion, by a young beautiful damsel of distinction, named Aysa, whom he met by chance in the street, as she was led away captive, and bound, by a Spanish officer. Hassan, whether struck with pity, or, perhaps, with some still more lively passion, immediately offered to redeem her at any rate; but she, changing her grief into resentment, spit in his face, with these words; "Be gone, wicked and perfidious wretch, who, to regain a kingdom which did not belong to thee, has most shamefully betrayed thy nation and country." The king, however, without expressing any resentment at her repulse, offered the officer some very considerable sums for her ransom; when she, becoming more outrageous, bid him begone a second time, telling him, that she scorned to owe her freedom to a tyrant (10).

Marmol confirms likewise what we have said of his revengeful temper; for, when the emperor told him that he had promised to his troops the plundering of the city, and asked him, whether there was any quarter, streets, or houses, he would wish to be spared, he readily answered in the negative, and added, that there was not one subject in it that he had not cause to be displeased with; from which it plainly appears, that he then regarded his revenge more than his interest. But he was soon after obliged to alter his tone, when he found that his soldiers, especially his German troops, massacred all they came at without distinction, out of a notion that was spread among them, that he had obtained a promise from the emperor, that none of the inhabitants should be made slaves, for he then applied afresh to him, and begged that the soldiers might be contented with the plunder, and that the citizens might be made prisoners of war, which was granted to him, and an end, though late, was put to their horrid butchery (11).

<sup>a</sup> and, being naturally haughty and vindictive, might take a secret pleasure in their distress and misery. However that be, it is reckoned that near 200,000 of them either perished or were made slaves, besides those myriads whom the soldiers sacrificed to their fury; many more, seeking to save their lives by fleeing into the adjacent deserts, were destroyed by the excessive heat and thirst, and every kind of want and misery; and those of both sexes, that were reduced to a dreadful slavery, amounted to above 40,000.

<sup>b</sup> CHARLES V. now master of Tunis, resettled Muley Hassan on his throne, but it was on condition that he should become tributary to him; and, as a pledge of it, kept the fort of Goletta in his hands, the fortifications of which he ordered to be repaired, and new ones to be added to them, and obliged Hassan to pay the garrison which he left in it, and to send prince Mohammed, one of his sons, thither, with some officers of his court, as hostages of his vassalage (F). He designed likewise, before he left Africa, to have laid siege to Mehedia, a sea-port in the kingdom of Fez, but was prevented by a sudden storm, which so shattered his fleet, that it was not without the greatest danger and difficulty that he reached the port of Trapano in Sicily <sup>Hassan restored to his throne.</sup>.

<sup>c</sup> MULEY HASSAN, being now become more odious than ever, not only on account of the late cruelties committed by the Christians in his metropolis, but much more for his vassalage to and alliance with them, found less quiet in his kingdom since his restoration than he had before. The emperor had left with him 200 of his soldiers, to be a guard both to his person and castle, but had the frequent mortification to hear of some of his cities which revolted from him, and either erected themselves into little commonwealths, or put themselves under the protection of the Turks. Barbarossa, who was gone from Bona to Algiers, with a resolution to raise a powerful army and fleet against him, quickly returned with them, and made himself master of several considerable places; whilst, by the assistance of Andrea Doria, Hassan had reduced several others to their allegiance. But that admiral was too politic to act against the Algerine viceroy, who, though the most dangerous enemy that the emperor had among all the Turks, yet he thought it more prudent to let him escape in the Adriatic <sup>Many cities revolt from him.</sup>, when he had it in his power, and was strongly solicited, to have defeated him there; a politic maxim, too common among commanders of all nations, not totally to overthrow an enemy, though a rival, who gives them such an opportunity to display their talents and capacity. But whilst Hassan and he were consulting about the means of suppressing Barbarossa's conquests upon him, one of which was the port of Susa, which was revolted from him, and on the point of falling into his enemy's hands, it was agreed, that he should apply to the grand master of Malta to assist him in reducing that important port, and others which had been already taken from him. He sent accordingly an ambassador, named Camuchi, or Camugi, to represent to him the danger he was in from the advantages which the Turks were still gaining over him. The grand master, who considered that matter as more immediately concerning the emperor than his order, failed not to acquaint him with it, as that prince was now his vassal and tributary. The emperor sent forthwith orders to his viceroy of Sicily to send him all the assistance he could; but this last was, though ready and free with his promises, yet so slow in his performance, that, being at last quite out of patience with his untoward subjects, and weary of waiting for the promised succour, he resolved once more to go and solicit it in person <sup>Hassan applies to the Maltese for aid.</sup>.

<sup>d</sup> But whilst he staid in Sicily, and was consulting with the viceroy about the most effectual means of suppressing the overgrown power of Barbarossa, his ill fortune raised him a more powerful and dangerous enemy at home, of whom he had not the least mistrust. This was his own eldest son Muley Humida, who, at the instigation of a great favourite, named Mahmed, whose father Hassan had put to death, took the most effectual means to dethrone him, during his absence. To this end he began with complaining, that his unhappy father was gone over to the emperor, with a design to turn Christian, and to concert with him about depriving him of the succession, whom he knew to be an enemy to Christianity, and

(F) By the same treaty, Muley Hassan was tied to several other articles, the principal of which were those that follow:

1. That all Christian captives, of whatsoever nation, should be released without any ransom.
2. That Christians should have a free commerce throughout the whole kingdom.
3. That they should be allowed to settle in it, to build churches and monasteries, and enjoy the free exercise of their religion.
4. That no corsair, Turk, or Moor, should be allowed to come to any sea-port, be furnished with any provisions, or be assisted or favoured in any case, by the Tunefians.

5. That the Goletta should appertain to the emperor, and his successors, for ever; and that Hassan, and his successors, should pay 12,000 golden crowns yearly, for the maintenance of its garrison.

6. That the whole coral fishery should belong to the emperor, and his heirs, for ever.

7. That the kings of Tunis should hold themselves vassals and dependants on the crown of Spain, and send thither yearly, in token of it, six horses and twelve falcons; in consideration of which they should be intitled to the protection of that crown, &c. (12). All which were equally grating to the Mohammedan powers.

to setting the crown on his next brother Mohammed, who had betrayed a great propensity a to it. After this he caused several false rumours to be spread, the one, that being seized with some dangerous disease at Naples, he had desired to be baptized before he died. Another report went current, that he had been taken by the Turks, and carried prisoner to Constantinople, where he would either be put to death, or imprisoned for life, on account of his apostacy. As his father was so ill-beloved at Tunis, these rumours were readily believed; and the prince made no difficulty to come into the city, and take possession of the royal palace. He met there, however, an unexpected repulse from the old governor, who sharply rebuked him for his so easily crediting such ill news, and being in such haste to get into his father's throne, for which he would be quickly called to a severe account. Hamida, confounded at his repulse, retired to a pleasure-house he had a few miles out of Tunis; upon b which the old governor went in a vessel to the Goletta, to inquire after the king's health; and, being assured, that he was still at Naples, and in perfect health, returned immediately to the city, and took the most effectual means to suppress all these false reports.

But this was so far from silencing those reports, that it rather spurred the prince and his favourite to propagate and aver them the more openly. Nothing they pretended was more certain than the king's death, and his dying a Christian; and the old governor, who was in prince Mohammed's interest, went to the Goletta, where he was kept hostage, as was hinted before, to concert with him, and the Spanish governor, about the proper means of having him crowned, in prejudice of Hamida; adding, that the Tunefians would soon see him come from thence, at the head of his Spanish auxiliaries, if they did not prevent it before it was c too late. The boldness with which these things were affirmed, failed not to give them a sanction among the people, ever greedy of a change; and the danger of having a Christian king forced over them, for such young Mohammed was now believed, soon alarmed the whole populace, and Hamida was sent for, with all speed, to come to protect them from it. They found him in his garden, overwhelmed with dread and grief at the dangerous and unpardonable step which his favourite had persuaded him to take. He was quickly awaked, however, from his melancholy fears by the shouts of the people, who were sent to fetch him, and hastened with them to Tunis, where, being joined by the rest of the populace, he went at their head directly to the castle, caused the old governor to be murdered, with several others of his father's faithful friends, and, Abfalom like, forced the most beloved of d Hassan's wives into his incestuous embraces.

The news of this unnatural rebellion soon reached the unfortunate Hassan, who, to prevent his son's entering into some strict alliance with Barbarossa, made all possible haste to reach his own capital. He had about 2,000 Italians with him, which the viceroy had given him leave to enlist among the banditti, and other outlaws, in the neighbourhood of Naples, and landed with them at the Goletta, whence he was advised by the governor not to stir, till he was well apprised of the strength of his rebellious son, and the disposition of his subjects. But he, thinking that Hamida would never have the boldness to face him, marched directly to Tunis at the head of his small army. What still more determined him to hasten thither, with so weak force, was, that the treacherous Hamida had sent a party of his creatures e to meet him, not as an enemy, but as loyal subjects, who came to welcome their native prince's return to his dominions, and to assure him, that they had left his revolted son in the utmost consternation and despair; and that he seemed resolved to go and take refuge among some friendly Arabs, in the farthest parts of his dominions. Some say, that the citizens having asked Hamida whether he would submit to his father, he answered, That his father had turned Christian, and came to destroy them, and they ought all to stand in their own defence; to which they replied, if the king comes accompanied by Christian soldiers, we will die in your defence; but if he brings none but his Moorish guards, we will not consent to take up arms against him. Upon which it was agreed, that this party should go before to reconnoitre f what forces the king brought along with him. However that be, he had disposed his 500 Moors in such a manner, that they covered the Italian forces that came behind; whilst the citizens from within kept themselves up in arms, waiting the signal for which side they were to take; at length some skirmishes happened between those that were without and the king's forces, which occasioned a discovery of the 2,000 Italians; upon which the Tunefians, taking it for granted that he was turned Christian, as his son had given out, a bloody battle immediately ensued, in which his forces were greatly overpowered, not only by the Tunefians, but by some large parties of Arabs, that lay in ambush among the neighbouring olive trees; so that, after an hot engagement, in which many of his forces were slain and taken prisoners, and a much greater number ran away into the woods, and thence into the Goletta, in a sad g plight, he was surrounded by his son's forces, and brought prisoner into his capital, and there closely confined. In the morning, he sent to intreat his son to come to him, and hear what he had to say for himself, in order to come to an amicable composition with him; but Hamida absolutely refused to see him, and sent some executioners to him, who left him only a only the choice, either to lose his eyes or his life; and, as he chose the former, they immediately deprived him of his sight with a hot lancet, and left him to languish in his dungeon, loaden with chains, grief, and misery.

HAMIDA, now in peaceable possession, as he thought, of the Tunesian throne, turned his troops against Bizerta, one of those towns in which Barbarossa had thrown a Turkish garrison; but, whilst he was busy in reducing that important place, the viceroy of Naples, apprised of Hassan's defeat, had sent him a fresh supply of 1,500 Spanish troops, under the command of Alonzo Bivas, which landed at the Goletta, together with some Arabs, and other allies; upon which the governor of it sent Abdulmelech, Hassan's brother, in a disguise into Tunis, accompanied by Abdulmelech several of his friends, who easily dispersed themselves into several parts of the city, it being fixes on the throne; then a holiday, in which the Tunesians made great rejoicings; and, being thoughtless of any danger, and these coming on the sudden in arms to the castle-gate, killed the guards, and made themselves masters of it. Abdulmelech immediately seized upon the young Said, Hamida's son, and caused his eyes to be put out, and himself to be proclaimed king. He had not enjoyed that title much above a month, during which he took care to send 6,000 ducats to the garrison of Goletta, pursuant to the old treaty, before he was taken ill of some dangerous distemper; upon which he released his brother Hassan, and sent him back his wives and concubines, which his unnatural son had seized upon, and forced to his bed, and which, for that reason, he refused to admit any more into his own, but sent them back to their respective parents and relations. Abdulmelech died about a fortnight after, during whose sickness dies soon after; his servants stripped him of his best furniture, and kept him so close a prisoner, that, every time the door of his chamber was opened, he expected they were going to assassinate him.

As soon as he was dead, the Tunesians chose Muley Mohammed, Hassan's son, then an hostage at Goletta, for their king; but Francesco Touar, the governor of the fort, refused to release him, and set up one of Abdulmelech's sons, named also Mohammed, upon the throne, who was received with great applause, but reigned only four months. In the mean time Muley Hassan ventured to go to the Goletta, probably to expostulate with the governor, but was sent by him to the small island of Tabarca, which lies on the coasts between Bona and Carthage, whence he passed afterwards to Sardinia, Naples, Rome, and last of all to the emperor, then at Ausburgh, who gave him a kind reception, and seemed to pity him much, but bad him hope for better times (H).

ALL this while the treacherous Hamida, being denied admittance into his capital, and other towns of the realm, wandered about from court to court, among the Moorish and Arabian chiefs, to beg their assistance. At length the Tunesians, who were by that time dissatisfied with Mohammed's government, sent to invite him back. Hamida accordingly Hamida recalled embarked, with such friends as he had with him, in a corsair vessel, and landed soon after at Monasteer. Thence he got to some of his Arabian friends, from whom he obtained some reinforcement, with which he entered so unexpectedly into Tunis, that the young king had scarcely time to save himself in the Goletta. Hamida no sooner saw himself master of the city and castle, than he caused all those that had been in the opposite interest to be put to the most cruel deaths; some of the principal of whom he caused to be thrown to, and to be devoured alive by, dogs. After this he quietly enjoyed the kingdom till the year 1570, when his metropolis was betrayed by some of the inhabitants, into the hands of the famed Ocbali, or Hali, then Basha of Algiers; since which time both that, and the whole kingdom, have remained in the possession of the Turks, as we have already hinted in the foregoing chapter<sup>b</sup>.

BUT to return to the unfortunate Hassan; he still remained in some of the emperor's dominions, till that monarch had raised that powerful armament, which sailed soon after into Africa, in order to dispossess Barbarossa, and other Turkish corsairs, of those places which

(H) This was, indeed, a poor comfort and recompence for the loss of his eyes and kingdom; and, tho' the only one he ever received from that monarch, was still thought greater than he deserved, for his servile submission and attachment to a Christian prince. But there were two other circumstances, which no less aggravated his misfortune, than it did the Spanish ingratitude. The one was the governor of Goletta's depriving his son of the succession, and keeping him still an hostage, or rather prisoner, when he might have set him upon the throne, with the common consent and approbation of the Tunesians. The other was, his wronging him of a great part of his cash, jewels, and other valuable things, which he had intrusted to his keeping, upon his passing into Europe to go to Naples, and which he now refused to restore to him in his greatest distress.

How far that minister acted of his own accord in both these instances, we shall leave to the reader to guess from the sequel. Marmol, notwithstanding his usual partiality for the Spaniards, owns, that the unfortunate prince made bitter complaints to his imperial majesty against his governor, yet doth not mention any rebuke being given him for what he had done, nor any other redress granted to the sufferer; but only says in general, that the emperor pitied him, and ordered that he should be supplied with every thing he stood in need of, till better times, which never came; for both master and minister not only suffered his unnatural and perfidious son to usurp his father's throne without molestation, but even assisted him against his two chief enemies Hayradin Barbarossa, and his favourite Dragut (13).

they had made themselves masters of along the coasts of Barbary. In this expedition he had taken care to engage the Pope, the Genoese, Venetians, and the Maltese; who were all to furnish their several quotas of ships, men, and ammunition, to join that large fleet, which he had ordered to be equipt in his several ports of Spain, Naples, and Sicily; all which made up a most powerful force, and was commanded by the great Genoese admiral Doria, and some of the most experienced officers of sea and land, both from the isle of Malta, Spain, and Italy, which threw all the piratic crew into the greatest consternation, put them upon the most expeditious means of defence, and obliged them to apply to the Porte for fresh assistance. This armada was to begin with dislodging the famed corsair Dragut out of several sea-ports on the Tunesian coasts, of which he had made himself master, and which were now become his arsenal, magazine, place of arms, and of his corsairs rendezvous.

BUT, before we proceed farther with the other exploits of that celebrated pirate, our readers will not perhaps be displeased, if we give them some previous account of his original, and most surprizing rise and character. He was born in a small village of Natolia, situate over against the isle of Rhodes, of mean Mohammedan parents, who lived by the tillage and product of a small spot of ground. Dragut was soon weary of their way of living, and lifted himself at the age of twelve years, under an officer of artillery, belonging to the Grand Signor's galleys, as a common sailor, but soon became a most expert cannoneer under him, and served some years in that quality. At length, having gathered up some money, he bought a share in a brigantine belonging to some corsairs, and was, by his good fortune in it, enabled to be master of a small galley of his own, by which, besides the many prizes he took, he became so perfectly acquainted with all the isles and sea-ports, bays, harbours, rocks, and shelves, on all those coasts, that he was gladly received into the service of the no less famed Barbarossa, then admiral of the Turkish fleet, and the terror of all the Christian maritime states. Barbarossa was too well acquainted with his valour and merit, not to give him all possible encouragement; and, after having made him go thro' all the lower ranks, raised him to that of his lieutenant, and gave him the command of a squadron of twelve galleys.

FROM this time Dragut did not suffer a summer to pass without ranging the Christian sea-coasts, and committing some dreadful ravages on those of Naples and Sicily. Scarce a vessel could sail from Italy to Spain but became his prize; and, whenever he failed of making a sufficient number of such captures, he made himself ample amends by some descent along those coasts, and plundering whole towns and villages, and carrying the inhabitants into slavery. At length the emperor, tired with the daily complaints which were made to him of these continual depredations, sent express orders to admiral Doria at any rate to put an end to them, and to rid those seas of so dreadful an enemy. Doria accordingly equipt what ships he could get fit for his purpose, and gave the command of them to his young nephew, to give him an opportunity of signalizing himself against such a formidable enemy. The young admiral lost no time, but sailed with all expedition in quest of him, and had the good fortune to find him in a small creek, near the castle of Giralatta, on the coast of Corfica, between Calvi and Layazzo.

Doria sent against him.

DRAGUT, who knew nothing of the imperial fleet being at sea, was scarcely got into it, before he saw himself closely shut up, and furiously battered by the cannon of the castle, and the artillery of the imperial squadron. He defended himself at first with his usual bravery, but finding their fire so much superior to his own, and himself surrounded by the inhabitants of that coast, who ran in shoals to help to destroy a piratic crew, which had so often ravaged their towns and villages, he was forced at length to hang out the white flag. He tried in vain to capitulate; all that he could obtain of the young admiral was, to save his own life, with the loss of his liberty, and the surrender of himself, and all the vessels he had, at discretion, to the governor of the castle, which was accordingly complied with. What most mortified the rough old corsair was, when he and his officers were brought into the admiral's ship, to find him a mere stripling; insomuch that, unable to contain his indignation, he broke out into some indecent expressions, which procured him a severe drubbing, and occasioned his being clapt in irons as a common slave (I), and to be sent to Genoa, where he continued four years in a state of slavery, in spite of all the efforts and vast offers of Barbarossa and the Grand Signor to have him ransomed at any price. The Genoese would, in all likelihood, have kept him in that state his whole life, but were at length forced to surrender him to Hayradin Barbarossa, who had succeeded his brother at Algiers, and at the Porte as Turkish admiral<sup>b</sup>, when they saw him appear at the mouth of

(I) His expression, at the sight of the young admiral, was, "Am I then doomed, at these years, to see myself laden with fetters by a beardless effeminate youth?" but some writers add, that the term effe-

their

- a their river to demand him, at the head of an hundred gallies, to prevent their city and territory from being bombarded and ravaged by him. Dragut was accordingly released, and sent, laden with rich presents, to the old Turkish admiral<sup>c</sup>.

He was quickly reinstated by him in his former post, and put at the head of a powerful squadron, and in a condition to revenge at once his former disgrace, and the ill treatment he had received from the Genoese, during these four years. His resentment, by this time, having inspired him with a more inveterate hatred than ever against the Christians, he began to vent it at first against the kingdom of Naples. He took and plundered the castle at Lamore, and all the villages along that coast, carrying off great numbers of captives, and other valuable plunder. His next booty was a Maltese galley, which had been parted from b its squadron by a storm, and in it were found 70,000 crowns, designed to be employed in repairing the fortifications of Tripoli, which made that loss the more considerable. On the other hand, Hayradin Barbarossa, having turned over the care of his fleet to his released lieu- Hayradin Barbarossa tenant, being above 80 years of age, was then indulging himself in his old debauches at Constantinople, which he now followed to such a degree, with a number of his fairest cap- dies.
 tives, that he was found dead in his bed by the excess of them, to the great regret of Sol-tan Soleyman, who, to repair as much as possible that great loss, ordered all his corsairs to acknowledge Dragut for their commander. He did not, however, bestow on him the title of admiral, but contented himself with confirming him in the authority which Barbarossa had intrusted him with, over all the southern coasts of the Mediterranean.

- c DRAGUT, now invested with the protection and authority of the Grand Signor, thought it highly necessary, after the example of his old master, to secure some strong place of retreat for himself, his ships, arms, and captures; in consequence of which he seized on the sea-ports of Souza, or Suza, and Monasteer, which belonged to this kingdom of Tunis, and being open, and without fortifications, received indifferently all the pirates of every nation; so that they were as often under the dominion of the Turkish, Moorish, and other corsairs, as under that of their natural princes. Dragut was at that time in quiet possession of them, but easily foresaw, that he would not be able to hold them long against the superior forces of the emperor, and that he should certainly be attacked, by the next spring, by the united fleets of Naples and Sicily; he therefore cast his eye upon the port of Africa, or, as it was
 d afterwards called, Mehedia, situate between Tripoli and Tunis, and not only strong by nature, but much more by its prodigious walls, and various outworks, as well as by an old well-built citadel, furnished with artillery, and other kinds of arms and ammunition, and a most commodious and spacious harbour, sheltered from all winds, and well fenced against all attempts. Neither did these advantages discourage him from pursuing his design, but only made him alter his measures; and, as he was not in a condition of reducing it by force, Dragut seizes he resolved to attempt it by stratagem and treachery, in which he but too well succeeded, on Mehedia and by which he was enabled to do such incredible damages to the Christians on those seas, by a strata-and sea coasts, till happily dislodged from that strong bulwark by the imperial fleet.

- e But, before we come to speak of that successful transaction, the retaking, and afterwards the demolition, of that once so celebrated a city and strong fortress, it will not, we hope, That fortress be unacceptable to our reader, if we give him some account of that important place, of its illustrious repairer and enricher, and of the immense labour and cost he bestowed in the building, beautifying, adorning, and fortifying it, in order to render it, in all these respects, as well as that of its advantageous situation, equal, if not superior, to any maritime city, not only in Afric, but in the whole world.

- f AFRICA is situate in  $35^{\circ} 16'$  of north latitude, and  $27^{\circ} 21'$  of east longitude, from Paris†, and is commonly supposed to be the antient Adrumetum of the Romans, but had undergone sundry vicissitudes since their time, and was run into utter decay and ruins, when Mehedi, the schismatic Khalif of Kayrwan, rebuilt and fortified it, and called it by his own name Mehedia. It is built on a kind of peninsula, sallying out of a point of land into the sea, about four leagues east of Tobulba; and, at the time of its being besieged by Charles Vth's forces, was encompassed about with thick stout walls, and flanked with strong towers, and other outworks, being surrounded on all sides by the sea, except a narrow slip, or neck of land, of about three hundred and fifty paces in breadth, which joins it to the continent. This space was occupied by a strong castle built within the wall, which was solid rock, up as high as the plinth, and forty feet thick, together with six towers at proper distances, and solid like the wall, and projected another forty feet outwardly, as far as the barbican of the ravelin. Above the castle were two other walls, the one answering to the town, and the other to the country, within which, and the void space between the towers, g were the governor's apartment and the soldiers barracks. The four middle towers were of a square, and the two others, which were washed by the sea, of a round figure, and of a considerable height; every one of them had little doors, covered over with flatted iron, and so low, that one could not go in or out of them without stooping; so that each tower was a separate fortress. In the second square tower, towards the east, was the principal gate, there being none towards the land side. a

THIS gate, as hath been elsewhere hinted, ran under the tower, through a long, dark, roofed, avenue, in which were six double doors in a direct line, and covered with plated iron, the inner one of which, as one came into the city, were of flat iron bars, nailed to each other crossways by strong nails of the same metal, without any timber; each of these doors had a lion in relief cast in brass, and so placed, as if looking at each other. The doors were not flat, but somewhat bending outward, and had each their iron portcullisses and retreats, which slid down from the top of the tower, about eight yards from the height of its wall. There was still another a little lower, which served for a false battery, and was twelve feet thick, and with nine towers so nicely disposed, that each three answered to two of those of the castle. b

THE city was 5,300 paces in circuit, and towers all around at the distance of thirty yards from each other. The arsenal faced the east, and stood near a stately mosque, contiguous to the city wall. At the end of the town, towards the north, is an eminence, on which was built a tower, which commanded the whole prospect of the sea. Within the town was an inclosed haven, which one entered into by a high arched gate, in which the galleys and other lesser vessels were shut up; for those of a larger size, there was a convenient harbour near it. Fronting the city, on the south side, ran a ridge of rising hills covered with vineyards, and bespangled with variety of pleasure houses; and, on the east side, reigned a continued verdure of gardens and orchards, which were watered by the help of some adjacent wells. Behind them were the arable lands, which ended at a ridge of high hills, running quite from east to west, on the other side of which are seen some spacious plains, abounding with excellent pasture, to which the Arabs resort in the winter, with their vast herds of cattle, for the sake of that and the several small lakes that were formed here and there on the lower grounds. c

THIS was the fine situation, beauty, and strength of Mehedia at this time; and the flourishing condition in which the Khalif above-mentioned had raised it, after it had been totally ruined by the successors of Mohammed; and, as he designed it for the place of his residence, instead of that of Kayrwan, he had been no less profuse in adorning it with the most stately edifices, than in fortifying it in the strongest manner; and, with respect to the latter, we are told by our author, that he even wished that he could surround it with walls of brass, instead of those of stone. Dragut had likewise, by this time, taken care to furnish it with all manner of arms and ammunition, and to throw into it a stout garrison, and had given the command of it to his nephew*; and in this advantageous condition was this fortress, when the emperor Charles V. formed that noble resolution to wrest it out of that pirate's hands, maugre all difficulties and discouragements, and the inability the king of Tunis was in to give him any other assistance, than that of supplying his fleet with all necessary provisions to carry on the siege. d

Hassan and his two sons follow the armada.

As soon, therefore, as every thing was got ready for that expedition, the king Muley Hassan, old and blind as he was, resolved to pass into Afric with his two sons, Muley Mohammed and Muley Bubekar, and to accompany the viceroy of Naples to that siege, fully determined, if he could recover his dominions, to take the severest revenge, not only on the perfidious Hamida, but upon all his friends and partisans. He sailed accordingly with the fleet, which soon reached the coasts of Barbary with a fair wind, where the admiral, according to the emperor's orders, landed his forces at Cape Bonajend, and seized on the fort Calibia, whence he advanced to Monasteer. Here the Turks, having sent some parties to reconnoitre them, were so vigorously attacked by the Maltese knights, at the head of a strong Spanish squadron, that they forced and pursued them quite into the town, and made themselves masters of it. The castle was next summoned to surrender, and, upon the Turkish governor's denial, was taken by assault, notwithstanding a vigorous defence, and great loss on both sides. The governor, an old corsair, was killed, and the rest of the garrison, as well as the inhabitants who had taken refuge in it, were made slaves. e

THIS quick success encouraged Doria to undertake next the siege of Mehedia, to which end he immediately wrote to the emperor for a fresh supply of ships, men, artillery, and provisions; and, whilst these were coming, went and posted himself among some islands near the place, to prevent Dragut's throwing any new reinforcement into it; all this while the viceroys of Naples and Sicily had orders to send him whatever supplies he wanted, and were getting them ready; and the latter sent Doria word, that the inhabitants of that island were so highly concerned in driving the Turkish corsairs out of that place, that he designed to come thither in person, attended with a good number of troops, provisions, and ammunition. f

- a tion. He was an old experienced officer, his name Don Juan de Vega, and the emperor had sent express orders to the admiral, not to undertake any thing of moment without him ; all which not only caused the siege to be greatly retarded, but was a great mortification to him, who plainly foresaw, that, if he quitted those islands, Dragut would not fail to send some fresh forces into the town ; yet was he forced to sail to Palermo, in order to take his directions from him, and hasten those succours which he had promised to bring. They accordingly sailed to Drepano, where they met the Neapolitan succours, which consisted of 24 gallies, and other transport ships, commanded by Don Garcias de Toledo, the young viceroy of Naples. And this was like to have occasioned another delay, that young nobleman absolutely refusing to act as subaltern, as he stiled it, to the brave Juan de Vega, and insisting upon
- b commanding his own troops. The matter was at length, with some difficulty, compromised, by a mutual agreement, that each of them should command his own forces, and that the operations of the siege should be determined by the plurality of votes of the council of war. But, during that long delay, and Doria's absence, Dragut had taken care to send into the town a plentiful reinforcement of his best troops and officers, as well as of ammunition and provisions ; whilst himself, with his fleet, were scouring the coasts, to prevent any fresh supply being brought into the Christian camp. This was the situation of both sides, when the army landed, in order to begin the siege in form ; the sight of which, and of so powerful a fleet, but especially the batteries, and other preparations, would easily have brought the magistrates and chief inhabitants, who looked upon Dragut, their tyrant, with horror, to a speedy capitulation, had not his nephew, Esse Rais, a bold and resolute soldier, whom he had left governor of it, threatened to plunge his dagger into every man's heart, one after another, that durst utter a word about capitulating, and to set fire to every quarter of the city. He then asked them, in a gentle manner, whether they could be such fools, as to expect any favour from such enemies of their religion, and whether it was not much safer, and more honourable, to venture their lives and fortunes in defence of it, especially as they were supported with such a powerful and numerous garrison, and such brave old experienced officers as he had under his command. This silenced them at once, and animated the populace to a high degree against the Christians, and prevented all farther danger of a mutiny from that quarter.
- c
- d To assure those citizens how little he feared this vast Christian army, he ordered a party of horse, and about 300 musketeers, to sally out, and take possession of a neighbouring hill, and harrafs from thence Don Garcias's camp, which was nearest to it. Against them Don Garcias soon advanced, at the head of a strong party, to dislodge them. The skirmish was hot and bloody ; but the Turks, being quickly supported by 600 Moors armed with muskets, fell so furiously upon the Neapolitans, that they and their commander would in all likelihood have been cut to pieces, had not the brave Juan de Vega sacrificed his resentment to the emperor's service, and made all possible speed to their rescue, and dispersed the enemy.
- e But he was not more successful in his first attack ; for, observing that his cannon had made what he supposed a sufficient breach in one of the outworks, he was immediately for mounting it by assault, notwithstanding his being told, by those who had been sent to view it, that it was fortified within with strong intrenchments, and filled at the bottom with iron spikes, which would infallibly occasion the destruction of the assailants. But, suspecting the report, or thinking it exaggerated by their fears, he would allow only a day or two longer to widen the breach, after which he caused it to be mounted by the Sicilians, two hours before daylight, which they did with uncommon bravery, and met their deaths in the attempt, not above one of them having escaped the sword of the enemy, and him they only spared, in order to force him to make some discovery. Neither did those, whom he sent to support them, meet with a better fate, they being all destroyed by the besiegers fire or sword, and lay in dreadful heaps one upon another, till the sounding of a retreat put an
- f end to the slaughter.
- ABOUT this time the unfortunate king of Tunis, Muley Hassan, who had followed the Christians hitherto, and burned with desire to be restored to his kingdom, and consequently must have pined with grief at their long delays, and now much more at their bad success, was taken ill of a fever, and died in a poor wretched hut, on an adjacent hill, in the 66th year of his age. He was tall of stature, and of a black complexion, wise and valiant, but so vindictive, that he breathed nothing but anger and resentment against his unnatural son and his friends. His body was conveyed to Kayrwan, the burying place of the kings of his race<sup>2</sup>.
- g ALL this while the Christian army received constant supplies of men, provisions, and martial stores, but was no less annoyed by the frequent sallies of the besiegers, and the ambushes of Dragut, who had landed in the neighbourhood with about 800 Turks, and lay concealed behind a hill, among the olive woods. This corsair, ever watching all advantages to annoy a the enemy, had hired besides 3,000 Moors, and sent word to his nephew, that he designed to attack the enemy, at that wood, on St. James's day, that being the place whence they had their fascines, and ordered him to be ready on his side to make a vigorous sally at the same time. In the mean time a Moor, who belonged to the late Hassan's retinue, observing these Moors laying in ambush on their bellies, as he was going to the camp, and, meeting the Christian party going for fascines, caused them to halt, and went to apprise the Sicilian viceroy of it. Don Juan, thinking it dishonourable to recall those men back to the camp upon a bare surmise, resolved to go to escort them, accompanied by the governor of the Goletta, some Maltese and other commanders, and a good squadron of horse, which immediately brought on a bloody engagment; for Dragut and his troops, which lay concealed in the b wood, waited no longer than till they were come near enough, and then rushed upon them with their usual fury, with their sabres in their hands. The onset was fierce and long, several of the Maltese knights, Perez de Vargas, governor of the Goletta, and a great number of Christians, were slain, and the viceroy, with great difficulty, got out of the wood; and, when he had regained the plain, was closely pursued by Dragut a considerable way to the camp. Whilst the Turks and Christians were engaged in the wood, the governor, according to his uncle's orders, made a vigorous sally out of the city, and, in spite of the fierce fire which the besiegers made upon him, which killed a great many of his men, some of them ventured so far as to plant two standards on the enemies trenches; but finding them doubly guarded, and the men regularly planted on their posts, he thought fit to sound a c retreat, and retired into the town without doing any other harm.

A new attack made with success.

Don Juan, on the other hand, had no sooner recovered his camp, than he ordered, by way of revenge, all his batteries to make a dreadful fire against the place, but the walls proved so thick and strong, that they scarcely made any impression on them, insomuch that the generality of officers began to talk of raising the siege. At length Don Garcias, the young viceroy of Naples, proposed to the council of war, to attack the place on the sea-side, where he was informed, by some deserters, the walls were much weaker, and would more easily give way. Upon which two flat galleys were immediately ordered to be fastened together, and a stout battery to be raised upon them, with parapets and embrasures, and to be towed in the night to the place designed for the new attack; which being done accordingly, the batteries began to play with such success, that a sufficient breach was quickly made for an assault. d Immediately the knights of Malta, according to their privilege, prepared to mount the breach, accompanied by four companies of their own troops, and a great number of volunteers of several nations; whilst the viceroys of Naples and Sicily were causing a diversion on the land-side with their own troops. The assailants, finding themselves frequently stopped by some sandy banks, jumped into the sea, which came sometimes up to their very necks, and gained the bottom of the wall with great difficulty, whilst the Turks, planted on the top of the breach, were making a constant discharge of their cannon, muskets, arrows, stones, boiling water, and wild fire, which destroyed a great number before they could come to scale the breach. They met with no less difficulty, and a considerable loss, before they e accomplished it, and penetrated from it to the town, which they were obliged to do, over a few beams and boards, the remains of an old gallery, now demolished, which communicated to it. The outcries of the inhabitants soon brought thither those Moors and Turks from the ramparts on the land-side, where they had been opposing the Spanish and Neapolitan troops: and here would have began a new fight, had not the Maltese by that time dispersed themselves through every part of the town, and driven the inhabitants out of it sword in hand, some of whom fled through the plain into the woods, others to the sea-coasts, and others desperately threw themselves into the waves; for the viceroy, finding against his expectation all quiet on the land-side, none of Dragut's forces appearing to make a diversion there, poured in his musqueteers and other forces in such plenty, that most of the streets of the f place looked for some time like so many fields of battle; for the troops of the garrison so dreaded Dragut's resentment, that they would accept of no quarter, but fought desperately to the last, and died with their weapons in their hands.

An immense
in the place.

THE plunder which was found in the place was of an immense value, it being, as we observed before, the repository of Dragut's treasure, his chief arsenal, storehouse, and granary; besides which they found the merchants houses full of rich merchandizes of all sorts, gold, silver, jewels, rich stuffs, drugs, &c. and the inhabitants of both sexes, who were made slaves, amounted to seven, Marmol says ten thousand. But the most valuable prize was the city itself, the strongest on all the African coasts. The viceroy of Sicily, who was the oldest and chief commander, took possession of it in the name of the emperor, and g challenged the whole glory of its reduction to himself, and made his son, Don Alvarez, governor of it, though Don Garcias deserved the greatest share of the honour, not only on account of his gallant behaviour during the siege, but as it was by his advice and con-

a trivance that the siege was carried on at the most advantageous side, when the rest were ready to raise it<sup>f</sup>.

DRAGUT, enraged at the loss of the place, all his stores, riches, and slaves, sent immediately an embassy to Porte, accompanied, as usual, with large presents, to represent to the Grand Signor the importance of this and the other two towns, which Charles V. had stripped his empire of, contrary to the treaty still subsisting between them, and, at the same time, inveighed bitterly against the knights of Malta, to whose bravery the loss of them, especially that of Mehedia, was chiefly owing. Soleyman was by this time become too powerful not to resent such a breach of faith, yet would not begin any hostilities, till he had sent to the emperor to demand the restitution of those three places: he was answered by that monarch, that those places belonging to the kingdom of Tunis, now tributary to the crown of Castile, his generals had acted no other way than any other sovereign might have done, against a corsair that was detested by God and man, and whom, without intending to break the truce with his highness, he was determined to pursue as a common pirate, wherever he lurked. This answer could not fail of exasperating that haughty Soltan, who caused a fresh order to be immediately dispatched to Dragut, to take up all the galleys and vessels that sailed under Ottoman colours, and to use his utmost efforts to recover those places from the Christians. At the same time, to take from the emperor all pretence to treat the corsair as a pirate, he sent him a commission, by which he appointed him Sangiac of the isle of Santa Maura. Dragut could not but be highly pleased with his new title and commission, but had but little stomach to the order of retaking these towns, as long as the Maltese continued so strong at sea, and in possession of Tripoli; and therefore sent word to the Porte, that he could have but little hopes of succeeding in that enterprize, unless the Soltan attacked both their island and that city with fire and sword, and drove that powerful enemy out of Africa, as they had been formerly out of Asia. This advice, being relished by Soleyman, diverted the storm from the coasts of Tunis to the island of Malta and city of Tripoli, in the former of which Dragut lost his life, as will be hereafter shewn.

By all that we have seen of the emperor's conduct in the reduction of these three Tunesian sea-ports, it doth not appear that he had any other view than the depriving of that formidable corsair, and all the piratic tribe, of those advantageous retreats. As for Muley Hassan, and his two sons, who came to this siege with them, we do not find that he had any thought of restoring any of them to the throne, though his interest might have induced him to it, as the then possessor of it, the perfidious Hamida, had not only disavowed all dependence and vassalage to him, but was then his declared and irreconcilable enemy, and was no less pressing than Dragut, by his embassies and presents to the Porte, to induce Soltan Soleyman to declare war against him<sup>g</sup>. The truth is, that Charles V. had too many things of greater moment upon his hands, as will be shewn in a subsequent part, to give any farther attention to these conquests, which he was quickly after obliged to abandon, and even to order this important place to be demolished.

BUT to return to the garrison: Don Sancho de Leva was soon after sent thither to succeed Don Alvarez as governor, who ordered them to make fresh incursions upon the neighbouring Moors; whence they came back laden with rich plunder, which he obliged them to live upon, without allowing them any farther pay. The soldiers, apprehending that he sunk it in his own pocket, became so exasperated against him, that he was forced to fly to save his life; upon which they chose one Antonio de Aponte to command in his room, together with a serjeant major to see his orders executed. The viceroy of Sicily, being acquainted with this revolution, sent word of it to the emperor, and, at the same time, endeavoured to reduce them to their obedience, by stopping the usual provisions that were sent to them from thence. But this only obliged them to equip a small vessel with 60 soldiers, who, sailing into Sicily, seized what corn they could get out of the vessels. They likewise obtained other provisions from the grand master of Malta, and other places, for their money; so that, being by this means so plentifully supplied, they resolved, one and all, not to receive Don Sancho again, tho' the emperor and viceroy had sent them orders to submit to him, under severe penalties. This contest lasted a considerable time, during which officers were sent, some with threats, others with flattering promises. Some of them had even been bribed by the viceroy to assassinate the heads of this small, but well-governed republic, but were prevented from it by a sudden blast of a burning wind, which forced them to seek for cool shelters in caves and cisterns, just as they were on the point of executing their bloody design; yet this prevented not the two chief assassins from murdering the serjeant-major, and such other mutineers as were the main props of the revolt; after which all became quiet again. At length a new governor was sent thither, who found the place in want of all things for its defence, and the soldiery in a great ferment for want of pay. He

Charles offers it to the knights of Malta; apprised both the viceroys of it, who proposed the demolishing of it to the emperor; but that politic monarch was rather inclined to turn that place over to the knights of Malta, instead of Tripoli, which the Turks had lately retaken from them, and proposed to pay them 20,000 crowns per ann. for the maintenance of the garrison and fortifications. No artifice was omitted by his ministers and creatures to persuade the grand council to accept of the emperor's generous offers, as they were stiled. Those knights had too many powerful reasons to deter them from saddling their order with such an important place; such as disobliging the French king, exasperating the Porte, &c. so that the proposal was rejected by a great majority. An embassy was immediately dispatched to him to excuse their non-acceptance; and though Charles could, as grand protector of their order, have obliged them to it, yet he chose rather to have it demolished, and gave orders to have it done accordingly <sup>a</sup>.

On their abandoning the place, they brought away, in two large chests, the remains of those brave commanders who had lost their lives at the siege of it, and had lain buried in the principal mosk of it ever since it was taken. Upon their arrival in Sicily, the viceroy of that island ordered them to be deposited in the great cathedral of Mount Real, near Palermo, and a mausoleum to be erected over them, with a pompous epitaph to their memory, the sense and purport of which the reader may see in the margin (I). To conclude this section, the emperor was now glad at any rate to prevent the danger of Mehedia's falling into the hands of his Turkish, or other enemies, by blowing up all its fortifications, and reducing the rest into that heap of ruins in which the French, then at war with him, afterwards found it, who were sent by their general to reconnoitre it. <sup>b</sup>

THIS proved, however, a difficult task to be performed in due time, not only on account of the number and strength of those works, which would require a vast number of hands, but because it was to be done with the utmost speed, lest the French or Turkish fleet, then out at sea, and not very far from the place, should come and surprise it before it was completed. On the other hand, there reigned a general murmuring among both soldiers and sailors, being unaccustomed to such laborious works, and already highly dissatisfied for want of their pay, and on account of the arrears that were due to them; nor would the danger they were in from the Turkish and French fleets have been sufficient to induce them to set about it, had not the politic governor appeased their discontent by a prompt payment of part of their demands, and great promises and engagements for the rest, to be paid at the first Silician port they should come at after the work was done. This had, at length, the desired effect, and miners, soldiers, and sailors, went about it with such readiness, and plied it night and day with such dispatch, that nothing remained to be done but setting fire to the mines. <sup>c</sup>

THEIR next business was to put their men, artillery, and ammunition on board, leaving only an officer behind, whom they could confide in, together with two-thirds of a company of foot, to blow up the whole, and to see that no one mine was left unsprung. Those under the walls and principal towers amounted to twenty-four; every one of which ran with its branches by several ways quite down to the very foundation, and had a soldier appointed to set fire to it, with each a match of a fathom and a half in length, and exactly of the same thickness. They were ordered to light them at the firing of the first cannon, and to stoop down at the firing of the second. They were likewise ordered to put it into the great pipe made for that purpose, and to push them to the mouth of each mine in such manner, that two spans of it might penetrate into the powder, and the remainder should be out of it, with its end lighted and burning; and this was done to the intent that they might all take fire at the same instant of time. Every soldier was moreover ordered, after he had planted his match in the manner above-mentioned, to go and visit that of his next companion; and the commanding officer was to take care that every thing was performed according to order, and with the utmost speed. The reason of all these precautions is obvious; for if, among such a number of mines, one or more had chanced to spring before the rest, some of these might have been so far overwhelmed by the rubbish as to extinguish the matches, and prevent their blowing up, which would have frustrated their designs, as their intention was to destroy all the fortifications so effectually that they might not be restored. <sup>d</sup>

As soon, therefore, as the soldiers had set fire to their respective matches, they hasted into their boats, and rowed far enough from the shore to be out of all danger from them. <sup>e</sup>

(I) Though death hath put an end to the life of those, whose ashes lie under this marble, yet will the memory of their singular valour never have an end. The faith of these heroes hath obtained them a place in heaven, and their courage hath filled the world with their glory. So that the blood, which issued out of their wounds, hath recompensed their loss of one life, with a double immortality *.

- a The first mines that sprung up were those of the west side, which blew up all the towers of the land side into the air towards the west, though so strongly built, and at such a vast expence and labour, that the Khalif Mehedi was heard to say, he would have been at the charge of casting them in metal, if that would have rendered them more safe and impregnable. And such was the destruction of them, and of the other works every where, that one would have imagined that the four elements had lent their united strength to complete it; so instantaneously was that noble place reduced into a heap of ruins, as not to be known even by its own inhabitants; insomuch, that this port became afterwards fatal for a while to the vessels that sailed thither. There was but one out of all the mines that missed taking fire; namely, that which lay under the great tower, through which was the deep gate leading to the land side, lately described. The officer and his men were, therefore, obliged to land once more and set fire to it; upon which both that and the two towers which guarded the entry of the port flew up into the air, and discovered the large marble columns which supported them, and which were all of one solid piece, to avoid the use of cement, which might otherwise have been apt gradually to be impaired by the dampness of the ground and the beating of the waves; and with the same view they were reared on a stout pavement of large blocks of the same hard stone; by which, and all we have said above, our readers may judge what an immense labour and expence it must have cost the Khalif above-named to raise this city to such a prodigious degree of strength, which required so much of both to reduce it to that heap of ruins in which it hath lain ever since. And we are in hopes, that the curiousness and importance of this subject, so completely transmitted down to us by an eye-witness of such note and credit<sup>1</sup>, will sufficiently apologize for our having dwelt so long upon it.

- IF Charles V. had now cause to rejoice at his success in the demolition of a fortress which had proved a heavy and expensive burden to him, and which none of his friends cared to take off his hands upon any consideration, Hamida, the then reigning tyrant of the Tunisian kingdom, had no less reason to be pleased to see himself happily rid of so powerful an enemy, and so grievous a thorn in his side as the Christian garrison had been to him, which chiefly maintained itself by the depredations they made in his territories. However, that monarch had still the Goletta in his hands, and in it a good strong garrison to keep him in awe; and it is very likely that that obliged him to become his tributary, especially as that would prevent any new attempt against him from that quarter in favour of his brother Muley Mohammed: for we are expressly told, that he continued in the quiet possession of the throne seventeen years, after the demolition of Mehedia, that is, till an. 1570, when the new Dey of Algiers drove him out of it, at the earnest request of his most considerable subjects<sup>2</sup>.

- THE suddenness of this new revolution was occasioned by his horrid tyranny and cruelties, particularly over several of the nobility, whom he had grievously insulted and abused both in person and estate. So that, unable to bear his yoke any longer, they resolved to apply to the above Hali, or Ochali, Basha, newly created Dey of Algiers, with whom several of the chiefs were personally acquainted. Accordingly, some of them were deputed to invite him to their assistance, and even to offer him the sovereignty of the realm, to be possessed by him in the name of the Ottoman emperor.

- THE chief managers of this negotiation were Alcayde Ebn Jibaara, general of the horse, who bore Hamida a mortal grudge, though he so artfully concealed it, that he was not in the least suspected by him, and two other chief officers. These easily prevailed upon Hali to undertake so advantageous an expedition; and, upon his appearing at the head of his forces, and ready to engage, went all three over to him with their own partisans, according to agreement, at the very instant in which Hamida was preparing to attack him. This unexpected defection threw the tyrant into such a panic, that he left his army and fled, with as many officers as would follow him, with all the speed he could to his own capital, not in the least doubting but that the citizens would unanimously oppose a Turkish enemy, whom they had so much cause to hate. But, to his still greater mortification, he found them all ready to join them as soon as they appeared within sight of the walls, to which Hali had pursued him. In this distress he ran to his palace, and taking out thence two of his wives, two sons, and what money, jewels, and other valuables he could get, he stole away in the night to the Goletta, attended only by twenty-five of his friends and domestics. In his way he was overtaken by a party of Moors, who were apprised of his flight, and who quickly eased him of the most valuable part of his luggage, without offering any farther harm either to him or his retinue; and, with the remainder, he got happily into the Spanish garrison; whilst Hali and his Turks entered the city of Tunis without the least opposition, towards the latter end of the year 1569. A mutual satisfaction soon appeared between the conqueror and his new subjects, whilst he not only treated them all with peculiar courtesy, but, contrary to the Turkish custom, shewed himself liberal and grateful to those who had been the chief promoters of this revolution. The Arabian princes came likewise to Tunis to congratulate him on a his success, and offer their services and friendship to him, in hopes, most probably, of obtaining some presents, or at least a promise of such a yearly pension as the former kings of Tunis used to pay to them, in order to fix them to their interest. These likewise met with a gracious reception from him at first; but, whether they did afterwards intimate any thing like that to him, he took care to let them know, a few days after, that he should expect a tribute from them, to help to defray the charges of the government; but was not a little surprised to hear them answer, with a noble boldness, that he must expect no other tribute than what he extorted from them in the field with sword in hand. Hali staid some part of the next year to settle the state of his new kingdom, and appointed his favourite renegado Ramadan Sardo viceroy of it; who, as we have seen in the preceding chapter, became afterwards Dey of Algiers; and under him he left another Neapolitan renegado, named Mahamed, to act as field general. These had under them a garrison of 3000 Turks and renegadoes to keep the people in their obedience; and, all things being thus regulated, he left the city, and returned to his own kingdom about the beginning of April, highly satisfied with his successful expedition <sup>1</sup>.

DURING these transactions, Muley Mohammed, the brother of Hamida, had found means to escape, first into Numidia, and thence into Spain, where he earnestly solicited that court to be restored to the Tunesian kingdom, promising, on that condition, to hold it from the Spanish crown, and to become tributary <sup>m</sup>. In whose favour the new armament was ordered under the command of Don Juan of Austria; of which we shall give an account in a subsequent part of this history. As to the reducing that kingdom on the following year by Selim II. under the conduct of the famed Sinan, Basha of the Levant, it hath been already related in a former volume, to which we shall refer our readers for a further account <sup>n</sup>.

SINAN found this new conquered kingdom much divided, chiefly by the revolt of Kayrwan, which had chosen a prince of its own, upon the expulsion of the Turks out of Tunis by the emperor, in order to prevent their falling again under the Turkish tyranny. They had, after the ejection of Barbarossa out of Tunis, elected the chief Alfaki of their great mosk for their sovereign; who, by the assistance of his new subjects and some Arabian troops, seized on several towns in the neighbourhood of Kayrwan, and had taken upon him the royal title. He had likewise made an alliance with Hamida, the king of Tunis, by some intermarriages, and was still upon the throne at the time of the emperor's expedition against Mehedia, and assisted him with some troops and provisions, in order to drive Dragut out of it. For this that corsair had sworn his death in revenge; and, to accomplish which, he corrupted several of the inhabitants, and particularly some Alfakis, to admit him into the city in the dead of night. So that entering it, at the head of some of his troops, he easily surprised the king in his palace, and murdered him: after which he made himself master of the place; and, though himself was killed at the siege of Malta, about eight years after, as will be shewn in the sequel <sup>o</sup>, yet had none of the Tunesian princes been able to reduce it to their own subjection <sup>p</sup>.

THIS was the state of the kingdom when Selim II. dispossessed Philip II. of its metropolis. Sinan Basha, who was at the head of this expedition, the better to secure this new conquest to his master, not only destroyed all the Christians he found in that place, except about fourteen, whom he sent bound as trophies to Constantinople, but demolished the walls and citadel, and caused a new one to be built nearer the port; and, to prevent any new factions arising for the future to disturb this new state, he modelled it much after the form of those at Algiers and Tripoli; that is, he put it under the protection of the Grand Signor, and appointed a Basha, or viceroy, under him, and a Douwan, which consisted of military men; placed proper governors, or Beys, over the provinces and garrisons in other parts of the kingdom, in order to secure its dependencies; and, at his departure, left 4000 Janissaries to curb and prevent any future mutiny. And here was a final end put to the power and splendor of the kings of Tunis, after it had continued 370 years, from the time that Abraam, al. Abu Ferez, laid the first foundation of it, an. 1204 *.

- <sup>a</sup> IN this section, instead of a series of princes, such as we have seen in the last, the reader must expect little else but a list of rapacious Deys, or viceroys, chosen by their own Douwan, much after the same manner as those of Algiers, whose avarice and ambition made those elections come so thick and fast one after another, that within the space of 120 years, that is, from the time of these first elections, to that of Aggi Mahamed Coggia, there have reigned no less than twenty-three. all of whom, except five, have been either dethroned, strangled, or some other way murdered. From the very beginning the Tunefians were so disgusted at the Basha, whom Sinan had set over them, that they immediately petitioned the Porte to abolish that dignity, and to give them leave to elect a Dey from among themselves, with the same power as those of Algiers; which being readily granted to them, they forthwith proceeded to the choice of one, whom they massacred before the year was out. Ibrahim, who succeeded him the year following, was in danger of undergoing the same fate, but timely prevented it by fleeing to Mecca. To these frequent and bloody revolutions succeeded another in process of time, in which the Beys, or second rank of officers, raised their power on the ruin of that of the Deys: so that the Beylik became gradually so despotic and absolute, that the grand Douwan, or supreme council, dwindled to a mere shadow of power, and are to this day convoked by those Beys, merely to approve of what they decree, without being ever consulted by them, except when they are obliged to it, in order to prevent some fresh tumults, or to screen themselves from the resentment of an exasperated populace<sup>a</sup>; neither hath the grand council a much greater influence in the elections to the Beylik, they being commonly carried by violence; the strongest sword or interest is the surest, and most commonly the only means of attaining that dignity, without any regard to succession. These disorders, perhaps, which have caused so much confusion and bloodshed in that kingdom, were, in all likelihood, the chief motives which induced the Porte to revive the old custom of sending their Bashas thither, to be a check or curb to their arbitrary proceedings.

ex. who are frequently dethroned

1574.

- <sup>c</sup> ACCORDINGLY, we have taken notice in the Algerine history of several who were become great favourites at that court, on account of their strenuous valour and conduct, who have been removed from the Deylik of Algiers to the Bashalik of Tunis. Such were the brave Ramadan Sardo, Hali Basha, and others<sup>b</sup>, who were as well received, and no less beloved at Tunis, than they had been at Algiers; yet these were recalled at the end of two years at most by that jealous and politic court, and sent upon expeditions of equal credit and importance. And this seems, in all probability, to have been done, to prevent the no less jealous and powerful Beys raising some dangerous commotion against them, on account of their strenuous and intrepid conduct in supporting the interest of the Ottoman Porte, rather than out of fear of any coalition between them and the Tunefians.

*The Deys made Bashas by the

- <sup>d</sup> HOWEVER that be, we must look upon the whole space of the Dey's reign as not only an æra of rather anarchy and confusion than of a well regulated government, but likewise as a period little known to us, considering, that the various attempts made by the emperor, and other Christian princes, on this and other maritime kingdoms of Barbary, had put a stop, in a great measure, to all kind of commercial intercourse between the Europeans and them, and inspired all those Mohammedan nations with an invincible jealousy and hatred against every Christian nation. So that all the correspondence that passed between the European states and those of Barbary, was merely of the piratical kind, and the only one by which they desired to supply themselves even with such European commodities as they could not do without<sup>c</sup>. And in this the Tunefians came not behind any of their neighbours; and we are assured, by an ingenious gentleman, who hath lately resided a considerable time in those parts*, and from whose account of this kingdom, published a few years ago, we have taken the greatest part of this sequel of its history, that a Genoese renegado, who flourished some time within this interval, and was made commander of the galleys of Bizerta, a commodious port belonging to this kingdom, had made about twenty thousand Christian slaves.
- <sup>e</sup> Such is the history of this kingdom, could we, or were it worth our while, to collect all the material transactions that have happened in it, from their first establishing themselves in this tumultuous and arbitrary form of government, we should find it to consist chiefly in their constant depredations at sea, and their frequent revolts and contentions, butcheries and tyrannies, at home; many of them fomented and lightened by the Turks, in hopes of finding some proper opportunity of raising themselves to the same height of despotic power over the Moors here, as they have done at Algiers, Tripoli, and were like to have done the same in Morocco and Fez more than once, as we have seen in the two former chapters. Of this the Beys were so aware, and so watchful against, that they made it a settled rule of their politics to cultivate a good understanding and friendship with the Sharifs on the one hand, and to obstruct the growing power of the incroaching Turks on the other. The Algerines, on their part, were no less watchful to prevent too close an union between the Beys and the Sharifs, as their country lies between them, and liable to be attacked on both sides, and to become a prey to those two states<sup>d</sup>; and it was this jealousy that kindled those frequent wars which happened between them; and, particularly, that dreadful one against the Tunefians, which we just gave a hint of in the history of Algiers; but which we shall here resume a little lower, as it is one of the most considerable transactions of their modern history, and the most proper to give our readers a taste of the rest, which we pass over for the reasons lately mentioned.

Morat's three
for the Beylik.

MORAT II. Bey of Tunis, left three sons at his death, Mahamed, Hali, and Ramadan, who all contended for the succession to the Beylik. Ramadan was the first, who, for peace's sake, gave up his pretensions, and left them at liberty either to divide or dispute the government between them. Their ambition soon determined them to the latter; which contest caused a great effusion of blood for some considerable time, till Mahamed, whether out of religious considerations, or tired with the opposition, gave it up to Hali, and retired to Kayrwan, where he gave himself up to solitude and devotion. Hali had not been long in quiet possession of the Beylik, before the war was kindled again by his own treachery: for Mahamed, at his resignation, having intrusted his favourite son Achmed to his care, he, upon some jealous surmise, had caused him to be put to death. Mahamed was soon informed of his perfidy by Cheleby, the then Dey, or next in dignity to the Bey, an ambitious statesman, who had long since waited for a favourable opportunity to raise himself to the Beylik, and now thought to effect it by the destruction of the two brothers; and, the more effectually to excite his resentment, offered to assist him with all his power and interest to revenge his son's death. Hali, at this time, had likewise made some strenuous attempt upon the city; for which the Tunefians had taken up arms against and defeated him; so that he had been forced to fly: but, upon hearing that the exasperated Mahamed was hastening to Tunis, he made all the dispatch he could to reach that city before him; but the politic Cheleby took care to shut the gates against him. Mahamed, to prevent the like obstruction, declared, that he came with no other view than to punish the authors of his son's death; but was told, that they, having notice of his approach by his brother Hali, had escaped on board a vessel, and were sailed away. At this news he lost no time, but pursued so closely after them, that he came upon them before they could put to sea, and took the vessel; and having sacrificed those murderers to the manes of his dear son, returned directly to Tunis<sup>e</sup>.

In the mean time the ambitious Cheleby had taken such care to inflame the citizens against the two contending brothers, upon whose destruction depended all his hopes, that, upon his return, they shut their gates against him, and boldly declared, that they would not submit to two brothers, whose mutual contentions alternately destroyed them; so that he must not expect any allegiance from them, unless he sacrificed his brother to the peace and tranquillity of the Tunefian state. This declaration soon caused a defection among Mahamed's troops; a great part of whom withdrew into Tunis, which obliged him to be reconciled to his brother, and to join forces with him to reduce the mutineers within. Upon which Cheleby made a stout sally upon them, and gave them both such an overthrow, that, if he had pursued his victory more closely, he might easily have gained his end, and been raised to the Beylik: but, instead of it, he suffered them to go on in their own measures, till, having hired a body of Algerine troops from the Dey, Ibrahim, for 40,000 piasters, he saw himself at once closely besieged by him and the two brothers in the city of Tunis. He had, however, the precaution to hire some Moorish chiefs to assist him in the place, and the siege had already lasted from the month of September, 1685, to that of June of the following year; by which time those auxiliaries, naturally accustomed to range, being weary of continuing so long cooped within the city walls, retired to their mountains, and left him to make the best defence he could with his own citizens.

Kara Osman goes over to the besiegers.

THEY had no sooner abandoned the city, than Kara Osman, who commanded the cavalry in it, sallied out, under pretence of pursuing those fugitives; instead of which, he marched directly to the two Beys; upon which the gates were immediately opened to them, yet rather as friends than conquerors. Whilst these were entering in at one end, Cheleby was endea-

- a vouring to make his escape at the other; but, being discovered, was brought prisoner to the Dey Ibrahim's tent; presently after which his Algerines, looking upon themselves as masters of the city, began to commit the most cruel disorders and outrages. Some of them had the insolence to pursue two Moors to the very palace with their drawn scymitars, and even to drag them to prince Mahamed's apartment, brandishing their weapons before him in a threatening manner. This indignity, which Mahamed could not but be conscious was offered to him by those imperious Turks, in revenge to the hatred which he had always expressed for their nation, (inasmuch, that even during his long contest with his brother about the Beylik, he never would take any of them into his service, but rather used those that were in his dominions with unusual cruelty, causing some to be put to death, and others to be banished, and confiding in none but his own Moors) terrified that pusillanimous prince to such a degree, that, to avoid their carrying it any farther, he caused those two innocent Moors to be thrown head-long from the terraces of his palace, and stole away to his camp with as much haste and privacy as he could. Those enormities still raging in the city, his brother Hali, a prince of more courage and conduct, and less hated by the Turks, hastened immediately into it, at the head of some of his troops, and quickly drove them out of it, and all was quite again.

- In the interim, those of Cheleby's party, having resolved to assassinate the two Beys, rushed into Dey Ibrahim's tent, whither they supposed they had retired, and surrounded it by the next break of day; but not finding them there, went forth into that of Hali; who, being still in the city, they missed likewise; whilst Mahamed, not thinking himself safe in his camp, was making all the haste he could out of it. He was, however, soon overtaken by his brother-in-law, Ben Choukee; who, after some severe reproofs for his untimely pusillanimity, told him, in plain terms, that nothing but his presence could put a stop to the present commotions; and that Tunis was the place where he must either conquer or die. And, indeed, his cowardly flight had so far reanimated Cheleby's partisans, that they had ventured into Ibrahim's tent, where he was kept, with a full design to have carried him off, and proclaimed him Bey. But that being quite opposite to Ibrahim's interest, he at once put an end to all further attempts on his behalf, by causing him to be strangled, and his body to be exposed before his tent; the sight of which so cooled and terrified the warmest of that party, that they were the very first to acknowledge Mahamed; who, on his side, soon after dismissed the Algerines at the same rate he had hired them. Mahamed having now got the sole power into his hands, and none left to oppose him, began immediately to gratify his insatiable avarice, by the most exorbitant confiscations and extortions; inasmuch that his most wealthy subjects were those that were most exposed to his rapacious cruelty. He had likewise renewed his alliance with the Sharif of Morocco; when the Tuneseans, weary of his tyranny, saw themselves obliged to invite the Algerines to their assistance against him. Cheleby, or, as others call him, Chaban, then Dey of Algiers, readily accepted the invitation; and, having sent a sufficient number of forces to secure his frontiers on the western side, to prevent Muley Ismael sending him any forces from thence, marched directly to Tunis, at the head of 10,000 of his Turks. Mahamed went out, at head of his numerous Moors, to meet and attack them; but they, like their pusillanimous leader, affrighted at the sight of the Turkish forces, whom they had been so long inured to dread, immediately fled and forsook him; upon which he returned to Tunis with such prodigious consternation and speed, as threw the whole city into an universal panic; inasmuch that Ramadan, the then Basha, the Dey, and many other persons of distinction, made their escape on board a French vessel, bound for the Archipelago; the former of whom went afterwards and put himself under the protection of the duke of Tuscany.

- THE Turks immediately laid siege to Tunis; and, whilst that lasted, which was four whole months, Mahamed making a most vigorous defence, their troops committed the most grievous ravages in all the adjacent countries. At length, Mahamed, finding it dangerous to trust himself any longer among his discontented subjects, took the first opportunity to abandon the city, and fled for refuge to the desert of Zahara; upon which the city immediately opened their gates to the Algerines. As soon as their Dey saw himself master of the town, he appointed Ben Choukee Bey, and Tatar Dey of Tunis; and, having repaid himself with advantage for all his charges and troubles, returned to Algiers, leaving those two to govern that state as they thought fit. He was no sooner gone, but this new Bey, like a rapacious wolf, began to exercise the most horrid outrages and cruelties on the unhappy citizens; and, as if the confiscating their all to his own use had been too small a punishment, he ordered eight hundred of the chief of them to be tortured to death by the most inhuman and excruciating torments. He carried, at length, his tyranny and impiety so far, as to attempt to force some women, near relations to Mahamed, out of a celebrated asylum, in the city of Kayrwan, whither they had fled for safety; which so exasperated the inhabitants, that they rose up in arms, and forced him to flee out of the city to save himself from the effects of their fury. The revolt soon spread itself from that city through the principal ones of the kingdom, to so great a degree, that his outrages and cruelties seemed to have quite obliterated those of the fugitive Mahamed: so that they quickly after agreed to send some bodies of men to go and seek him among those deserts where he lay concealed, and to invite him to come back and resume his former government.

MAHAMED was then refuged in the territories of a powerful Arabian Cheyk, whose father he had some time before justly put to death, imagining, perhaps, that that would be the last place where his exasperated subjects would suppose him to be concealed. But as soon as he found himself to be discovered, and that they were in full search after him, and little dreaming how different their errand was from what his fears and guilt suggested to him, he went immediately and surrendered himself to the Cheyk, wholly relying on his generosity for a protection. The Cheyk, no less conscious of his father's guilt, than ambitious to oblige and protect a submissive enemy, not only received him under his protection with the utmost readiness, but as soon as he was apprised on what account his subjects were come in quest of him, generously furnished him with a body of 10,000 horse; which, being joined with those troops of his own which were come to meet him, enabled him to give Ben Choukce a total overthrow; the consequence of which was, that he soon recovered his capital, and was reinstated in the Beylik. The first thing he did after his restoration was the recalling of his brother Ramadan from Tuscany, where he had refuged himself, and bestowed the Deylik upon him. He died soon after of an apoplexy, and was succeeded by him in the Beylik, by the interest of the Algerines, in opposition to the Douwan, who were for chusing of his nephew, Morat, to the dignity, as being much better qualified for it. The Algerine party having thus far prevailed in favour of that weak prince, he no sooner saw himself possessed of the supreme power, than he gave himself up to pleasure and indolence, and committed the whole management of all his affairs to an Italian fidler, named Mazoul, a person no less unfit to hold the reins of that government than himself; and who, by his pride, ill-conduct, and mismanagement, quickly brought the kingdom into a general commotion and discontent. The Douwan and grandees which had declared for Ramadan, in complaisance to the Algerines, began to see their fault and danger, and did not fail of making loud complaints against them and the Bey, and his prime minister's ill-conduct. Great caballing was made every where against them, accompanied with private consultations about dethroning Ramadan, and electing Morat in his room; which at length so alarmed the favourite Mazoul, that he could find no other expedient to avoid the impending storm than by instilling a strong suspicion into his weak master, that his nephew was plotting against his life: whereupon the frightened Ramadan, no less pusillanimous than credulous, caused him to be apprehended and brought before the council, who, being all his creatures, made no difficulty to condemn him to lose his eyes.

IN all these transactions it is not to be doubted but the Algerines had the greatest hand, whose interest it was to have not only such weak princes, and bad ministers at the head of the Tunesian affairs, but likewise to embroil them so far with the Douwan, that they might always have an opportunity to thwart any measures they might take to the prejudice of their own state. For had the cabals in favour of Morat succeeded, who was a prince of a quite opposite character, the harmony which seems to have reigned between him and the grand council might have been productive of some steps, by way of retaliation, for the outrages they had lately suffered from the Algerine forces, and a firmer alliance been made between this republic and the emperor of Morocco against them. Muley Ishmael having no less cause to fear the growing power of Algiers than the Bey of Tunis, from the hostilities that had passed between them; of which we have given a further relation in a former chapter. So that upon all accounts it was plainly the interest of the Algerines not only to prevent that brave enterprising prince from being raised to the Beylik, but even to deprive him and all his partisans of all hopes of his ever doing so. But happily for him, their design was disappointed, by the surgeon who was to execute the sentence upon him.

HE was a French renegado; and, whether bribed by some of his friends, or the hopes of some suitable reward, found a method to deceive his severest enemies, and to save his eye-sight at the expence of his eye-lids; the cutting off of which so besmeared his eyes with blood, that he really seemed wholly deprived of the use of them. This was farther confirmed to them by some trials they made upon him, to be fully satisfied about it; such as setting chafing-dishes of burning coals in his way, over which he artfully stumbled; pointing of drawn swords before him, against which he advanced without betraying the least concern or fear.

RAMADAN and his council having seen enough to convince them that he was really deprived of his sight, sent him under a strong escort to the castle of Soussa, and committed him

- a him to the care of the Aga, a renegado monk, nick-named Papafalga, on account of his apostacy; but who, being sharper-sighted than the council, soon discovered the deceit, and immediately sent an express to apprise them, that, though his eyes were much disfigured, yet was his sight but little impaired by it. This news greatly alarmed Ramadan and his court; and a fresh courier was immediately dispatched to the Aga to put Morat, at any rate, to death. Happily for the latter, his affability and good qualities had so far gained the affections of the greatest part of the Moors, Turks, and renegadoes, that were in the castle with him, that he easily brought them over to his interest; and, as his safety depended upon preventing any further attempt upon him, of which he had received some private intimation, they readily joined with him in dispatching the Aga, as he sat at table, and forwarded his escape to the Offoleti mountains, which lay about thirty leagues distant from Tunis, before the bloody orders from the Bey were arrived. The news of his escape was no sooner known at court, than the greatest part of the Tunesian troops forsook Ramadan, and came over to him, which obliged him to endeavour to save himself by flight. But, whilst he was making all the haste he could to escape by sea, he was apprehended, and brought back to Morat, who ordered him to be strangled, and his body to be burnt to ashes. His favourite squire and prime minister, Mazoul, met with a still severer fate, being condemned to be shut up in an iron cage, and to have his flesh torn piece by piece during two days successively; after which his carcase, disfigured as it was, being thrown to the mob, was treated with the most brutal indignities. Morat carried his inhuman resentment against his uncle still farther, seeing, we are told, that he commonly mixed the ashes of his burned body with the wine which he drank*. His rancour against the Algerines, for having promoted the election of Ramadan against him, was no less manifest; and the first public act of his reign was a declaration of war against them, which he carried on with such fury and vehemence, such expence and profusion, as quite ruined his own subjects, and brought the most deplorable calamities upon his kingdom. Such was his insatiable thirst of revenge, not only against that rival republic, but against such of his subjects as had a hand in the promoting or supporting his uncle's interest against him, that he scrupled neither extortions nor cruelties against them, nor the most atrocious violations of oaths and sacred ties to assuage it.
- d THE Marabouts, and men of the law, though held in high veneration among them, Morat could not escape his vengeance; though the manner in which he vented it against them was rather ridiculous and terrifying than cruel. For, having caused them to be summoned to the great hall of his palace, he ordered them to be stripped and laid naked and bound upon the floor; and, after keeping them all night in that posture and fearful plight, he contented himself with ordering his servants on the next morning to throw some pails of water upon them; and, having diverted himself sufficiently with the scene, released them from their fears, and sent them home. This was probably done to shew his singular contempt of that whole tribe, as well as of those who held it in such great veneration (L). But, in other respects, he was such a monster of cruelty, that none but a Nero could come up to his character; and revelled in those horrid butcheries a longer time than one might have reasonably surmised, in a kingdom where so many of his predecessors had been sacrificed to popular fury for much less crimes: yet did he not escape his due fate, being at length murdered by Ibraim Sharif, captain of his guard; who, for that signal and hazardous service to the state, was unanimously raised to the Beylik in his stead.
- e IBRAIM was a person of a quite opposite character, bold, intrepid, and generous; and much beloved by the Tunesians, as the restorer of a liberty and tranquillity which they had not known before for a long while. He was, nevertheless, so unfortunate in a war which he undertook against the Tripolitans, that he was defeated with great loss, and taken prisoner by the Algerines; who, according to their custom, kept him in close confinement during seven whole months; neither would they grant him his liberty, but upon such severe and disadvantageous terms as made him hesitate a good while before he would submit to them.
- f At length, being tired with his inactive confinement, and apprehensive of his subjects elect-

(L) We have another instance of his disregard to the Mohammedan religion, which would be hardly worth recording, were it not for the oddness of it, and as it helps one to judge of his character. For being one day in the chapel of the holy cross, belonging to the Christian slaves of his bagnio, and seeing there an image of St. Lucia, who is reported to have been condemned to lose her eyes for being a Christian, and is commonly painted holding her two eyes in a kind of cup, asked the slaves who she was; and being answered, that she was the saint to whom the Christians prayed for the preservation of their sight, and against all distempers of the eyes, cried out, That she was a saint for his purpose; and that, if she could cure him, she should never want the best oil to burn in her lamps. And, we are told, that, to this very day, the lamp that burns before her image in that chapel is supplied at the charge of the government (1).

ing another Bey, he was at length forced to subscribe to their demands; one of which was, that he should pay them 200,000 piaſters as ſoon as he had recovered his dignity; and the other, that he ſhould, from that time, become tributary to Algiers.

THIS treaty was not ſo ſecretly agreed to but the Tuneſians got notice of it, and were highly diſpleaſed with the ſecond condition, though they would have readily conſented to the firſt. But though they were fully ſatisfied that it was thro' mere neceſſity that Ibraim had ſubmitted to thoſe hard terms, yet the thought of his condeſcending to become tributary to that rival ſtate, made them unanimouſly reſolve not to admit him any more into their territories, and to keep all avenues as cloſely ſhut up againſt him as if he had been an enemy.

Porto Farino
by Haſſan, who ſucceeds
him.

THESE orders were ſo ſtrictly executed, that, upon his arrival at the port of Bizerta with his ſmall retinue, he was denied acceſs to the place; upon which he ſent two of his officers to enquire into the reaſon of their behaviour; but theſe were immediately put under an arreſt; by which he eaſily judged that he ſhould have no admittance into it. He then ſailed directly to Porto Farino, where he expected a more favourable reception; but, to his great ſurpriſe, met with a much bolder repulſe: for Haſſan-Ben-Hali, who commanded in that place, and obſerved him at a diſtance from the ſhore, immediately diſpatched a veſſel out againſt him. The engagement was hardly begun, before Ibraim received a ſhot from a muſket which put an end to his life and to the action; upon the news of which Haſſan was, for his zeal and vigilance, choſen to ſucceed him by the Tuneſians; and it is to this laſt Bey that we owe the renewal of the peace with that ſtate; of which we ſhall ſpeak immediately; and probably occaſioned the abolition of an infamous cuſtom among their proſtitute women, who, whenever they met with a Chriſtian of virtue and ſeriousneſs, uſed to entice him by the moſt laſcivious poſtures and actions; nor would they leave him till they had extorted ſome money from him *.

Peace concluded between England and Tunis.

DURING the long interval of all the Beyliks we have been ſpeaking of, their merciless corſairs, as well as thoſe of their neighbours of Algiers and Tripoli, ranged the Mediterranean with a high hand, and infeſted the Chriſtian coaſts with their frequent incurſions, committing horrid outrages on the inhabitants, plundering them of their moſt valuable effects, and carrying off an infinite multitude of them into dreadful captivity, to the great interruption and decay of commerce. Thoſe dreadful piracies had gone on ſucceſſively with them till the year 1682; when the famed admiral Ruyter chaſed a Turkiſh veſſel, called the Three Crefcents, into the very bay of Tunis, and there burned it on the 26th of February of that year †, after he had reſcued twenty-fix Chriſtian ſlaves out of it, and made the reſt of the crew priſoners. This action was ſoon after followed by a peace, which was concluded by him with Mahamed, the then Bey, the Dey, and the whole Douwan, and ſigned on the 2d of March following: Among other articles, one was, that all paſt hoſtilities and outrages ſhould be forgotten on both ſides, as if they had never been committed; and that peace, friendſhip, and a good underſtanding, ſhould thenceforth be eſtabliſhed and cultivated between both nations. The ſame was likewiſe concluded with England ſoon after; but neither of them were well obſerved by them longer than they were yearly bought by exorbitant preſents, till the reign of king George I. when admiral Baker renewed it with them, as well as with Algiers and Tripoli, or rather concluded a new one with them, which hath continued ever ſince, and is as follows:

it.

ARTICLES of peace and commerce between his moſt ſacred Maſteſty king George, &c. and the moſt excellent lords Hali Baſha, Haſſan-Ben-Hali Bey, Cara Muſtaſpha Dey, the Aga, and the Douwan of the noble city of Tunis, and the whole body of militia of the ſaid kingdom, renewed and concluded in the year of Chriſt, 1716, by John Baker, Eſq; vice-admiral, &c.

1. THAT all former grievances, loſſes, and other pretenſions between both parties, ſhall be void and of no effect, and from henceforward a firm peace for ever, free trade and commerce, ſhall be and continue between the ſubjects of his moſt ſacred Maſteſty George, king of Great-Britain, &c. and the people of the kingdom of Tunis, and dominions thereunto belonging. But that this article ſhall not cancel or make void any juſt debt, either in commerce or otherwiſe; that may be due from one perſon or perſons to others of either party, but that the ſame ſhall be liable to be demanded, and be recoverable as before.

2. THAT the ſhips of either party ſhall have free liberty to enter into any port, or river, belonging to the dominions of either party, paying the duties only for what they ſhall ſell, transporting the reſt without any trouble or moleſtation, and freely enjoy any other accu-

a stomed privileges; and the late exaction which hath been upon the lading and unlading of goods at Goletta, and the marine, shall be reduced to the antient custom in those cases.

3. THAT there shall be no seizure of any ship of either party at sea, or in port; but that they shall quietly pass, without any molestation or interruption, they displaying their colours: and for the prevention of all inconveniencies that may happen, the ships of Tunis are to have a certificate, under the hand and seal of the British consul, that they belong to Tunis; which being produced, the English ship shall admit two men to come on board them peaceably, and satisfy themselves that they are English; and although they have passengers of other nations on board, they shall be free, both they and their effects.

b 4. THAT if an English ship shall receive on board any goods or passengers belonging to the kingdom of Tunis, they shall be bound to defend them and their goods, so far as lies in their power, and not deliver them unto their enemies; and the better to prevent any unjust demand being made upon the crown of Great-Britain, and to avoid disputes and differences which may arise, all goods and merchandizes, that shall from henceforward be shipped by the subjects of this government, either in this port or any other whatsoever, on board the ships or vessels belonging to Great-Britain, shall be first entered in the office of Cancellaria before the British consul residing at the respective port, expressing the quantity, quality, and value of the goods so shipped, which the said consul is to certify in the clearance which is given to the said ship or vessel, before she departs; to the end that, if any cause of complaint should happen hereafter, there may be no greater claim made on the British nation than by this method shall be proved to be just and equitable.

5. THAT if any ships of either party shall, by accident of foul weather or otherwise, be cast away upon any coasts belonging to the other party, the persons shall be free; and the goods saved and delivered to their lawful proprietors.

6. THAT the English which do at present, or shall hereafter, inhabit in the city or kingdom of Tunis, shall have free liberty, when they please, to transport themselves, with their families and children, though born in the country.

7. THAT the people belonging to the dominions of either party shall not be abused with ill language, or otherwise ill treated; but that the parties so offending shall be punished according to their desert.

d 8. THAT the consul, or any other of the English nation residing at Tunis, shall not be forced to make their addressees, in any deference, to any court of justice, but to the Dey himself, from whom only they shall receive judgment: this is in case any dispute should arise between a subject of Great-Britain and one of this government, or of any other foreign nation: but if it should be between any two of his majesty's subjects, then it shall be decided by the British consul only.

9. THAT the consul, or any other of the English nation, shall not be liable to pay the debts of any particular person of that nation, unless obliged thereunto under his hand.

c 10. THAT as the island of Minorca in the Mediterranean sea, and the city of Gibraltar in Spain, have been yielded and annexed to the crown of Great-Britain, as well by the king of Spain as by all the several powers in Europe engaged in the late war, it is hereby agreed and fully concluded, that, from this time forward for ever, the said island of Minorca and city of Gibraltar shall be esteemed, in every respect, by the government of Tunis, to be part of his majesty's own dominions; and the inhabitants thereof shall be looked upon as his majesty's natural subjects, in the same manner as if they had been born in any part of Great-Britain; and they, with their ships and vessels wearing the British colours, shall be permitted freely to trade and traffick in any part of the kingdom of Tunis, and shall pass without any molestation whatsoever, either on the seas or elsewhere, in the same manner, and with the same freedom and privileges, as have been stipulated in this and all former treaties in behalf of the British nation and subjects.

f 11. AND the better and more firmly to maintain the good correspondence and friendship that have been so long and so happily established between the crown of Great-Britain and the government of Tunis, it is hereby agreed and concluded, by the parties above-mentioned, that none of the ships or vessels belonging to Tunis, or the dominions thereof, shall be permitted to cruize, or look for prizes of any nation whatsoever, before or in sight of the aforesaid city of Gibraltar, or any ports of the island of Minorca, to hinder or molest any vessels bringing provisions and refreshments for his Britannic majesty's subjects, troops, and garri-fons in those places, or give any disturbance to the trade and commerce thereof; and if any prizes shall be taken by the ships or vessels of Tunis, within the space of ten miles of the places aforesaid, it shall be restored without any dispute.

g 12. THAT all the ships of war belonging to either party's dominions shall have free liberty to use each other's ports for washing, cleaning, and repairing any of their defects; and to buy and ship off any sorts of victuals, alive or dead, or any other necessaries, at the price the natives buy it in the market, without paying custom to any officer. And whereas <sup>a</sup> his Britannic majesty's ships of war do frequently assemble and harbour in the port of Makon, in the island of Minorca, if at any time they, or any of his majesty's troops in garrison there, should be in want of provisions, and should send from thence to purchase supplies in any part of the dominions belonging to Tunis, they shall be permitted to buy cattle, alive or dead, and all other kind of provision, at the price they are sold at in the market, and shall be suffered to carry them off without paying duty to any officer, in the same manner as if his majesty's ships themselves were in the port.

13. THAT in case any ships of war belonging to the kingdom of Tunis shall take, in any of their enemies ships, any Englishman serving for wages, they are to be made slaves; but if merchants or passengers, they are to enjoy their liberty and effects unmolested. <sup>b</sup>

14. THAT in case any slave in the kingdom of Tunis, of any nation whatsoever, shall make his escape, and get on board any ship belonging to the dominions of Great-Britain, the consul shall not be liable to pay the ransom, unless timely notice be given him to order that none such be entertained; and then, if it appears that any slave has so got away, the said consul shall pay to his patron the price for which he was sold in the market; and if no price be set, then to pay 300 dollars, and no more.

15. AND the better to prevent any dispute that may arise hereafter between the two parties about the salutes and public ceremonies, it is hereby agreed and concluded, that whenever any flag-officer of Great-Britain shall arrive in the bay of Tunis, in any of his majesty's ships of war, immediately upon notice given of it, there shall be twenty-five cannon fired from the castle of Goletta, or any other the nearest fortification belonging to Tunis, according to custom, and as a royal salute to his Britannic majesty's colours; and the same number shall be returned in answer thereto by his majesty's ships. And it is hereby stipulated and agreed, that all ceremonies of honour shall be allowed to the British consul who resides here, to represent in every respect his majesty's person, equal to any other nation whatsoever; and that no other consul in the kingdom shall be admitted before him in precedency. <sup>c</sup>

16. THAT the subjects of his Britannic majesty, either residing in or trading to the Tunisian dominions, shall not, for the time to come, pay any more than three per cent. custom on the value of goods or merchandizes, which they shall bring into or carry out of the kingdom of Tunis. <sup>d</sup>

17. IT is moreover agreed, concluded, and established, that at whatsoever time the said government of Tunis shall please to reduce the customs of the French nation to less than they pay at present, it shall be always observed, that the British customs shall be two per cent. less than any agreement that shall hereafter be made with the said French, or than shall be paid by the said subjects of France.

18. IT is moreover agreed, concluded, and established, that in case any British ship or ships, or any of the subjects of his Britannic majesty, shall import at the port of Tunis, or any part of this kingdom, any warlike stores, as cannons, muskets, pistols, cannon powder, or fine powder, bullets, masts, anchors, cables, pitch, tar, or the like; or also provisions; viz. wheat, barley, oats, beans, oil, or the like, they shall not pay any duty or custom whatsoever for any such kinds of merchandize. <sup>e</sup>

Read, approved, and ratified, by the parties above-mentioned, and signed and sealed by them in the said city of Tunis, on the 30th day of August, O. S. A. D. 1716.

AND thus much for the history of Tunis.

C H A P. V.

The history of Tripoli.

<sup>a</sup> THIS state, though under the protection of, and tributary to, the Porte, assumes <sup>The kingdom of</sup> the name of kingdom; the Grand Signors being always fond of multi-Tripoli; plying those titles, in order to swell the pomp and grandeur of their own. It takes its name from its own metropolis, which is likewise stiled New Tripoli, in order to distinguish it from a much more antient one on the same Mediterranean coasts in Phœnicia, which is still very considerable, and retains its antient name*.

<sup>b</sup> THE kingdom of Tripoli is bounded on the north by the Mediterranean; on the west <sup>its limits;</sup> partly by Tunis and Biledulgerid; on the south by mount Guibet, or Atlas; and, on the east, by Barca, or rather by Egypt, where its boundary terminates at the Cape Solyman, or Solomon, according to the latest and more accurate geographers (A). In this case the extent of this kingdom, from west to east, that is, from the town of Capes, or Gabs, on the <sup>extent from east</sup> mouth of the river Triton, which is the boundary on the Tunesian side, in east longitude <sup>to west;</sup> <sup>c</sup> 10° 13', to Cape Solyman 25° 27' (B), will be 15° 14', or near 200 leagues, exclusive of the windings of the coast, gulphs, &c. The truth is, that all the maritime towns, not only from the cape above-named to the town of Derne, where some authors place the end of its eastern limit, but even quite almost to the gulph of Sidra, which tract is better known by the name of Dernian coasts, are either so ruined, or dwindled into such poor inconsiderable villages, that it is hardly worth the Turks or the Basha of Kairo's while to dispute about the property of them with the state of Tripoli; and hence it probably is, that most of our late geographers assign it to the latter. As to the depth of it, from north to <sup>from north to</sup> south, it varies very much, being in some parts, especially the farthest part of the gulph <sup>south.</sup> of Sidra inward, to its utmost extent southward, scarcely above forty leagues; and in others, as about the city of Tripoli, where the coast stretches farthest northward, quite to mount Atlas, its southern border, above double the number<sup>b</sup>.

<sup>c</sup> TRIPOLI hath formerly been divided into seven provinces; viz. 1. Tripoli Proper; 2. the <sup>its division</sup> country of Mesrato; 3. of Haica; 4. Benolefa, Taourga, al. Teorregu; 5. Gulph of Sidra; <sup>into provinces.</sup> 6. Ouguela; and, 7. coast of Derne. At present it is commonly divided into maritime and inland; the inhabitants of the former chiefly live upon commerce and the piratical trade; and the latter, for the most part, on plunder and robbery: each of those divisions hath some cities and towns, besides a much larger number of villages, which lie scattered chiefly thro'

(A) This Barcan tract, both the maritime part, which is likewise stiled a kingdom, and the desert, some geographers pretend to appertain to Egypt, and to be under the government of the Basha of Kairo (1). But others, with more probability, look upon them to be under this of Tripoli. The truth is, that not only the desert, but even the maritime, are in such a miserable plight, that they are hardly worth claiming by either. The former being nothing but a dry, sandy, barren wilderness, inhabited by one of the vilest sorts of Arabs; who still answer the character we have given formerly to the Barcæi (2), whether descended from them or not, as well as the description we meet with in Virgil of them (3), who stiles them, Late furentes Barcæi; wretches that live altogether on the plunder of caravans, and other travellers, and murder them upon the slightest occasion or dislike.

We are told moreover, that, after they have robbed and stripped those that fall into their merciless hands, they oblige them to drink their stomachs full of milk, and hang them by the heels, to make them vomit what gold or gems they suppose them to have swallowed down (4). In a word, they are become so terrible to all passengers, that the caravans, and other merchants that carry things of any value with them, chuse rather to fetch a large compass about to avoid falling into their hands. Add to this, that their extreme poverty, and the fierce unconquerable temper they still retain, will scarcely make it worth any state's while to hold them in subjection, where so little benefit or advantage is to be reaped from it. We may add, that Leo, Sanfon, and other authors, have given this desert a much larger extent, by joining to it those of Ouguela, Sebeta, and some others which lie on the south of it, and are quite different from it, as the reader may see by the map of this country, otherwise it would be next to impossible for those caravans to take such a prodigious circuit to avoid them.

(B) We have followed Dr. Shaw in the settling the western limits at the city of Capes, or Gabs, which, being situate on the other side of the Triton, as well as that of El Hammah, must of course belong to Tunis (5): whereas most other geographers place them under this government (6). We have, therefore, in complaisance to both, mentioned the hot baths and springs of them among the natural curiosities of the Tunesian kingdom; and shall give the further description of those two places among the rest of the Tripolitan cities, as being the most considerable next to Tripoli in the whole kingdom; though, in reality, both are in a very ruinous condition, as will be seen in the sequel.

the latter; most of them very poor and thinly inhabited; the country being almost every where sandy and barren. As for cities and towns, those that deserve that name, are those which are situate along the coasts; of the most considerable of which we shall now give an account; the rest, being either wholly depopulated and gone to ruin, or are only inhabited by a few fishermen, lime-burners, pot-ash-makers, and here and there some few labourers: all of them reduced to the lowest degree of misery and wretchedness, through the cruel exactions of the government, or the frequent depredations of the Arabs<sup>c</sup>.
